INTRODUCTION OF WALTER SIMONS

energies of European peoples, and had to a great extent consumed them. After the Peace of Westphalia the attention of scholars and the public opinion of the cultured nations was more and more attracted to the mathematical and physical sciences. It was, more particularly, mathematics which ruled the spiritual life of the time. Since René Descartes (Cartesius, 1596-1650) had instilled a new life into this science, there had hardly been a superior mind which did not further develop the mathematical method in its own special field, or apply it to other branches of knowledge. This statement holds good not only of men like Isaac Newton (1642-1727) and Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646-1716), whose controversy concerning the priority of infinitesimal calculus is well known, but likewise of other contemporaries of Pufendorf. I mention here only Baruch Spinoza (1632-77), who attempted to teach philosophy according to the mathematical method. Thus it is not surprising that Pufendorf also was affected by the spirit of his time.

Samuel Pufendorf was born 8 January 1632 in the hamlet of Flöha, near Chemnitz, Saxony, and was a son of the local clergyman. His father had decided upon a theological career for him. Pufendorf, therefore, studied theology in Leipzig, but did not continue with this science and soon turned to jurisprudence. In Jena he studied not only natural law but also mathematics. These two branches of science which, according to our valuation, seem so far apart, were then both taught simultaneously by a distinguished mathematician, Professor Erhard Weigel. Throughout his life Pufendorf remained gratefully devoted to this eminent teacher. We meet occasional quotations of Weigel's sayings even in the later writings of Pufendorf. The teacher's method was decisive as regards the form of the first important work from the disciple's pen.

The origin of this work is due to peculiar conditions. Since Germany, after the Thirty Years' War, was economically disintegrated, the chances for a young scholar were poor. Pufendorf could not hope to find a congenial position in his circumscribed fatherland, Saxony. Thus he had to look towards foreign countries. He secured an engagement as tutor in the family of the Swedish minister, Coyet. This gentleman, who at that time represented the interests of the Swedish Crown at the court of Denmark, in 1658 called Pufendorf to Copenhagen. But it was not in the decrees of destiny that he should enjoy a long period of useful activity there. Although the Peace of Westphalia, which put an end to the Thirty Years' War, had really attempted to give to Europe a new and durable order of the component States, it could not prevent the turmoil of warfare on the many and various battle-fields of Europe during the following decades. Shortly after the arrival of Pufendorf in Copenhagen, war broke out between Denmark and Sweden. Without regard to diplomatic privilege and immunities, the suite of Coyet, and among them the tutor Pufendorf, was imprisoned. During his captivity, which lasted more than eight months, he wrote his first and probably most original work, Elementorum Jurisprudentiae Universalis Libri Duo. It goes without saying that during this time he was deprived of scientific intercourse and had no access to libraries. This work, which was reissued as No. 15 of the 'Classics of International Law', is formally based on the mathematical method of Weigel. In subject-matter it follows largely the doctrine of Grotius. Its significance was made clear, in a learned manner, by Dr. Hans Wehberg (Geneva) in the introduction to the new edition above mentioned.

This work was published by Pufendorf at the Hague in 1660, after his liberation from captivity in Denmark. He had not returned immediately from Copenhagen to Germany but had betaken himself to the Netherlands, where he matriculated at the University of Leiden. The book was dedicated to Elector Palatine Karl Ludwig. At one stroke, Pufendorf thus achieved an enviable reputation, and the Elector Palatine in 1661 called him to the University of Heidelberg. This appointment was epochal in the history of jurisprudence, as it meant the establishment of the first public chair of international law.

In Denmark and the Netherlands Pufendorf availed himself of the occasion to observe the confused conditions of his fatherland with less prejudice, and to arrive at a more impartial estimate than would have been possible in Germany under the dire after-effects of the Thirty Years' War. Considering his lively interest in all questions of constitutional and international law, we may assume that he had familiarized himself with the pamphlet literature which appeared abundantly during and after that European war. Then the centuries-old struggle between the imperial power and the territorial princes had been decided by the Peace of Westphalia to the disadvantage of the imperial power. Former vassals of the Emperor had now become sovereign princes. Theoretically, however, the contention was by no means ended. Under such circumstances it was not easy to write anything about these conditions without incurring the suspicion of partisanship. For this reason Pufendorf decided to publish under a pseudonym his observations on the status of the German Empire and his suggestions of reform. In 1664 he published at Heidelberg his book De Statu Imperii Germanici under the name of Severinus de Monzambano. He introduced himself to his readers as a 'nobleman from Verona' who undertook to enlighten his brother Laelius on these matters. This book at once attracted the greatest attention and achieved fame which was of long duration. Here Pufendorf points out the faults committed in the reorganization of the Empire through the Treaty of Westphalia.

In fact, the weakening of the imperial power by means of the system of states of central Europe which was then founded contributed largely to that general unrest which in later years shook the whole continent. But our author does not confine himself to criticism; he also makes proposals towards a better regulation of German conditions. Some of these ideas came to fruition through the interference of Napoleon I in German politics, and later through the foundation of the German Empire by Bismarck.

In 1670 Pufendorf resigned his chair at Heidelberg in response to a call from the King of Sweden, Charles XI, who appointed him professor primarius of jurisprudence at the University of Lund. This university, which had been recently founded, soon, through Pufendorf, became famous in Europe. Only two years after accepting this professorship Pufendorf published in Lund his principal work: De Jure Naturae et Gentium Libri Octo. Its contents we shall later discuss in more detail. In this work Pufendorf separated himself formally from the mathematical method, although to be sure one is often reminded of it by his system of definitions and conclusions. As ample compensation for this slight defect he created a new system covering the entire field of jurisprudence from the standpoint of natural law. This system was applied a century later, at least in part, in the arrangement of the 'preussisches Landrecht' of Frederick the Great.

With this work also Pufendorf achieved an extraordinary success. It was not only widely read in the original Latin text (more so than the formal and somewhat too precise Elementa), but in the course of time it was translated into French, English, and Italian, and it elicited many commentaries. On account of the great size of the work, and in order to make his doctrine more accessible to tirots and laymen, Pufendorf, who in the meantime had been granted a title of nobility, published an abridgement of his system of natural law entitled De Officio Hominis et Civis Libri Duo. Thus we may say that, just as the Elementa was a preparatory work to the book De Jure Naturae et Gentium, so the work De Officio Hominis et Civis offers an epitome of it. After all, even this abridgement is of independent value. Therefore it was eminently fitting that it should be reissued by James Brown Scott as No. 10 of the 'Classics of International Law', together with an introduction by Professor Walther Schücking, at present a member of the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague. There are several translations of this book. The title of the French translation by Jean Barbeyrac is Les devoirs de l'homme et du citoyen. It is significant of the often truly revolutionary ideas of Pufendorf that this title, with one term changed, meets us again in the heading of the famous declaration of the French National Assembly of 1789 concerning the rights of the man and the citizen ('Déclaration sur les droits de l'homme et du citoyen').

Pufendorf did not confine himself to a scholarly treatment of constitutional and international law; for in connexion therewith he made a comprehensive use of history, and also continued to show a practical interest in politics. For this reason he was called to Stockholm by the King of Sweden in the year 1667 to act as State Historiographer. In this position he published several works on the history of Sweden. He also wrote a refutation of the numerous attacks which had been directed against his main work. His reply had the title Eris Scandica.

But fate did not condemn him to spend his extraordinary energy exclusively in foreign countries. In 1686, at the age of 54 years, he went to Berlin at the call of Frederick William, the Great Elector of Brandenburg. During the last years of his life he did not publish any further writings in the field of natural and international law. In conformity with his new vocation he devoted his time to historical and political treatises; and, indeed, he finally returned to the elaboration of theological controversial questions with the study of which he had begun his career as a scholar. Held in high esteem by the republic of letters of Europe, he died at Berlin, October 26, 1694.

The principal source of his fame is and remains his work concerning natural and international law, which is now reissued by the Carnegie Endowment. It reminds us by its form of the scholarly and diffuse diatribes of the humanistic period. Pufendorf takes great pains, just as did Grotius and others of his predecessors, to corroborate the truths which he discovered by multitudinous quotations from the Holy Scriptures, classical literature, and contemporary writers. But between his method of quotation and, let us say, that of Hugo Grotius, we discover after all, upon closer comparison, a considerable difference. Grotius, as a Dutchman, lays far greater stress on the law as it has positive value, and on law as it is practically applied in history, than on the opinions of scholars. His quotations are more in the sense of cases of precedent and res judicata, as Anglo-Saxon law knows these practices. Pufendorf, on the other hand, relies more on the opinions of famous scholars for supporting his views. Hugo Grotius also supplements the abundance of his quotations by independent exposition and systematic elaboration of ideas bearing on natural law; by the combination of these two methods he became the founder of the positivistic as well as the natural law school of international law. Probably we are justified in classifying him with the positivists, but Pufendorf is undoubtedly to be counted among the theorists of the law of nature. In this respect Pufendorf finds support in those authors who more than a century before substituted for the scholastic deduction of all law from the revealed commandments of God, a rational method in the style of the Spanish School. Our time stands closer to the orientation of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in matters concerning philosophy of law than does the nineteenth century. Humanity, giving up the exaggerated worship of historical bases and positivism which characterized the last century, now resolutely takes hold of absolute values, without which the safe conduct of life becomes impossible for the individual as well as for States. Even in the Anglo-Saxon countries, the domain of case law, there is noticeable a marked change from the unconditional cult of precedent judgement to a more systematic foundation of jurisprudence in accordance with the philosophy of law. Thus the doctrine of Pufendorf, in our day, claims greater interest. In this connexion it is remarkable that some of his expositions remind us of the works of modern Catholic authors. He himself, however, was always emphatic in his profession of pure Lutheranism and never appealed to the views of Catholic authors.

His religious views may account for the fact that he apparently was hardly acquainted with the works of the Spanish school, which at present are more and more appreciated; at least he took no notice of the representatives of the school. He occasionally quotes Suarez, but I could not find in his works any allusion to Vitoria. This is the more surprising as he shows some knowledge of Spanish literature. His illustrations concerning conditions of natural law are often based on Spanish works which speak of the exploits of the conquistadores and give descriptions of the countries which they conquered. First among these is the book by Garcilasso de la Vega on voyages in Central and South America. From Pufendorf's quotations it is plain that he considered the communal forms of the natives of these countries in every respect as State organizations; he attributed to them a measure of independent life from the standpoint of international law, just as Vitoria had done. When we think of his aloof attitude towards Catholic and especially theological writers, it is well to remember that his work appeared in Sweden, a strictly Lutheran country. Lutheran orthodoxy of those times with reference to contemporaneous authors was, to say the least, just as intolerant as was the Catholic Church.

With special precaution Pufendorf also treats in his work the constitutional law of his epoch. Now we should not forget that he lived in the age when the power of princes was absolute; monarchs could resort to very severe procedure when they thought fit to make an obnoxious writer feel their displeasure. Nevertheless, he exhibits in his appreciation of political conditions a magnificent freedom from prejudice. In this respect he was in advance of his age. We shall see this clearly in discussing the contents of his work.

In this work, international law proper claims only an insignificant part, nor does he present it in systematic form. We have to gather the tenets bearing on this subject from the various chapters in which they are incidentally treated. The reason for this is that Pufendorf, in formulating the norms for the juridical community of 'moral beings', does not differentiate between physical and juridical subjects, nor between private subjects and those which come under public law. Thus it happens that the special rules which he posits for conditions of international law are only instances of more general principles of natural law which are also valid for individuals.

It is only in the eighth book that we find a connected presentation of matters of international law, especially the law of war and the doctrine concerning change of government in the State and the extinction of States. This book I shall later on discuss in more detail.

Notwithstanding the peculiar arrangement of the subject-matter a thoroughgoing study of all the parts of the great work from the point of view of modern international law cannot fail to prove fruitful, for the time in which Pufendorf wrote resembles, in many respects—both political and economic—our own time. A war, tremendous in scope and duration, had not only transformed the condition of power within the sphere of European culture, but had also destroyed immense economic values, at least in central Europe. Here, as well as in northern Europe, numerous currencies had become unstable. No wonder, then, that he concerns himself at great length with certain problems of public and private international law which at the present hour are of absorbing interest for us, as for example the settlement of international debts in depreciated currency.

To these problems, in my opinion, belongs also that of the equality of individuals and of States. Pufendorf, as a matter of principle, opposes all privileges; he rejects a mystic foundation for such institutions as nobility and kingship. In juxtaposition to the duties of man and citizen he also recognizes rights of man and citizen, which belong equally to every one in a definite State organization. Pufendorf would severely condemn any oppression of minorities as such, which an exaggerated nationalism in the Europe of our days, in opposition to minority treaties, claims as its vested right for the so-called 'people of the State'. He resolutely stands up for the principle of international equality of all independent States without regard to size of territory, population, or power. That in a League of Nations organized on this basis, a condition of inequality of the members in matters of vital sovereign rights could be permanently maintained, Pufendorf, mindful of his conception of the natural law of the States, could never have admitted. As a matter of course, he recognizes a limitation of sovereign power by treaty. Without this, a federation of States is just as unthinkable as a community of individuals without restrictions on natural human liberty. But such a limitation, he holds, must be voluntary, otherwise it would not be compatible with the dignity of a State as summa potestas. Thus, for joint resolutions of federated States, as a matter of principle, he demands unanimity; the same rule that is postulated in the Covenant of the League of Nations of 1919.

Concerning the aim and arrangement of his work the author gives us detailed information in the dedication to King Charles XI of Sweden, which is prefixed to the treatise, and also in the prefaces addressed to the reader. He points out in the dedication that the science of natural law which he (Pufendorf) professes was egregiously honoured by the King, who had endowed public chairs for this branch of law at the universities in his realm. Following the desire of the King, he explains, it is his endeavour, in the first place, to ascertain and lay down the commandments of God in the field of law for individuals as well as for States. These must be observed by rulers and citizens. With this he combines the study of human morals and customs, as well as of the means which States employ in order to preserve internal tranquillity and external security. As examples he adduces the great deeds of the rulers, especially the predecessors of the King. He takes great pains in order to elucidate the reciprocal rights and duties of human beings, the laws obtaining among the different nations, the form of civic society and princely power, and likewise the relations between prince and subject with respect to rights and duties. Ironically he points out the contradiction existing in the fact that the auditoriums of all the universities reverberate with the dicta of Ulpian and Papinian while the commandments of God and the natural laws of the human community are neglected.

In the preface to the first edition of the work Pufendorf admits that he had written his youthful work, the Elementa, in return for the care taken by his patrons on behalf of his welfare; now it must be his endeavour to replace it by a more mature work. Taking up the question whether such a work be still desirable in view of the achievements of his predecessors, he mentions with expressions of veneration the name of Hugo Grotius; he adds, however, that the great man had either entirely omitted some matters or bestowed on them only perfunctory treatment and that, furthermore, some of Grotius's sayings prove that he was no more than a fallible mortal. It is characteristic of Pufendorf that he points out as shortcomings of the work of his predecessor chiefly those passages where Grotius deviates from the doctrine of the Christian Church. After a succinct allusion to the commentators on Grotius, he turns to those authors who have chosen to treat the entire subject-matter from a fundamentally new point of view. Of these he mentions Thomas Hobbes and John Selden. He praises the acumen and originality of Hobbes while he criticizes his deviations from the teachings of the Church. As to Selden, he regrets that this erudite author has not bestowed on the common natural law the same care which is so conspicuous in his presentation of the positive law of the Hebrews. In contrast to the mere commentators on Grotius, Pufendorf assigns to himself a place among the independent writers. He protests against a possible charge of innovation: considering the amazing progress registered in the fields of medicine, physics, and mathematics, he asserts that the claim to introduce reforms must also be conceded to jurisprudence. He does not claim to belong to those who imagine themselves to have grasped the whole truth and who are therefore unwilling to admit error. In support of his views, he says, he has often appealed to the recognized writers of antiquity. On the other hand, he rejects an all-inclusive consideration of recent authors as superfluous. He is explicit in his statement that he has paid no attention to the writers of the 'Romish sect' whom Grotius quoted so frequently. Pufendorf's severe criticism of the scholastic method and of juristic clericalism impresses us as the first bar of the tune which dominated the century of Enlightenment, that is, the eighteenth century. He defines his position as regards his literary opponents who do not recognize the principle of human socialitas as a sufficient basis of natural law. The latter base their negative attitude on the supposed arbitrariness of the concept socialitas, which, in contradistinction to the teachings of Christian morality, they hold to be either without obligatory power or inadequate for the fulfilment of the duties of man towards God and towards himself. The author emphasizes the fundamental conception of his work to be that God Himself has created men as social beings and that therefore the laws of human society so far as they flow from the nature of man are likewise in accordance with the commandments of God, so that they cannot be traced back to an arbitrary agreement among men. Thus Pufendorf asserts that his system of natural law is valid for all human beings without regard to differences of religion.

This system is then presented in his main work, as follows:

In the first book, as premisses of his system, some fundamental legal concepts are offered, namely, in the first chapter, the origin, the various categories and qualities, as well as the extinction of 'moral beings'. Such beings, to be sure, stand conceptionally in a contrast to physical ones because they are not, like the latter, material beings but only modalities (modi). They are, however, to a considerable extent, classified and judged by analogy with physical beings. As moral beings Pufendorf characterizes those which are not created by Nature, but are elevated by the Spirit above the natural beings. To these belongs man himself, in so far as he orders and regulates his life and actions by the power of his spirit, in contrast with the instinctive life of animals. To the same category belong also human communities which are held together by the bond of a common moral purpose. The two kinds of moral beings, the simple as well as the composite, are subdivided conformably to the character of their purpose. They are private beings if they pursue their own advantage, public beings if they aim at improving positive, while the divine law belongs in part, Pufendorf holds, to the natural, and in part to the positive law.

The seventh chapter bears the title 'On the qualities of moral actions' and is largely devoted to the examination of the concept of justice and injustice (justitia and injuria). Pufendorf here defines his own position as against the ideas of Aristotle, Grotius, and Hobbes on the philosophy of law. He opposes the view of Hobbes that justice is grounded only on the will of the State, and that it consists in nothing but the fulfilment of obligations assumed by agreement. This view, which even in our time counts eminent protagonists, is of ominous significance for the interpretation of international law. Pufendorf argues against it that justice demands also the observation of those rights which belong to man by nature regardless of any State regulation or obligation by contract.

In the eighth chapter Pufendorf, in conformity with his system, analyses the quantitative aspects of moral acts, i.e. their relative value. This depends essentially on the kind of intention (intentio) underlying the act and also on the extent to which the act realizes the intention. Here the author denies the Stoic tenet of the equality of all misdeeds.

In the ninth and last chapter he concerns himself with the various manners in which the effect of moral acts (good or evil), as well as omissions, can be imputed, either as merit or guilt, to the person who commits such actions or to a third person.

Not until he begins his second book does the author broach his main subject. In the first chapter he sets forth the contradiction which seems to exist between man's freedom of will and his being bound by right and law. The freedom of animals knows nothing of such restrictions. Pufendorf finds the explanation of this subjection of man to law partly in the greater dignity which God has conferred on man and which requires that he shall subject his actions to a definite norm and rule; partly on the fact that the multitude, force, and variety of his passions stand in need of the curb of reason; and partly in man's helplessness during his early years which makes him to a greater degree and longer than any other creature dependent on social protection and thus on the social order of natural law as a limitation to natural freedom.

In the second chapter the natural state of man is delineated in two ways: first, the state of the uncultured individual is pictured, and second, that of a member of an uncultured human community, always under the abstract presupposition that a human status devoid of culture may have existed. But Pufendorf annihilates this figment by pointing out that not even Adam and Eve in Paradise enjoyed such a state of natural freedom, since God had enjoined on them the state of marriage. Hereupon he scourges the pessimistic presentation which Hobbes and Spinoza had given of the original social state of humanity as a war of all against all. He endeavours to show that natural reason has taught man the great advantage of arriving at an amicable arrangement with respect to the means offered by nature for the satisfaction of the requirements of life, instead of constant wrangling. The morbid pugnacity of some individuals is not to be construed as the natural state for all. Rather, man is by nature a social being, and within the community not a foe to his fellow men even when he faces them in natural freedom; that is, when he has neither to obey nor command them. Pufendorf rejects likewise the view of Hobbes that while there may never have been an individual who was the enemy of all other individuals, the holders of sovereign power in human society have always been enemies among themselves. Such a view contradicts Holy Scripture which teaches that the natural state of man is rather that of peace than of war, and that the reciprocal relation is rather friendship than enmity. This may be deduced from the very fact of man's common descent from the first parents. If a man has lost this consciousness of relationship and looks upon his fellow men as enemies, he has, our author thinks, deserted the original and natural state. The employment of natural reason likewise induces us to prefer peace. The experience of the evils which man, within or without the community of the State, suffers when he has to wage battles, provoked or not, makes towards the same goal.

Pufendorf expressly denies that the natural state of peace between human beings is based on an agreement, or that an agreement is required in order to bring about the obligation of peaceful behaviour among human beings. Such a general treaty (as, for instance, the Briand-Kellogg Pact, we might add to-day) cannot give to the duty of peace, which results from natural law, any higher obligation. This state of peace, it must be admitted, will, however, always be precarious, in view of the lust after power and possession which, in Pufendorf's opinion, is so strong in man that even the teaching of Jesus, which inculcates peace, loving-kindness, forgiveness, benevolence, readiness to reconciliation, humility, and contempt of earthly superabundance and power, was not able to hold back the Christian nations from unrighteous intrigues, wars, and oppression. Pufendorf therefore recommends a peaceable and friendly attitude towards neighbours, but at the same time he intimates the political duty of unceasing vigilance, with an eye on the possible martial aspirations of these neighbours. He is in perfect harmony with the opinion of Dio Chrysostom that the State which is best prepared for war will be in the most advantageous position for the maintenance of peace. He is not aware, it seems, how often warlike preparedness has involved the States in war. The successor of Pufendorf's Swedish sovereign (we are speaking of Charles XII) strikingly exemplified this principle which is based on experience.

In the following eight chapters the author endeavours to present the origin of natural law. His starting-point is the idea that God in creating man with the nature of a rational and social being has assigned to him simultaneously the rights and duties predicated on that nature. Nevertheless he protests against the attempt to derive the contents of natural law from the relation of man to God. And he refuses likewise to concede that the rules of natural law may be deduced from the consensus of opinion of all human beings, or of all nations, or at least of the majority and most cultured of them. The demonstration of such a view as that, he thinks, is both difficult and unreliable, in the first place because the customs and laws of the various nations rarely agree, nay, are plainly contradictory; and in the second place because there exists no nation which draws its norms exclusively from natural law. On the contrary, they all adopt numerous positive norms of customary and statutory law. Under these circumstances it is difficult to distinguish in the respective legal systems between natural and positive law. The multiformity of positive law, Pufendorf points out, is no reason for denying the existence of a natural law which is binding for all human beings; nor does it constitute a reason for attributing the origin of law to the advantage of various human communities at a particular period. He shows that such a materialistic and utilitarian interpretation of law is opposed to the true welfare of individuals as well as of States; it leads not only to unfair but also to pernicious consequences. On the other hand, the recognition and consideration of the natural equality of right of human beings and States is bound, in the long run, to prove advantageous. The short-lived success of a ruthless policy of conquest yields no argument to the contrary. Did the Romans not pay for their dominion over the then known globe with internal decadence, and later on with the collapse of their exhausted empire? Therefore, it is evident that natural law does not arise from considerations of contingent expediency, as do the majority of positive laws, but from the unchanging dictates of human reason. Yet with this theory Pufendorf does not mean to say that every human being is distinctly conscious of the natural commandments and their foundation. The majority decide between right and wrong according to the sentiment which God has implanted in their souls. Whether, in fine, such a decision really corresponds to natural law or flows from misguided human judgement can only be ascertained by a careful examination and logical conclusion from the first and true principles of natural reason. One of the clearest and most certain commandments of natural law is the golden rule which teaches us to behave towards our neighbour as we desire him to behave towards us. But this rule itself is to be deduced from a higher principle of natural law, to wit, the equality of human rights. The best way of investigating the natural law, our author infers, consists in carefully observing the nature of man and the conditions of his existence, as well as his inclinations and desires. The essential characteristics of man are: a strong instinct for self-preservation; the inability to attain this aim without the co-operation of his fellows; a great gift for useful community work, but also, frequently, a propensity for malice, arrogance, irritability, and destructiveness. Such a being is by nature social but stands in need of a check for his harmful instincts. Hence Pufendorf lays down the following as a fundamental principle of natural law: everything which is necessary for the aim of society (socialitas) is to be considered as required by law, while everything that disturbs or frustrates socialitas is to be treated as prohibited by law. In this connexion our author defines his position with respect to those writers who, under the influence of Hobbes's doctrine, hold that every human community is an institution opposed to the state of nature, since by nature discord reigns between human beings. He condemns this attitude as an exaggerated conclusion from the principle of Hobbes that all rules of natural law inhere in the egoism of man. The egoism of the individual and the egoism of the community, if well understood, Pufendorf thinks, are not mutually exclusive. But wherever consideration of the common good or of the rights of our fellows serves, at the same time, our own advantage, Pufendorf, in opposition to Hobbes, bases the corresponding rule not on egoism but on the natural law which is binding for the individual, and on ethical duty. From this universal duty to the socialitas which is incumbent on man towards all human beings as such, Pufendorf distinguishes the special relations of law which join the individual within narrower community spheres with the members of that community. In such cases egoism may, without impairing that universal duty, be the primary factor; but even then it is understood that the common good must not be injured. At any rate it is not a proposition of natural law that all communities of this type owe their origin to mutual benevolence. Pufendorf concedes that all propositions of natural law may be reduced to considerations of utility, even those which demand of the individual the utmost sacrifice. Thus, for instance, the soldier is expected to suffer death, fighting for his fatherland, or the citizen has to renounce his prosperity in favour of the requirements of the State. Even here, if we rightly consider the matter, the advantage of the individual coincides with that of the community. On the other hand, our author opposes the view that utilitarian considerations of this kind can bestow on the rules of natural law the force of binding laws. For this, a belief in God is indispensable. We must firmly hold on to the conviction that God, who has created man as a rational social being, has endowed him with these commandments which correspond to his nature. In order to be bound by them it is not necessary to have them first fused into positive laws.

Pufendorf then proposes the question: what sanctions ensure the observation of the norms of natural law, and what reward or punishment will be meted out for obedience or disobedience? Like Job, he does not arrive at any clear result. He cannot get round the fact that in this world it is often enough the righteous who suffer while the evil-doer is permitted to enjoy his ill-gotten goods. Nevertheless, disregarding the inner spiritual consequences of good and evil deeds, he emphasizes the strong probability that even in external things obedience to the commandments of natural law pays, while disobedience will bring retribution. Finally, he refers us to the teachings of Holy Scripture concerning retribution in the life to come.

The first three chapters of the second book have seemed to deserve an extensive recapitulation, as they contain Pufendorf's fundamental doctrines concerning natural law. The rest of this book and the additional six books embody the application of these doctrines to specific conditions of human life. It is clear that the application mainly refers to institutions of positive law. The author defines these likewise as rules of natural law. He points out, however, a distinction between those natural rules proper which are immediately given to man in the state of nature, and those which he terms mediate measures of natural law, in that they may be deduced from the immediate ones. The mediate measures he considers as belonging exclusively to positive law which is based on temporal and local conditions. Since the relation obtaining between States stands far closer to the state of nature than that between citizens of a State, it is easier to gather Pufendorf's conception of international law from the second book than from the later ones. Not until the eighth book does he approach the separate problems of international law more closely.

According to his peculiar system the author first of all treats of the natural obligations of man towards himself, including the development of mind as well as of body (chapter iv of Book II). In this connexion Pufendorf offers us a complete compendium of the wisdom and art of life. This chapter closes with a severe condemnation of suicide in any form, in contrast to the honourable sacrificing of one's life for aims approved by God. One of the natural rights of the individual is that of self-defence (chapter v); Pufendorf examines the question to what extent self-defence may amount to a duty, and reaches the conclusion that self-defence may become a duty in the event that, by refraining from it, one gives to the evil-doer the opportunity to do further harm to the community. In the considerations touching this point, Pufendorf comes very close to the position taken in Jhering's famous writing Der Kampf ums Recht. But he is on his guard against the one-sidedness whereof Jhering is guilty by warning against unnecessary employment of force and recommending readiness for reconciliation in minor difficulties, as well as leniency towards a repenting aggressor. But his attitude towards the man who persists in his affront and violation of law is different. In the interest of the common welfare Pufendorf here demands energetic action even to the point of annihilating the culprit, or at least weakening him enough to render him innocuous. This to be sure refers only to the status of law in man's natural state (and thus also to international law). Even here Pufendorf warns us against the exaggeration of the right of self-defence. This, he holds, does not allow any one to attack a presumed adversary from fear of a possible but not actual aggression. Therein lies the condemnation of preventive wars.

Noticeably severer are the limitations which Pufendorf imposes on the members of a civic commonwealth. Here the question of self-defence arises only after the assistance of the authorities whose duty it is to avert wrong-doing has been invoked in vain or is inaccessible. In such a case he thinks the state of nature is re-established. It is incumbent upon the authorities, in his opinion, not only to avert injury, but also to bring about retribution and the safeguarding of the endangered person for the future. Thus Pufendorf likewise makes a distinction between the natural and civic state when he answers the questions whether in self-defence one may go beyond what is required for warding off the aggression, or whether one must betake oneself to flight when one may thereby withdraw from the aggression, without trouble and danger. For the civic state, the first question is answered in the negative, the second in the affirmative. But in considering these questions with reference to the state of nature, and expressly as regards international law, Pufendorf decides to the contrary. For in the state of nature the aggressor is the enemy, pure and simple; and even supposing the aggression involves only a lesser lawful interest than the life of the person attacked, it is the right, nay it may be the duty, of the person in point to defend himself against the aggressor to the utmost.

In concluding this chapter the author raises a question which is of great importance for international law, namely, whether the party which has become guilty of an illegal aggression may forcibly avert the counter-attack of the injured party? His affirmative answer applies to the case in which the party originally attacked refuses to accept appropriate satisfaction for the injury inflicted.

The sixth chapter treats of the condition of emergency. Pufendorf here examines the foundation of the proverb that 'necessity knows no law'. He makes a distinction: does an emergency give a right to violate the laws? Or does it only supply an excuse for the law-breaker? The first alternative, it seems, he accepts for the norms of natural, the other for positive law. He nevertheless admits that in both domains absolute commandments are conceivable which must be fulfilled, even at the cost of life. In this connexion he elucidates the problem whether dire necessity gives to the poor man the right forcibly to take what he needs for the support of life, if the rich do not let him have it of their own free will. Such an action, he observes, contradicts the mediate proposition of natural law concerning the inviolability of property. Pufendorf assumes, however, that with this proposition there is a concurrent obligation on the part of the rich, equally natural and derived from humane principles, to give from their superabundance to the needy what these require. This obligation may, from its imperfect form in natural law, be transformed through positive law into a more perfect form, so that it can be enforced by courts and authorities. This was really the situation under the law of the Hebrews, as Pufendorf, appealing to the authority of Selden, narrates. Only where such positive regulations are in force, he thinks, is it fair to punish larceny and robbery induced by distress. We cannot avoid the inference that in our own day Pufendorf would advocate the public relief of the unemployed. He, however, impugns the doctrine of Grotius that in such a state of distress the derived legal concept of private property gives way to the original state of communism founded on natural law, so that the needy may appropriate what they require, since these things would be without a master.

The third book analyses the law of obligations from the point of view of natural law. In the first chapter Pufendorf enters upon the discussion of obligations resulting from delicts and expounds the doctrine of damages. In chapter ii, in frequent opposition to Hobbes, Pufendorf develops a series of conclusions on the equality of human beings, based on natural law, which equality exists notwithstanding all physical and psychological differences. He points out that in human intercourse every act must have its corresponding compensation; that the individual, in the distribution of goods and services among several parties, must, as a matter of principle, treat them equally; that no person shall haughtily exalt himself above his fellows, or refuse to them the same personal honour, and especially that he must not violate this honour by outward distinctions. Pufendorf sharply attacks the interpretation of antiquity that some human beings are by nature predestined for slavery. This form of inequality as well as any other that is not predicated on the natural differences of age, sex, or physical and spiritual power, he claims to be a product of positive law. Even the inequality of power, without which a commonwealth is inconceivable, Pufendorf treats as a positive deviation from the principle of natural law that all human beings are of equal power, because they are equal in freedom. Inequality of wealth, as such, should not, according either to natural or positive law, be allowed to play a conspicuous part as opposing the equality of human beings.

We are aware that in this chapter Pufendorf is far in advance of his time; he anticipates ideals of the century of Enlightenment, nay of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. It is well to remember that in his time citizens of the same commonwealth faced each other in a great number of narrowly circumscribed, sharply separated associations, guilds, and classes. This epoch, more than almost any other, was excessively rich in privileges. Considering all this, Pufendorf's emphasis on natural equality was, indeed, revolutionary. Imbued with an equally progressive spirit is the third chapter of the book on the various duties of humanity. As a basis for human intercourse the requirement is laid down that it is a human duty to take care of the welfare of one's neighbour. From this principle Pufendorf evolves the emergency right to pass over another's land, and the right of commerce in transit over foreign territory. He derives from the same source the authorization of the master of a vessel, in case of emergency, to land on foreign shores; and in the same manner the duty to extend to strangers hospitable treatment. Foreigners who are ready to subject themselves to the laws of the country are to be permitted to settle and to have recourse to the courts of the land. To other nations free commercial relations are to be granted; these are subject to limitation only in exceptional cases. He goes so far as to advocate international marriages. But he opposes the opinion of Grotius that from the principle of equality a universal right to most favoured treatment may be derived. Whoever claims such a right, according to Pufendorf, must base his claim upon a special agreement.

The fourth chapter treats of the general rules governing the law of obligations. The author maintains the validity of the doctrine pacta sunt servanda as an axiom of natural law, and grounds it on the social nature of man whose God-given purpose would be frustrated if treaties were not religiously observed. He then classifies obligations as innate and as subsequently contracted. In the first category he places the worship of and obedience to God. Therefore he pronounces against the view of Hobbes, who holds that impiety is an indication of stupidity and ignorance, and thus not subject to punishment. Neither is he inclined to look upon the impious, as it were, as legitimate foes of God, whose punishments we, as neutrals, could leave to God; rather he thinks it is right and just for us to punish them as rebels against divine and human order. Further on, he distinguishes between natural and civic legal obligations. As a matter of principle the former can only be enforced by amicable means, while as for the latter the State may compel their fulfilment. Pufendorf, moreover, distinguishes between temporary and permanent, unilateral and reciprocal, obligations.

of an acquired obligation. Here he sets forth his view in opposition to that of Hobbes, who held that on the basis of natural law every human being has a right to everything and thereby is the competitor of everybody else in the exercise of that right. According to Hobbes the transfer of right consists simply in the renunciation by one person in favour of another with regard to making use of this competitive right. The other party acquires no new right, but is merely freed from the burden of a specific competitor in the exercise of his universal right. Transfer of right consists in non-resistance—this is the formula of Hobbes. It goes without saying that Pufendorf, the proclaimer of the natural status socialis of man, cannot but reject this formula, which rests on the assumption of a natural state of war of everybody against everybody. In the state of nature he sees only an equal opportunity for all men to avail themselves, for the satisfaction of their requirements, of the animate and inanimate bounties of nature. A right to exploit specific gifts of nature is established only when the status of individual utilization is approved, either expressly or tacitly, by the members of the community. Pufendorf denies entirely a natural right of sovereignty which authorizes a man to demand services of others. Such rights can only arise from an agreement, since they contradict the natural equality of men. But assuming that a right in things or persons has come into existence in this manner, the situation is as follows: by such transfer one party loses a positive advantage which he possessed, while the other gains one which he did not possess. The mere non-exercise of a universal right cannot transfer that right to another, since such non-exercise does not free the person assumed to acquire it, from the competition of all other persons who have the same right. Subtle as this controversy may appear to us with regard to positive civil law, it will become highly significant in connexion with the acquisition and transfer of rights between States. From the point of view of modern international law, I think the interpretation of Pufendorf is in every respect to be preferred to that of Hobbes.

In examining the various kinds of unilateral or multilateral contractual obligations Pufendorf also takes up the moot question whether informal contracts (nuda pacta) and informal promises (nudae pollicitationes) must be kept. The Anglo-Saxon law, as is well known, does not recognize such an obligation, but insists either on a definite form of agreement or promise, or, on the other hand, on a modification in the right possessed by the one party, i.e. a consideration, which modification is made in reliance on the promise of the other party. In opposition to this doctrine Pufendorf upholds the basic validity of the rule pacta sunt servanda, which plays such a considerable part in international law. He proceeds to refute one after the other the arguments in favour of the more material doctrine. He points out that faith and confidence demand that in human society we must live up to our promises. This applies—and here Pufendorf agrees with Grotius—with special force to the relations between States. These relations would be gravely disturbed by mutual distrust if agreements informally made and not yet fulfilled by either side need not be kept at all.

In the sixth chapter our author discusses consent as a preliminary requirement for a valid pact. Here he inquires in detail whether, according to natural and international law, an agreement arrived at under compulsion and threats has binding force. Pufendorf does not share the opinion of Grotius that such agreements are binding because there occurred between the contracting parties some kind of consensus, it does not matter on what grounds. Upholding the contrary view, Pufendorf denies to such a pact from the outset all intrinsic binding force from the natural law standpoint. He argues that in case such an arrangement had been made by individuals within a State organization the judge would hold it to be void, as brought about by compulsion. On the same grounds he rejects the interpretation of Hobbes, who attributed binding force to compulsory treaties from the consideration that the origin of all laws of human communities may, without exception, be traced back to the pressure of distress and fear of the greater evils involved in the original state of nature. Rightly he asserts here that Hobbes in this connexion employs the concept of compulsion with two different connotations.

In the eighth book Pufendorf, as we shall see later on, modifies his stand as to treaties imposed by force of war. Generally speaking, he thinks, they cannot be invalidated.

The seventh chapter takes up the subject-matter of promises and pacts. More in detail it treats of provisions whose fulfilment is impossible, illegal, or immoral, and of the consequences of such provisions in relation to the binding force of promise and pact. Pufendorf likewise examines to what extent one may obligate himself by disposing of the goods of another, or of things and services which one had already promised to another party. Of importance for international law, at this point, is the opinion voiced by our author that nobody may validly change his nationality without the consent of the sovereign to whom he owes allegiance, for any legal transaction is null and void whereby we promise to one what we owe to another.

In the eighth chapter Pufendorf analyses the importance of conditions and limitations of time which may be attached to legal transactions. In the ninth chapter he adverts to agencies in the transaction of business. In this connexion we encounter certain observations concerning the position of ambassadors which are of some importance from the point of view of international law. He mentions the case of an ambassador who possesses simultaneously full credentials which he presents to the other party, and secret credentials which limit his liberty of action more than do the full credentials. Under such circumstances the ambassador obligates his sovereign by agreement within the limitations of the full credentials, even if he exceeds thereby his secret instructions.

In the subsequent books the author speaks of the institutions which man has established by express or tacit agreement, in order to enlarge and organize the rights granted him by nature. Among these he enumerates language, property, the prices of things, and the relations of sovereignty (sermo, dominium, pretium, potestas). It is in accordance with this scheme that he subdivides the rest of this work. Chapters i-iii of Book IV treat of language and the obligations originating therefrom, Chapters iv-xiii of property. Book V is concerned with prices, and in conjunction therewith we find a discussion of the various kinds of contracts which presuppose the price of things. Book VI treats of the relations of sovereignty with respect to the right of the family; Book VII discourses on the origin, the forms, and the acquisition of the power of the State; Book VIII, in chapters i-v, deals with the substance of the power of the State, chapters vi-x with the law of war, with the conclusion of peace, and with alliances and other treaties between States. In chapters xi and xii the loss of citizenship and the change in and dissolution of the State are discussed.

The starting-point for his observations concerning the binding power of language Pufendorf finds in a proposition of Aristotle to the effect that many animals are able to indicate by sounds their feelings of pleasure and pain, but that only to man is it given to communicate also, by sounds which have been agreed upon, thoughts bearing on what is useful, injurious, good, evil, just, or unjust, and that this gift alone is the basis of the human community in the home and in the State. Pufendorf then turns his attention to the different theories concerning the origin of language. He maintains that the combining of definite notions with definite sounds is not based on the nature of man, or on inner necessity of whatsoever description, but on voluntary decision and arrangement by man. Otherwise it would be inexplicable that the same idea or concept, with different peoples, may be expressed in such numerous and deviating linguistic forms. He attacks the opinion voiced by Socrates in Plato's Kratylos that everything has by nature its due name. He reduces this opinion ad absurdum through examples of etymological explanation of words which necessarily hold good only for a specific language (Book IV, chapter i). The linguistic expositions of the author are of interest as instances of a strictly rationalistic interpretation. They adduce a quantity of erudite material concerning the general and special signification of words and concerning ambiguity, the change of the concepts underlying the words, and their legal consequences. To this exposition Pufendorf adds, speaking from the standpoint of the philosophy of law, explanations concerning the concept of ethical and logical veracity, concerning the extent of the duty of veracity, and the limitation of the concept of falsehood. He likewise defines the right of receiving true information and the contrary right of observing silence concerning the truth. He emphatically rejects ambiguity of speech and secret reservations (reservatio mentalis). Special mention, on account of its importance for international law, should be made of the fact that Pufendorf, in agreement with Plato in his Republic, recognizes the right of rulers, in the interest of the State, to deceive not only their subjects, but also other rulers. In the case of physicians and lawyers he also recognizes the professional right to deviate from the truth.

The second chapter of Book IV undertakes a detailed treatment of the oath and its nature, its varieties and effects, as well as the violation of oaths. The third chapter, which considers the right of man to make use of the animal and vegetable kingdom, is preparatory to the doctrine of property. The development of property from the original possession in common he defines, in the fourth chapter, not as an immediate but as a derivative institution of natural law. Herein he is in harmony with the doctrine of Grotius, but in opposition to numerous writers of his time. He does not look upon property as an order sanctified by God, but as a human institution based on express or tacit agreement. God, to be sure, has given to man, as to the animals, the earth and all that grows and lives on it, for use; but the limitation of this utilization, its internal and external measure, is left to the discretion of man. Man can just as well ordain that all or some things remain in common as, on the other hand, he can distribute the things in the form of property among a few individuals, to the exclusion of the others. But even where this distribution is introduced there occur cases where human regulation has to give way to the state of nature. In case of extreme distress a needy person may make use of what he requires without regard to property rights. In time of war the treaty provisions between enemy States are suspended, and thus one party has the right to appropriate the property of the other. The acquisition of property by occupation Pufendorf likewise considers as derivative and not in accordance with the state of nature. Natural law, for instance, cannot explain why in international law the first taking of possession should establish a better legal title than the first discovery. The principle that only actual occupation, and not mere discovery, is the basis for the right of sovereignty belongs rather to positive international law.

In the fifth chapter the various things which are subject to property rights are discussed. As such the author reckons only those things which can be of use to man and from whose enjoyment the individual can exclude others. As a mark of such exclusion no artificial barriers are required; the mere fact that the boundaries of these things are marked in any manner is sufficient. For this reason (and to that extent differing from Grotius) Pufendorf thinks that property rights in rivers (but not in the flowing water thereof) are legally possible. Under the term 'property', as he here uses it, is also to be understood the sovereign right of the State.

This right of sovereignty is considered only when he speaks of dominium maris. He maintains a property right in the sea to be in every respect possible, and in some respects to be incontestable in international law. In extenso he sets forth the rights of sovereignty in harbours, coastal waters, isthmuses, and bays, the rights of exclusive exploitation in fishing waters, including such parts of the ocean and high seas as are adapted for oyster, pearl, coral, and sponge fishing. All these rights he deduces from positive human regulations and not from the original law of nature. That the high seas are open to the peaceful common use and especially to the free navigation of all nations is, according to Pufendorf, no doctrine of natural law but is derived from the fact that so far the privilege has been granted to no individual to exclude the other nations from the use of the high seas. Moreover, a claim to such a privilege would be difficult to enforce; and furthermore it should be rejected from the moral standpoint as the result of senseless ambition or contemptible greed. Thus Pufendorf practically supports the doctrine of Grotius concerning the mare liberum. It is not contradictory to this attitude when he recognizes as permissible in international law certain restrictions of liberty of commerce which individual maritime States have enjoined on, or arranged with, other maritime States in connexion with navigation along the coast.

The sixth chapter treats of the differences between original and derivative acquisition, and particularly of original acquisition by occupation. Of the very thorough explanations of this topic the last section is of extraordinary interest. It treats of the occupatio bellica, the acquisition of property through warlike occupation, or the right of booty. Pufendorf here, as he has done before, explains the right of booty as follows: by the state of war it is not exactly the property right of the enemy which is suspended, but it is rather the treaty obligation between the contending parties for the recognition of property which ceases. The final acquisition of property Pufendorf does not date from the capture of enemy goods, but from the renunciation of the right of reacquiring them which the enemy makes in the treaty of peace. As a particular characteristic of occupatio bellica Pufendorf mentions that in this way not only property in things but also sovereignty over men can be acquired. At this point he opposes the doctrine of Grotius that property and sovereignty may be equally the object of occupation; for, as he thinks, the normal case of occupation, that is the occupation of a thing without an owner, is out of the question for the acquisition of sovereignty over men. A man without a master is his own master, and thus cannot be placed on the same level as res nullius. Thus, when the acquisition of sovereignty over inhabitants is connected with the occupation of their territory, such acquisition is a secondary phenomenon and not an original acquisition in the proper sense. It is in harmony with this interpretation that Pufendorf looks upon territorial sovereignty as a kind of dominion, while he tends to restrict the concept imperium to personal sovereignty.

In the seventh chapter, which treats of the acquisition of accessions or appurtenances, only Pufendorf's exposition of alluvial land (alluviones), so far as it concerns the territorial sovereignty of the State, has importance for international law. Here likewise he declines to appeal to original principles of natural law, but refers to the positive law systems of the individual nations. Notwithstanding this he formulates some rules which are capable of deciding the controversies which, owing to changes in the courses of rivers serving as boundaries, are likely to arise between the States which they separate. In this case he distinguishes as follows: whether the river-bed itself is divided between the neighbouring nations and the boundary lands are clearly marked by surveying or a system of measurements; whether the river up to the other shore belongs only to one of the neighbouring peoples, or whether it is open for common use between them. In the first case, a change in the course of the river does not give rise to any change in sovereignty or property rights. In the second case, the alluvium falls to the State that owns the shore, while islands arising in the river belong to the owner of the river. In the third case, both belong to the first occupant, with this proviso, however, that the right of occupation for alluvial land is a prerogative of the State which owns the thus enlarged shore; as for newly arisen islands this right belongs to the State to whose shore they lie closest. In general there is a presumption, according to Pufendorf, that the sovereignty and property rights of both parties extend to the middle of the river. He, on the other hand, does not withhold his opinion that a gradual change of the course of a river, which eats away one shore and deposits solid matter on the other, affects also the territorial and property boundaries. But when a river suddenly digs for itself a new bed, then the centre line of the deserted bed remains the boundary of territory and property.

The eighth chapter is dedicated to the doctrine of the rights in the property of others. Pufendorf treats this question only from the point of view of civil law and pays no attention to the much-contested concept of State servitudes.

The ninth chapter treats of the transfer of property. Under this heading the author also expounds the legal significance of possession; for he is compelled to define his attitude with respect to the old controverted question whether, in order to effect the transfer of property, the accord of the wills of the buyer and seller is sufficient, or whether the actual transfer must accompany it. Pufendorf decides this moot point as follows: that for the transfer of property as such (i.e. in a moral sense) the consensus of will is sufficient, but that the exercise of physical power over the object sold requires the actual transfer of the property. The transfer in question, it is clear, cannot any longer be an act based on property right—for this has already passed over to the other party—but is simply an act based on contractual obligation, to give the acquirer the physical possession of the property. Pufendorf here strains the regulations of Roman law in such a manner that he comes closer to the interpretation of the Anglo-Saxon and more recent French law. His attitude, it must be said, is diametrically opposed to the present German law.

In the tenth chapter the author discusses the question of wills and donations in the case of death. His position is opposed to that of Grotius. The latter author was of opinion that, while the different forms of wills are creations of positive law, the right of the owner to dispose of his possessions after his death is a consequence of the concept of property from the standpoint of natural law. Pufendorf, on the contrary, holds that only the disposal of objects of property which occurs among the living is in conformity with natural law, and that any legal arrangement which makes a disposition to be effective in the case of death, and is of obligatory power only after death, is to be exclusively attributed to positive human regulation. It is deserving of note, and can only be explained as an after-effect of the partiality of the Roman law for testamentary dispositions, that Pufendorf does not trace back to natural law the transfer to the natural heirs of the property of a man who died intestate, but rather traces it back to the presumptive wish of the deceased which applies in the absence of a will. This interpretation is absolutely contradictory to Germanic law. Pufendorf, moreover, is not blind to the disadvantages of the Roman liberty of bequeathing by testament, which, it is said, was based on a law of Solon. In agreement with Bodin (De Republica, Bk. V, chapter ii) he criticizes especially the possibility of likewise disposing by testament of real property. He would, beyond doubt, have energetically protested against the procedure of his later sovereign, the Great Elector of Brandenburg, who did unhesitatingly dispose, by testamentary partition, of his dominion as if it were movable property.

The twelfth chapter treats of usucapion. Our author presents the Roman legal doctrine. Then he proposes the question whether usucapion is an institution of natural law, as Grotius propounds, or whether it stands in contradiction to natural law, and thus owes its origin to positive regulation, as Cujacius holds. Pufendorf inclines to the view of Grotius, since the introduction of usucapion serves the same purpose as that of property, viz. to maintain peace in human society. From the same consideration he claims that usucapion is likewise an institution of international law, the more so as disputes of States concerning territorial sovereignty are affairs of greater weight than private litigation for property rights. Pufendorf, basing his view on a great number of authors and examples from history, rejects the claims of sovereigns for territories which once belonged to their predecessors but which, for a long time, have been under the uncontested sovereignty of another power. To invalidate such claims, it is not even required to appeal to prolonged prescription, if one can point to a title for this territorial sovereignty which is based on international law, as, for instance, conquest by war.

To be sure, no permanent right of possession is achieved by conquest, during the state of war; for here we are confronted by the possibility of forcible reacquisition which is recognized in international law. It is only the treaty of peace which confirms the title. The very fact that over a long period no legal claim for a certain territory was advanced by another party constitutes in itself, for a nation which by peaceful ways has obtained sovereignty over this territory, a strong presumption of legitimate possession.

In the thirteenth chapter the various relations of indebtedness which result from the dominion of property are enumerated and discussed. Pufendorf begins with the general obligation of all non-owners not to interfere with the owner's peaceful enjoyment and use of his property, and he closes with the special obligations of the bona fide or mala fide possessor of things belonging to another towards the owner. He mentions here among other instances the case in international law where a sovereign who had been previously expelled and later reinstated in his realm registers a claim for the funds which the usurper had withdrawn from the territory of the said sovereign and deposited out of the country. He approves such a claim (in opposition to the view of Polybius) provided that the intermediate reign was founded on unjust violence.

Book V treats of the theory of contract law. Pufendorf's starting-point is price as the standard for the value of the things to which the contract refers. The amount of the price of a commodity is not, as Grotius declares, regulated according to the degree to which it can satisfy human requirements, since the most necessary things, like air and water, have no price when they exist in abundance, and really unnecessary things, as certain luxuries, are often the costliest. The criterion of price is rather the rarity, preciousness, or artistic perfection of things. After illustrating the manner in which the general value of things was ascertained in barter, Pufendorf turns to the origin of metallic coin as a common measure of value. Even though the value of metallic money rests on human regulations and agreement, Pufendorf warns the sovereigns against fixing this value too arbitrarily. For domestic trade they might be able to introduce a compulsory valuation, but for foreign commerce overvalued money is not practical. Neither is the sovereign authorized to debase the currency except when the requirements of the State make this course imperative. Even fluctuations of the value of money which arise from natural causes, without any interference by law, are injurious to the economic system of the States. In this respect it is immaterial whether a superabundance of goods depresses or a superabundance of metallic money raises the prices. Each of these phenomena frequently occurred in the two centuries between the discovery of America and Pufendorf's day. Such fluctuations, however, as they occur slowly and imperceptibly do not, in the opinion of Pufendorf, destroy the character of money as a standard of value. They leave untouched the legality of prices agreed upon in this fluctuating currency, while arbitrary and sudden changes in currency shake their very foundations. Pufendorf touches here upon a problem which was in his day, after the Thirty Years' War, not less vital than in our time after the World War.

In the second chapter of this book our author, guided by the Roman law, distinguishes the various kinds of contracts. In the third chapter he treats of the principle of equality of performance and compensation as a natural consequence of the purpose of onerous contracts. The same holds good also for compulsory contracts which are concluded by the State authorities with permanent as well as temporary subjects, as it likewise holds good for requisitions and expropriations. Here it is incumbent on the State also to pay a fair equivalent. In the following chapters an elucidation of the different kinds of contracts is undertaken. In the fourth chapter Pufendorf speaks of contracts without money consideration, such as those relating to mandates, deposits, and loans of goods. In chapters v-vii he surveys the contracts that carry a money consideration, especially contracts of exchange, sale, rental and lease, and loan of money. Under the heading of loan of money he reverts to the problem involved in a change of currency, and by means of an extensive exposition he endeavours to find a solution for all the various cases which are bound to result from the debasement of coin. He agrees with the then prevailing opinion that the amount of a loan paid in coin of full value, when repaid in arbitrarily debased coin of the same denomination, is to be correspondingly raised (i.e. revaluated). Of interest from the point of view of the history of law are the explanations he offers in the seventh chapter concerning the prohibition of interest.

This prohibition, he thinks, is nothing else than a norm of positive law for the Jewish people, whereas according to natural law a rate of interest may be agreed upon for a loan in proportion to the gains expected from the loaned money.

After treating the social contract, in chapter viii, Pufendorf speaks in the ninth of contracts subject to chance. He recognizes a kind of wager in the decision of two States to go to war over a point at issue which they have not succeeded in settling amicably. From this element of chance in the war he deduces the proposition of international law that the defeated nation upon which an unfavourable peace treaty has been imposed has no right to protest against the enforcement of the conditions of peace on the grounds of compulsion. Pufendorf later on reverts to this same proposition.

The tenth chapter concerns the so-called accessory pacts (pacta adjuncta sive accessoria) which may from the outset cause a variation in the main contracts, or may subsequently supplement or modify such contracts, as in the case of suretyship and trust. In this connexion Pufendorf also explains the doctrine referring to hostages.

The various means of fulfilment of obligations arising from debt are presented in the eleventh chapter. The form of fulfilment in natural law is the payment in kind of the things promised, and not in the form of indemnification by an amount of money. The other forms of liquidation of claims Pufendorf describes in the usual manner. He emphasizes that an obligation of debt is not fulfilled, but rather annulled, when in a bilateral contract one party maliciously neglects his payments. In such a case the other party is liberated from his obligation. This, as everywhere in Pufendorf's writings, is a tenet of natural law which is just as valid for international as for private law.

The same is to be said concerning the comprehensive rules for the interpretation of pacts which the author sets forth in the twelfth chapter. He gives a series of historical examples of treaty stipulations which had become objects of dispute. For every one of these cases he attempts to give a solution based on nature. Of special relevancy here are the observations on that clause which since time immemorial has been frequently imposed in peace treaties on the defeated State, namely that without the victor's consent the defeated State is not allowed to wage any war in the future. According to Pufendorf's interpretation this clause has reference only to wars of aggression and not of defence proper.

In the thirteenth chapter he scrutinizes the means which seem indicated in order to prevent the outbreak of warlike complications. Here likewise Pufendorf places the mutual relationship of States on the same level as that of men in the state of nature. For both cases he finds the rule in natural law that even where authority for employment of force may be presumed, an attempt is first to be made to reach an amicable agreement. At this point Pufendorf discusses in detail the subject of arbitration. He lays stress on this feature, namely, that arbitral decision concerning a verdict of arbitration is impossible, but that the matter is definitely settled by the verdict of arbitration. He admits, however, exceptions: for instance, when the arbiter was bribed or manifestly proceeded unfairly. In cases of doubt he imposes on the arbiter the duty to decide according to principles of law, and not mere equity.

Furthermore, our author examines the question whether in a dispute between States subject to arbitration an intermediary decision concerning the status of possession may be handed down. Grotius had argued in the negative on this question, since between rulers no common positive laws obtain, but only norms inherent in natural law, to which legal means of possession did not pertain, and since the arbiters are appointed for the purpose of deciding the main issue, their competence is limited. Disagreeing with these views, Pufendorf declares it to be a command of natural law that the court of arbitration shall first regulate the question of possession in order to distribute the burden of evidence correctly, and in order that the question at issue may not be modified during the procedure.

He distinguishes mediation (amica compositio) and intervention from the procedure of arbitration. He eulogizes these means of preventing or shortening wars without reserve, and even considers such friendly offices to be a duty for Christian peoples. Even the Koran, which he generally holds to be the work of an impostor, prescribes, he points out, a similar procedure when two Mohammedan powers are contending. The procedure advocated by Pufendorf reminds us of certain articles of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The States to whose common interest it is that the dispute be settled may agree upon joint mediation; they may, at the same time, stipulate to what extent each shall intervene in the war that has broken out. In the same manner they may, after examining the dispute, decide what conditions of peace may, according to justice and equity, be imposed on the contending parties. These conditions they jointly suggest as friends to both sides, with the notification that they are ready to assist by war the party that accepts them against the party which would decline them. Such a procedure cannot be construed into an obtrusive arrogation of the office of arbiter, nor a demonstration of super-State sovereignty. In view of the sensitiveness of sovereign States still in evidence against any form of intervention we realize how far Pufendorf was in advance of his time. Even The Hague Conventions for Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, as late as 1899 and 1907, contain the clause that no signatory State should look at an attempt at mediation as an unfriendly act. Nay, the Covenant of the League of Nations could not but found its regulations for mediatory actions of the organs of the League expressly on the common interest of the members in the preservation of peace.

For the procedure of arbitration, chapter xiii contains only a few fundamental rules. The same may be said about the enforcement of verdicts of arbitration. For obstinate refusal by the party under condemnation of payment, natural law has at its disposal only one remedy, to wit the employment of force, that is war. In contrast with civil law, international law authorizes the victorious party to indemnify itself by sequestering other objects or territory than those due, in case it cannot compel the due payment. Such measures may be used as an instrument of pressure to obtain the overdue payments, or failing that, the property seized may be permanently retained. But in both cases after the seizure the creditor State must allow the debtor State an opportunity to repossess itself, by payment of what it owes, of the things which have been seized as a substitute.

The sixth book treats in the first chapter of the law on matrimony, in the second of parental authority, in the third of the power of the master over the slave. Neither for public international law nor for private international law do we find here much material. It may be mentioned that, besides that form of matrimony where the husband wields authority over his wife, Pufendorf is aware also of another, where the relationship is reversed. He calls this 'Amazonian marriage' and declares it to be unnatural. He does not derive the matrimonial authority of man over woman from natural law, since the natural purpose of marriage may be attained without such a relationship of force. It is, in his opinion, a positive regulation. Conformably to his Lutheran beliefs he states that according to natural law marriage may be dissolved on the grounds of adultery, malicious desertion, and obstinate refusal of the matrimonial duty. He condemns the canonical principle of the indissolubility of marriage. In the chapter on parental power Pufendorf, following Hobbes, mentions also matriarchal relations. The matriarchate, he thinks, corresponded to the state of nature as long as the union of the sexes was not permanent. Since the introduction of marriage the exercise of the parental power by the father has become the rule, by the mother the exception. It would not be fruitful to analyse in detail the lengthy discourse in the sixth book on the relations of the family. As to slavery, he denies that it conforms to the state of nature. It originated, he intimates, from voluntary subordination of the weaker to the stronger, and later from capture in war. He charges Hobbes with error when the latter considers slavery, as a concomitant phenomenon of war, to be an institution of nature.

More fruitful for our purposes is Book VII. Its nine chapters, together with the first five chapters of Book VIII, contain Pufendorf's doctrines concerning political law. In the first chapter he analyses the origin of the State and he finds it in the fear of hostile aggression which haunts mortals and has induced them to combine for mutual protection. It is obvious that neither respect for the laws of nature, nor the activity of arbiters, nor compromise agreements are powerful enough to preserve peace among men. Peace is constantly disturbed by the differences of opinion which are caused by the differences of judgement in human beings. A firmer rein is required to hold the pugnacity of the human race in curb. This is to be found in the power of the State.

The second chapter presents Pufendorf's doctrine on the contractual nature of the State. In opposition to Hobbes who acknowledges only one single contrat social (as Rousseau named it) as forming the State, our author assumes several contracts in succession: in the first place an agreement of a number of human individuals to unite themselves for common protection; then a resolution of the group so formed defining how it wishes to be governed; and finally a contract concerning the appointment of persons to whom the government of the State is entrusted. This contract between governors and governed is required not only in monarchies and aristocracies, but also in democracies, although in the latter the power of command is vested in the people. For the people are something different from the sum total of the individuals. Therefore, a contract between the sovereign people and the individuals who are subject to power is entirely conceivable. Hobbes, it is known, denies the possibility of such a contract, even in a monarchy. It is, however, plain that the tendency of his book Leviathan to reject the claim of a nation for revolution against an illegally ruling sovereign has led him astray. Such a claim, we are well aware, was in that time often advanced as a pretext for rebellion. While it is, indeed, highly important for the welfare of the human race that the royal power should be held sacrosanct, and should be protected from attacks by dissatisfied persons, on the other hand it is beyond doubt that between prince and citizen there exists a bilateral contract. On the strength of this agreement the prince owes the citizen protection, and the citizen owes obedience to the prince. Without such a contract, neither of the two obligations in question could exist. This idea Pufendorf unswervingly pursues, always carefully refuting the arguments of Hobbes. Therewith he applies the axe to the roots of the absolute power of princes whom he had served all his life.

Although in the third chapter he traces the power of the prince, like any form of sovereignty, back to God, he has not in mind a mystic institution 'by the grace of God', as if God Almighty had established it by an immediate act. Instead he sees therein a result of God-given human reason. He is on his guard against the ultra-utilitarian view of Grotius that the State power was introduced by mortals for the protection of their security and had only been approved by God. Its author, after all, is God, but only mediately. With far greater severity he condemns the doctrine of servants and flatterers of princes who, at that time, frequently inveigled rulers into the belief that God himself had conferred on them, as his vicegerents on earth, part of his power. In truth, he thinks that the power of the ruler is nothing else than the combined power of all the individuals who, organizing into a State, bestowed on the incumbent of the sovereign office a part of their power, which they held on account of their natural freedom. Here Pufendorf appears as the direct precursor of the theory concerning the origin and extent of human authority which forms the basis of the Constitution of the United States of America.

Of importance for the law of nations is the concluding (9th) paragraph of this chapter. Pufendorf shows here that only to the totality of the citizens belongs the right to grant to the individual person, on whom it bestows the sovereignty, the title of ruler. If, then, a ruler with the assent of the citizens of the State assumes the title of king, he does not need for this the approval of the other states, any more than for his accession to power. If another sovereign denies him the title of king, this constitutes, from the standpoint of international law, no less an injury than if the foreign prince were to deny his claim to the sovereignty itself. Only when the ruler is not a full sovereign, but a vassal of a liege lord, is the consent of the latter required for the assumption of the royal title. In this case royal dignity of the lesser prince is derivative. In general, however, the approval of the acceptance of the royal title by a ruler who was formerly dependent coincides with the recognition of his future complete sovereignty and independence. These propositions were written by Pufendorf before the successor of the Great Elector, the Elector of Brandenburg (Frederick III), who in this quality was a vassal of the Emperor, assumed the title of King in Prussia, as Frederick I. We may even say that they seem not to have been without influence on this historic event. An echo of the interpretation of Pufendorf is probably to be recognized in a later historic occurrence. When William I of Prussia, at the death of his insane brother Frederick William IV, became king, after having been regent, he took the crown, it is true, from the altar of the Lord, but received homage as king from the representatives of the entire nation.

Pufendorf's doctrine of the division of the highest power of the State, which he presents in chapter iv, anticipates to a certain extent the famous theory of Montesquieu on the division of power. Pufendorf's doctrine lacks only the clear threefold classification. The author enumerates in succession the legislative power, the punitive power, the judicial power, the power of war and peace, the constituent power (distribution of offices), and the power to levy taxes. Although a comprehensive concept of executive power is not yet achieved, in compensation for this (in § 11) the coherency of powers is much more fully elaborated. The author shows to what confusion of the life of the State it would lead, if the bearers of the separate titles of authority were to discharge their offices in absolute mutual independence. He holds that all of them must be subject to the supreme will. This, according to Pufendorf, is valid also for the teaching function. It would really be unbearable and likely to bring about sedition if the teachers of the people were free to threaten citizens with eternal condemnation for acts which the wielder of punitive power would have enjoined on them under the threat of the death penalty. Our author would never have recognized an absolute liberty of teaching. He refrains from discussing in detail the interrelation of Church and State. But he tries to refute the views of those who, on the basis of certain misunderstood doctrines of Aristotle, advocate a more far-reaching division of power. Among these he impugns Grotius.

In connexion with this he takes issue with the doctrine of Grotius that by the State constitution the power could be divided between king and people in such a way that it would be possible to subject the king to compulsion or punishment. Wherever such regulations are met with in a constitution, then it would not be the king who is sovereign, butt he people. The power, therefore, would not be divided at all. If we assume such a condition, exercise of pressure is conceivable only in two ways. If we consider the legal way, this is impracticable, for people and king do not recognize a common judge above them. If we think of employing force, this presupposes the state of nature and thus destroys the essence of the State. We perceive in these expositions an echo of the trial by which Cromwell rushed King Charles I of England to the scaffold.

The fifth chapter gives a very thoroughgoing discussion concerning the form of the State. Following Aristotle, Pufendorf assumes three fundamental forms: monarchy, aristocracy, and democracy. Here the criterion is whether an individual man, or a council of selected men, or the entire citizenship in possession of the right to vote, is invested with the highest power. In what manner the power is put into practice seems to him indifferent. A democracy may be administered in a monarchic manner by a leader of the people, and a monarchy in an aristocratic manner by a camarilla. Besides this, there are numerous varieties of those fundamental forms which result partly from their combination within a State and partly from more or less close relationship among several States. The author takes pure democracy to be the oldest form of State, as it is the form which is nearest to natural liberty and equality. But he expressly wards off the inference that he considers it, for this reason, the best. This form, he thinks, in agreement with Plato, is only adapted to a community of homogeneous citizens who, belonging to the same tribe and being sons of the same mother, feel like brethren. If Aristotle saw in monarchy the oldest form of the State, he mistook the position of the head of the family for that of the incumbent of the ruling office of the State. He also overlooks the fact that the so-called kings of heroic times were rather counsellors and leaders than rulers of their countrymen, and therefore must be looked upon as holders of an office delegated to them by the sovereign community of the people.

In describing the characteristics of democracy, Pufendorf among other matters takes account of the principle of majority. According to him it is contradictory to natural liberty that the will of a majority of equals should override the will of the minority. Thus, whenever a number of free men come together for the foundation of a State, those who withhold their assent to the resolution of organization remain outside the State in their natural freedom. If, however, all, in agreeing to the foundation, have resolved upon a democracy based on majority rule as the form of the State, then all are bound to the second resolution. They must subject themselves to the decision of the majority, for this represents constitutionally the entire people.

The aristocratic form of State, according to Pufendorf, originates when, in accordance with the contract for the organization of the State, the constituent resolution provides that the supreme power in the State is to be exercised by a corporation consisting of a small number of citizens organized conformably to definite rules. By the acceptance of the mandate by the said corporation there arises a relation of contract between it and the entirety of the individual citizens. To this interpretation our author adheres in opposition to Hobbes, just as he did with regard to democracy and monarchy. Owing to this relationship of contract the bearer of the supreme power owes legal protection to the individuals under his rule, while these owe him obedience. On the other hand, Pufendorf approves the view of Hobbes that in a monarchy the holder of the supreme power personally does wrong in issuing laws contradictory to natural law; but that in a democracy or aristocracy such laws are not to be considered as transgressions committed by the aforesaid corporations which are invested with the supreme power, but as transgressions committed by those physical persons who by their actions have brought about the enactment of the unjust law.

The author, following the theories of Aristotle, then passes to the unsound varieties of the regular forms of government and to the mixed forms. The term 'mixed forms' he thinks is really misleading. Here we have to do either with a regular form where the unified supreme power is exercised indirectly through representatives, or, on the other hand, with absolute irregular forms which lack a unified organ of sovereignty. Such forms of government are always threatened with an early collapse owing to internal disintegration. Among these Pufendorf includes also, as he had done in his anonymous tractate previously mentioned, the then so-called 'Roman Empire of the German Nation'.

On the other hand, he distinguishes these forms from federations of States. Clearly, to this category there do not belong, as Hobbes maintains, the provinces annexed to the Empire under separate administration, for these possess no sovereignty of any description; rather the category comprises several States united either by personal union or a permanent alliance. Pufendorf presents in detail the differences between these two cases, and also shows how one may pass into the other. In the case of a personal union in which the component parts have different constitutional laws regulating the succession to the throne, the death of the common ruler may lead to dissolution. This, for instance, takes place when in one of the States in such a union a male heir, in the other a female heir, has the nearest claim to the throne. (This brings to mind the dispute concerning the succession in the so-called Elbe grand duchies which led to the Danish war in 1863.) In order to avoid such an eventuality it is necessary to have a covenant of the interested States regulating the order of succession to the throne, or a solemn decree of the last common ruler, which must be accepted by these States jointly and severally. Henceforth only one and the same order of succession is valid. Such a step may, it is to be admitted, reduce the formerly independent States to provinces of a unified State, and thus their relationship of federation would become extinct. Pufendorf here anticipates the history of the Austrian hereditary lands. These were originally brought together by marriages of the Hapsburg rulers and formed independent units with different rights of succession to the throne. The last of the Hapsburgs, the Emperor Charles VI, by means of the 'pragmatic sanction' welded them into a consolidated inheritance for his daughter, the great Maria Theresa. In the end they were only provinces of the Austro-Hungarian dual monarchy. But the famous Empress had in the beginning to fight for the recognition of this phase of her rights in the War of the Austrian Succession.

In the regular federation of States, according to Pufendorf, the majority principle is out of place, as it eliminates sovereignty; for the appropriate principle is unanimity, such as is the rule in the Covenant of the League of Nations. He holds that the obligation of the several federated States not to exercise certain rights of sovereignty without the assent of the other members is not contrary to the liberty of the individual component States of the federation. To-day, for instance, he would characterize the Little Entente with regard to its present closer alliance, according to which the members may not perform any act of external politics without the assent of the other members, as a federation of States, but not as a federated State. The latter form does not arise until the individual members have agreed on a common constitution wherein they subject themselves expressly to the decision of the majority in all federal matters. By so doing, however, according to Pufendorf, they have ceased to be fully sovereign. From this it may be deduced in what class Pufendorf would, for example, have included the German Empire under Bismarck, or the American Union.

In the sixth chapter we find ingenious ideas concerning the meaning of sovereignty and the competency of its holder. Its essential characteristic is the non-responsibility of the sovereign to any earthly authority. He is accountable to God alone. Therefore Pufendorf holds with Grotius against Aristotle and some recent authors, that, the monarch, as sovereign, is not responsible to his people, and that the absolute power of princes is in itself not contradictory to the law of nature, since it is by no means identical with tyranny, as republicans believe. Our author none the less inclines towards a constitutionally limited monarchy. This is even superior, in his opinion, to democracy, as the tyranny of the majority of the people cannot be restricted by laws, since it may change them at its pleasure. In opposition to Hobbes he holds that the sovereign monarch is nevertheless morally bound, not only by the norms of natural law, but also by the constitution which he has agreed upon with the people, although juridically he cannot be brought to account. Wherever there exists in the State a corporation which may demand an account of him, then this corporation, and not the monarch, possesses the sovereignty.

Chapter vii treats of the different ways of acquiring sovereignty, especially in monarchies. The principal methods, election and succession, are also found in aristocracies. Besides the legitimate methods Pufendorf also discusses the illegitimate acquisition realized by force. Here he mentions not only the forcible subjection of a people by a monarch, but also the forcible deposition of a ruler by the people. In the first case the acquisition may become legalized as the result of good government if the people in question formerly lived under the constitution of a free State, or as the result of the extinction of the legitimate dynasty if the people were ruled by a monarch. Both of these instances, however, are contingent upon a certain period of undisturbed rule by the new monarch. In the second case, that of the deposition of a ruler, an agreement with the former ruler and the recognition of the new constitution is required, or conclusive evidence that the former prince has been rightfully deprived of his government, or, in fine, a long lapse of time during which the former prince has not advanced his claim.

It is not necessary, at this juncture, to enter into detail concerning Pufendorf's discussion of elective and hereditary kingship and the various kinds of succession to the throne. Only his exposition on the settlement of disputes concerning the throne is of importance, because these touch international law closely. From their very nature they cannot be decided by a national court, nor by an authoritative pronouncement of the executive power, either when the dispute concerns the relationship between the different candidates for the throne or when it concerns the relationship between the individual pretenders and the people who are to be ruled. The parties to such disputes have neither a common judge nor a common sovereign. From the standpoint of natural as well as international law there exists no other alternative than either force—that is, a war of succession—or arbitration.

Chapter viii has the title: 'On the Sanctity of Supreme Sovereignty in States'. Here Pufendorf discusses, among other things, the question of the right of resistance against gross injuries by the prince—which, with Grotius, he answers in the affirmative. A duty of obedience towards the conqueror he denies as a matter of principle, although he affirms it in case the government of the conqueror proves permanent. Chapter ix enumerates the various duties of a ruler and offers for his guidance an abundance of wise instructions. Deserving of note in our own day is Pufendorf's warning against too heavy taxation, for he holds that the most reliable treasury for the ruler is the money-safe of the citizen. At the same time he advises the rulers of the State against unequal taxation of the subjects, and against the pernicious method of imposing so-called freewill offerings on their subjects that they may gain favour by rich donations.

The eighth Book opens with the theory of legislation. Pufendorf takes issue with the doctrine of Hobbes that positive laws can never contradict natural law, for the former alone defines what is right or wrong in the specific case. According to Pufendorf the legislator is bound by those norms which, originating from God, are in conformity with human nature and reason. They really represent the standard for examining laws in order to determine whether they are in accordance with right or are contradictory to it. Thus Pufendorf would have approved the decisions of the Anglo-Saxon courts, namely that laws which, they are bound to state, violate the natural order of right and reason are not to be employed by them.¹ Also at this point he attacks the view of Macchiavelli and Hobbes, who hold that there is no law outside the State, and that the State is the sole creator of law. He propounds the question how States could have been founded if the men who sought by contract to make a transition from the state of nature to an organized government had not known beforehand that it is right to live up to contracts, and wrong to break them. And how, he asks, could one maintain, in case there be right only within the State, that the rulers do wrong in breaking treaties, or by robbing each other of their respective possessions, for do they not live among themselves in the state of nature, not bound by norms of civil law?

Furthermore, the author analyses the question which even after the World War was discussed with animation and which has resulted in a much contested decision of the German Supreme Court (Deutsches Reichsgericht). This question is whether an individual who has committed an illegal act can plead the binding command of his ruler or of his legitimate superior in order to escape punishment. Pufendorf here introduces a distinction between divine and natural law on one hand and positive civil law on the other. The command of the ruler relieves every citizen of responsibility for the violation of civil law, but not for the violation of divine and natural law. Here also Pufendorf opposes the views of Hobbes, who declares such an attitude to be seditious. Yet Pufendorf warns us against using any scruple concerning the legality of a command given by the State as a pretext for refusing obedience. In case of doubt the presumption is in favour of the legality of the commands in question. The subordinate is often not in a situation to scrutinize the reasons for the command. Moreover, Pufendorf concedes that in cases of compulsion and emergency, when the person executing the order is only a blind tool of the commander, the latter and not the former is to be held exclusively responsible for the illegal act.

In chapter ii the author describes a particular attribute of the power of the ruler: the authority to dispose of the lives of the citizens in defence of the State in war. This authority he holds to be unqualified and all-inclusive. While, according to positive law, exceptions in favour of persons who, on account of their youth, old age, vocation, or religion, are incapable of fighting have been allowed, all such exceptions become negligible when distress and extreme danger demand the exertion of the ultimate strength of the State. Pufendorf would not approve the demand of the conscientious objector to be freed as a matter of principle from war service, because, from the point of view of international law, he maintains that war is a permissible procedure for the settlement of differences between States. In regard to public law he recognizes the priority of the common welfare over the scruples of the individual.

For the same reason the author also rejects the view of Grotius that a citizen must not participate in a manifestly unjust war of his State because by doing so he would become an accomplice in the crime of his sovereign. In this case he distinguishes between voluntary and legally compulsory military service. Only under the first heading is the rule of Grotius applicable; as to the second, the citizen should follow the command of his sovereign, and with serene conscience leave to his ruler the responsibility for the war, in regard to which the latter must answer to God.

Two further remarks in this chapter are relevant for international law. The one refers to the case in which a prisoner of war is set free under the obligation not to bear arms against the enemy. In Pufendorf's opinion the State is bound to respect such an obligation on the part of a citizen and may only set it aside when the country is in the last extremities and there is a shortage of man-power. The other observation concerns the institution of hostages in international law. The author thinks that the State is authorized to surrender its citizens as hostages to the enemy, and that even their lives may be sacrificed when they cannot be saved without jeopardizing the existence of the State.

The third chapter treats of the punitive power of the State, which includes the power of life and death over the citizen. Pufendorf considers the question how it is possible that individuals, who in the state of nature have no right to punish, can transfer such a right to the sovereign when organizing a State. Pufendorf here takes recourse to analogies, for he was not aware that vengeance, a form of natural law, together with damages, assumes the function of punishment outside the State. The essence of punishment our author sees in retribution whereby a malum passionis is inflicted on account of a malum actionis. At the same time he requires that such punishment should be of advantage to human society. Here he follows the opinion of Plato, Grotius, and Hobbes. The true purpose of punishment is the prevention of future crime, either by reforming the evil-doer, or preventing him from committing further crime, or discouraging him from such activities, in order that his punishment may restrain others from similar acts. Here we are facing an eclectic theory of punishment which, we may say, contains all the elements of the modern doctrine of legal punishment, with the exception of the most recent doctrine of the so-called criminology that there is no question of right to punishment but only of securing and safeguarding society against anti-social misfits.

This point of view the author admits only with regard to pirates and highway robbers. With such persons, he observes, society lives in a state of war. It is not the question of punishment, but of rendering them innocuous. Everybody has a right to combat them. It is, however, advisable that private persons who, with their ships, wish to engage in a battle against pirates, should obtain from their superiors a written commission to this effect.

With considerable emphasis Pufendorf pronounces against too frequently and too easily granted pardons and amnesties, for they weaken the respect of the citizen for the penal law. Above all he warns us against granting to the judge in whatsoever form a right to substitute the pardoning power for justice. But where extenuating circumstances are in evidence he considers it a wise policy to leave to the judge a wide discretion as to the measure of punishment. This being the case he takes his stand against the talion, which he declares to be unsuitable as a standard for punishment. Under no circumstances is it permissible, for purposes of retribution, to direct the punishment against any other person than the perpetrator, even though—as Grotius had argued in defence of such a measure—by so doing the mere material aim of inflicting a punishment is attained, as, for example, in the process of the so-called decimation.

In the fourth chapter our author, analysing the power of the sovereign to determine the positions of honour for the citizens of the State, brings together a great many observations on ordinary civic honour and how it may be lost, and likewise on the special honour of privileged classes and its origin, particularly nobility, its historical development and position in European countries, and other matters. Simple human honour, according to Pufendorf, is an accompaniment of the state of nature, while specific honour and nobility are creations of the sovereign power. Comparing the various degrees of honour, he takes up the questions of precedence, which in his century played such an important part in the intercourse of the nations that for that reason the treaty transactions which were to conclude the Thirty Years' War had to be carried out at two different places, Münster and Osnabrück, because only thus could conflicts of precedence be avoided. Pufendorf denies any gradation in the position of dignity of the various rulers of States. Every sovereignty, as a matter of principle, is equal to every other. It makes no difference whether the territory of one ruler is larger or his power greater than that of another, or whether the one be an absolute ruler and the other a monarch limited by the constitution of the country. From such considerations no king is held to yield superiority to another. Similarly no republic is of lesser dignity than another, even if the latter be older or more powerful. The author even denies that the monarchic State ranks above a republic. Neither are the ambassadors of a republic under obligation to defer to the ambassadors of a monarchy. But at conferences with delegates of republics monarchs enjoy precedence because they are the incarnation of sovereignty, while the delegates are only representatives of the sovereign proper. In order to preclude disputes as to precedence at conferences when several persons of equal rank participate, the round table system (mensae circulares adhibitae congressibus) may be employed. In permanent associations with regularly recurrent assemblies it is the practice to define precedence according to the sequence of admission to the association. This method is still in force for the diplomatic corps in a capital. Pufendorf energetically denies the claim of a secular power to precedence before the other nations, on the ground that it was the first nation to embrace Christianity. This order of priority he would permit only in ecclesiastical synods where it was in use in the olden time. It is worthy of note that Pufendorf is not at all an advocate of hereditary nobility. According to him this privilege of nobility is always based anew on the worthy deeds of each individual—noblesse oblige.

The fifth chapter treats of the sovereignty of the State in matters of taxation and expropriation, of the right to public property and State domains, as well as of the right to cede the territory of the State or parts of it. As to the latter question, the author denies to the sovereign the right to dispose of his dominion without the consent of the people. If he wants to cede a part of the territory, he needs for this purpose the consent not only of the remainder of the people, but, above all, of that part of the population which would be ceded with the territory. Pufendorf establishes here the basic principles of that procedure in international law which at a later date has been much employed under the name of plebiscite. The sovereign, according to him, also requires the consent of the people for placing any burden on the State or weakening its international rights. This applies, for instance, when he wants to hold the State in fief from a more powerful ruler or desires to release a vassal from vassalage. The same situation obtains when a ruler wishes to surrender a part of his territory to another ruler as security for indebtedness.

With chapter vi begins the part of the treatise that bears exclusively on international law. Here original thought is at the lowest ebb. Pufendorf moves to a great extent in the wake of Grotius, the great master of international law, and accepts the results which the latter had attained in his investigations of this matter. But here also Pufendorf marks his opposition to Hobbes by setting forth his conviction that even in the relationship of the States the natural condition is, as in the case of individuals, that of peace and not of war. Therefore, in order to justify war according to the law of nature, a just cause is required. Of such causes there are three kinds. The first is this: that we are free to defend ourselves and our possessions against the attacks of others; the second is based on the right to obtain by force the settlement of rightful claims which the debtor is not inclined to meet; the third consists in our right to compel the party which has unjustly injured us to pay an indemnification and offer security for the future. But never is the mere fear of future injury sufficient to warrant a preventive war, since only a positive violation of right offers grounds for rushing to arms, and not merely the threatening position which a State holds. Just as with human beings, a State is to be considered as righteous and peace-loving until the contrary is proved. It is obvious that it is a long way from the doctrines of Grotius to the Briand-Kellogg pact. This pact, even though it concedes the legality of a defensive war, nevertheless leaves no room for a war waged in order to compel the settlement of obligations arising from treaties or delicts. Since there exists no international machinery which substitutes for every individual action against a malicious debtor State compulsory action on the part of the international community of States, and since there is little hope of creating such machinery in the near future, in my opinion Pufendorf's doctrine is still in harmony with the international law of our day. Pufendorf, moreover, teaches that according to natural and international law the State as well as the individual has to exhaust all peaceable means before force may be employed for enforcing just claims.

On the other hand, Pufendorf is aware that the actual waging of a justly undertaken war is not to be judged according to notions of civil law justice. Those engaged in such a war are under no obligation to inflict on the enemy only such disadvantages or wrest from him only such advantages as correspond exactly to the claims causing the war. Measures of war are not in the nature of punishment; they have no punitive aim; they are State acts for self-defence, for the realization of right, and for ensuring safety against future unlawful injury. All means serving these purposes are, to that extent, justified. At this point the author goes beyond Grotius. He recommends, however, that the conqueror show himself humane and generous towards the vanquished. This attitude, he thinks, is dictated by ethical considerations. The measure of retaliation that would be fair in civil relations should not be exceeded further than is necessary.

Of special interest are the views of the author bearing on the case in which a State has undertaken a war, not in its own interest, but for another State. In this case two conditions must be fulfilled in order that the war be just. The State which is being assisted must have a just cause of war against its enemy, and the intervening State must appear authorized to take such action by a special relationship which entitles it to treat the enemy of the assisted State as being also its own enemy. A war of intervention may under certain circumstances be not only permissible but obligatory. A State is not only permitted but in certain circumstances is in duty bound to intervene, as when the defence of protected States is involved. Here, however, Pufendorf admits an exception. Neither the right nor the duty to undertake a war of intervention is in evidence when the protected State has given to its enemy just provocation for war before entering into the relationship of a protectorate. The duty of protection towards the individual citizens of the State comprises also the right to guard their interests when these are violated by another State. For this purpose all means, even warlike measures, are in order. This duty arises only when such a procedure does not threaten the interests of the majority of the citizens and of the commonwealth.

A duty to undertake a war of intervention may be also based on treaties of alliance. This obligation, however, ceases, according to Pufendorf, if the State which is obligated to render such assistance is not able to render it without jeopardizing the defence of its own people. Therefore, only an inept statesman will rely on an alliance which the other party has no interest in observing. Nor is it a duty to intervene when the ally undertakes an unjust war. Modern treaties of alliance, as a rule, lay down this principle in such a way that the alliance is effective 'only in case of an unprovoked attack by a third party'. Our author is not inclined to recognize a universal right of the States to render armed assistance to a State which is unjustly attacked. As a rule, he thinks, at least a request on the part of the attacked State for military assistance must have been made beforehand. Pufendorf unequivocally condemns the attitude of a State not involved in the war which presumes to act as judge with reference to the controversies of other States. This is opposed to the equality of the States in natural law, and would distract the world with two wars instead of one. Such a procedure is likely to result in the war of all against all, since no State is absolutely free from the guilt of unjust acts.

In the sixth chapter the author discusses also the question: under what circumstances, as an exception, has the individual citizen of the State the right to wage war—a right which in the state of nature is common to all individuals, while in the organized State it belongs exclusively to the supreme power. The chief case in which an exception can occur is when a citizen of one State injures a citizen of another on a territory which belongs to no State. Under these circumstances, according to Pufendorf, the person injured may deal with the violator in accordance with the law of war. Such circumstances obtained from the time of Pufendorf up to the World War on the group of islands called Spitzbergen, where, as the result of lack of authorities with power to punish, whalers, fishers, and hunters used to engage in skirmishes. The powers interested in this group of islands made an attempt to remedy the situation through the Spitzbergen Conference of 1914. Following Grotius, Pufendorf moreover deals with the difference between formal and informal wars, with the characteristics of civil war and insurrection, and with the authority of government officials, under certain circumstances, to undertake warlike activities before these are ordained by the sovereign. Finally, Pufendorf considers the responsibility of a State for the delicts of its citizens. The State's responsibility for such acts with respect to foreign countries Pufendorf admits only in the case in which the State could have prevented the delict, or when it shields the perpetrator afterwards. (Cf. the dispute between Switzerland and Soviet Russia concerning the assassination of the Russian delegate Vorovsky at Lausanne, and the acquittal of the defendant by the Swiss court.) In conclusion the chapter refers to the law concerning booty and the acquisition of territory by conquest. As Pufendorf's own addition to this subject we must mention the detailed discussion of a special case of international law from Greek history which was arbitrated before the Amphictyonic Council. Alexander the Great, after conquering Thebes, had released the Thessalians, his allies, from a loan they had previously obtained from the Thebans. But the latter, after their State had been reorganized by Cassander, Alexander's successor, nevertheless demanded payment from the Thessalians. Pufendorf discusses in this case the right to booty as it applies to incorporeal things, and sets forth at length the view that the demand of the Thebans was not well founded. Such a right to booty was exercised to the fullest extent during the World War by the belligerents, and was confirmed for the victors in the treaties of peace. Many of these cases later on became the subject of proceedings before mixed courts of arbitration.

The seventh chapter is concerned with agreements made with the enemy, either during war or with reference to war. Here also Pufendorf follows closely the views expounded by Grotius; but from the outset he queries the latter's principle that all such agreements must be observed. He distinguishes between agreements which aim at peace and those which presuppose the continuance of war. The latter class, in his opinion, lacks binding force, since a contract, he argues, requires confidence between the contracting parties, while war has introduced between the enemies an element of force and stratagem. Thus a legal duty to live up to such arrangements is out of the question, and the only important factor to be considered in connexion with these arrangements is that of expediency, since an enemy who has become embittered by the violation of such engagement will be more dangerous than one with whom faith has been kept. Pufendorf doubts, moreover, whether such agreements, the aim of which is to mitigate the severity of the war, are not contrary to the purpose of war. He considers, indeed, that they might tend to prolong war; but notwithstanding this he has to admit that the civilized nations recognize the obligatory force of war treaties in the interest of a chivalrous conduct of war.

The principal instance of such a treaty is that of the armistice. What Pufendorf has to say in this connexion is taken exclusively from the work of Grotius, as is also true concerning his discussion of the other kinds of treaties and of the question to what extent military commanders or individuals may conclude such agreements.

In chapter viii the author proceeds to treaties of peace. He acknowledges that Grotius has so fully covered this field that there is little left for him to glean. To this phase of the subject, however, belongs the weighty question whether a vanquished nation may contest the treaty of peace on the ground that compulsion has been exercised in connexion with it. Grotius answers this question entirely in the negative as regards formal wars, appealing to the customary law of nations. Pufendorf doubts whether such customary law is valid in relation to a treaty of peace which the victor in an unjust war has imposed on his adversary, unless both parties, without attempting an amicable settlement, have rushed to arms and thus left the final decision of their contest to the fortunes of war.

The ninth chapter enumerates the various kinds of public treaties. They are divided into two main categories: those which simply restate the mutual obligations of the States under natural law, and those which define or supplement such obligations. To the first class belong simple treaties of amity which contain only the promise of the parties not to injure each other. The second category is subdivided into equal and unequal public treaties. Both may have the same objects, i.e. commercial relations, joint conduct of war, the furnishing of auxiliary troops in case of war, &c. If the contracting parties mutually stipulate equal or equivalent performances, for instance, the furnishing of the same contingent of auxiliary troops, or the neutralization of the co-terminous frontier territory, then the public treaty is equal; if the performance varies according to the ability of the partners, so that one party is in an inferior position, then the treaty is unequal. As an example of an unequal treaty the author cites that concluded between Rome and Carthage after the Second Punic War. By this Carthage obligated herself not to wage any war without the assent of Rome. Treaties of this description are not only unequal, but also deprive the party placed at a disadvantage of a portion of its sovereignty, although this is not the case with a mere obligation for war indemnity. From this point of view Pufendorf would consider the treaty status of Germany in the League of Nations not only as unequal but also as one of diminished sovereignty so long as the regulations of the Treaty of Versailles concerning the one-sided neutralization of the Rhine boundary and one-sided disarmament have not been brought into conformity with the principle of equal rights.

Furthermore, the author distinguishes between personal and real treaties. The first mentioned are valid only as regards the person and the duration of life of the sovereign who contracts them; the others are valid as regards the States whose heads these sovereigns are. Treaties between republics invariably belong to the latter category unless a change in the form of the State occurs. Treaties between princes are to be interpreted in one or the other sense according to their aim and subject-matter. This rule, which had been established by Grotius, Pufendorf supports and supplements with casuistic arguments. Among some special problems of international law regarding State treaties, the author here formulates the question whether treaties of limited duration are to be considered as tacitly prolonged after the lapse of the time specified. He answers in the negative, and denies moreover that actions of the contracting parties in accordance with the treaty after the lapse of time specified may per se be construed into a prolongation of the treaty. In point of fact the relationship of amity which is grounded in natural law remains even after the expiration of the positive treaty. In concluding, Pufendorf acquaints the reader with the distinction between the agreements of ambassadors and the public treaties of sovereigns; and incidentally the concept of ratification is discussed.

In the tenth chapter our author tabulates a great many historical examples of various treaties entered into between sovereigns as such, or between sovereigns and their subjects. He discusses the question of the extent to which the rulers thereby obligate themselves and their successors, and especially whether their subjects may base a lawsuit against them on these treaties.

The eleventh chapter treats of the loss of nationality. This does not occur when a ruler dies without leaving an heir to the throne. The result in this case is merely that the relationship of allegiance towards the sovereign disappears; but there is no return to the original freedom of the natural state, as was the accepted doctrine at that time; on the contrary, the citizens remain, during the interregnum, bound by their original compact. Nationality is lost through emigration. It is to be judged from the positive laws of each State whether and to what extent liberty of emigration and immigration exists. Speaking from the standpoint of natural law, Pufendorf is in favour of this liberty. He even argues against the view of Grotius to the effect that mass emigration is not permitted by natural law because it is in opposition to the purpose of the civil community. Pufendorf replies that what is permitted to an individual cannot be forbidden to a group; and since the State has no right to detain an individual against his will, it is of no consequence whether the departure of a greater number will entail a weakening of its force.

On the other hand, no State is free arbitrarily to banish its citizens. A citizen may be deprived of his citizenship and banished from the State against his will only if he is convicted of a crime against the State. Territorial changes, due to warlike conquest or to public treaties of cession, may occasionally result in a forced change of nationality, in order to avoid a threat of war. Lastly, a State is free to surrender one of its citizens to a foreign State for punishment if the citizen has insulted or injured the foreign State. In this case, if the injured State accepts the person in question, a change of his nationality ensues.

In the twelfth and last chapter, changes in the form of the State and the dissolution of States are discussed. Pufendorf starts with the principle that a change in the form of the State does not terminate the State itself, and consequently its obligations under international law remain unaffected. He denies that a republican government may refuse to honour the treaty obligations which an absolute monarch has entered into for his own interest and not the good of the people, for 'even if the head be sick, it still remains the head' and thus rightly governs the body. Pufendorf would not have countenanced the repudiation by the Soviet régime of the debts of the czarist State.

But we face a change of the State itself when it splits into several States, or combines with another, or is annexed as a province by another State. Pufendorf analyses the consequences of such a change with reference to constitutional and international law, partly in harmony with, and partly in opposition to, the views of Grotius. For the international law of our own day no great profit may be gleaned from these rather academic and philosophical discussions. Here it suffices to point to the doctrine that upon the partition of a State its assets and liabilities must pass in due proportion to the new States, provided no special agreement is entered into concerning this point, as was the case recently in connexion with the division of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy.

Finally, with reference to the complete dissolution of a State, the author deals more with the philosophic than with the international phase of the question. The latter he adapts once more from the work of Grotius. We are surprised to find in the examples which he himself adduces no allusion to the fate of the Jewish people, in whose history the entire dissolution of a State is most impressively given. Pufendorf is content to emphasize the theory that a State by mere territorial change does not suffer extinction as long as it preserves its unity and independence. To support this thesis he could have cited the migrations of the Germanic peoples.

The present summary of Pufendorf's great work is based on the last edition which appeared during the author's life, and which he himself revised and introduced with a special preface. It bears the title: 'Samuelis Pufendorfii de Jure Naturae et Gentium Libri Octo. / Editio nova, auctior multo, et emendatior. / Cum Gratia et Privilegio Sacrae Caesareae Majestatis et Serenissimi Electoris Saxoniae. / Francofurti ad Moenum, Sumptibus Friderici Knochii, Typis Joannis Wustii. / Anno MDCXCIV' (1694). The copy before me is from the Library of the Reichsjustizministerium; it comprises eighteen preliminary pages including the title and preface, and 1,344 pages of text, followed by a table of contents and index covering seventeen pages. It is adorned with a frontispiece which under the portrait of the author bears the distich:

Ista Pufendorfi facies; sed nobile si vis
Ingenium penitus noscere, scripta lege.

The first edition of the work was published, as previously mentioned, in Lund (Londini Scanorum, Sumtibus Adami Junghans, imprimebat Vitus Haberegger) in the year 1672. Copies of this edition are to be found in the libraries of the Reichsgericht, University of Basel, University of Frankfort, University of Heidelberg, University of Jena, University of Lund, Brown University, Columbia University, and the Boston Public Library. Of other editions which were accessible to me or with which I have become acquainted, I enumerate the following:

1. Edition of 1684, enlarged and revised; published at Frankfort (copies in the State Library of Bavaria, the Library of the Reichsgericht, and the libraries of the University of Basel, the University of Lund, and Brown University).

2. Edition of 1688, published at Amsterdam (copies in the libraries of the British Museum, Brown University, Columbia University).

3. Edition of 1692, published at Lund (a copy is in the library of the University of Leipzig).

4. Edition of 1694, published at Frankfort (copies in the libraries of the University of Basel, the University of Rostock, and the Library of Congress).

5. Edition of 1698, published at Amsterdam (copies in the libraries of the Harvard Law School, the U.S. Department of State, and in the Library of Congress).

6. Edition of 1699, published at Frankfort (copies in the State Library, Berlin, and the library of the University of Greifswald).

7. Edition of 1704, published at Amsterdam (copies in the libraries of Brown University, the Harvard Law School, and the University of Michigan Law School).

8. An edition of 1706, with a commentary by Johann Nikolaus Hertz (Hertius) with Eris Scandica, published at Frankfort (copies in the libraries of the University of Leipzig, the University of Lund, the Carnegie Endowment, and the Library of Congress).

9. A new edition with commentary by Hertius published at Amsterdam in 1715 (copies in the libraries of the British Museum, the Harvard Law School, and the Library of Congress).

10. Edition of 1716, published at Frankfort (copies in the Library of Congress, and the U.S. State Department Library).

11. Edition of 1744, published at Frankfort and Leipzig: 'cum commentationibus Hertii et Jo. Barbeyraci. Accedit Eris Scandica qua adversus Libros de jure naturali et gentium objecta diluuntur. Recensuit et animadversionibus illustravit G. Mascovius.' 2 vols. (Copies in the libraries of the British Museum, University of Cologne, University of Leipzig, University of Michigan Law School, Carnegie Endowment, U.S. Department of State, and in the Library of Congress.)

12. Edition of 1744, published at Lausanne (copy in the library of Brown University).

13. Edition of 1759, 2 vols., published at Frankfort and Leipzig (copies in the libraries of the University of Lund, Brown University, Columbia University, Harvard Law School, University of Michigan Law School, U.S. Department of State, and the Library of Congress).

A comparison between the main work and the two other works of Pufendorf already published in this series yields the following results:

The first book of the main work corresponds to Definitions 1, 2, 15, 16, 17, 18, and axiom 1 of the Elementa, as well as to chapter i of Book I of De Officio; Book II corresponds to Definitions 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and observations 4 and 5 of the Elementa, and to chapters ii, iii, iv, and v of the first Book, as well as to chapter i of the second book of the De Officio; Book III corresponds to Definitions 20 and 21 of the Elementa, and to chapters v, vi, vii, viii, and ix of the first book of De Officio; Book IV corresponds to chapters x, xi, xii, and xiii of Book I of De Officio; Book V to Definitions 9 and 10 of the Elementa, and to chapters xiv, xv, xvi, and xvii of Book I of De Officio; Book VI to chapters ii, iii, and iv of Book II of De Officio; Book VII to chapters v–xi of the second book of De Officio; Book VIII to Definition 9 of the Elementa, and chapters xii–xvii of Book II of De Officio. By comparing the chapters of the main treatise with those of the book De Officio—and with the help of Professor Schücking's introduction to the tenth number of the Classics, which points out in each instance to what chapter of Hugo Grotius's De Jure Belli ac Pacis the chapters of the De Officio correspond—the reader may without much trouble ascertain to what extent the individual parts of the system of Pufendorf are congruent with the main work of his great predecessor. I have therefore refrained from further burdening this introduction with a detailed enumeration on this point.

TRANSLATORS' PREFACE

THE translation of the De Jure Naturae et Gentium by Baron Samuel Pufendorf has been made from the one-volume Amsterdam edition of 1688.¹ The translations by Jean Barbeyrac into French (in the edition of Leyden, 1759) and by Basil Kennett into English (London, 1710 and 1717) have been consulted from time to time.

The work presents certain difficulties in style and in format which call for some explanation. Of the former Kennett remarks in his Preface: 'The Commendation of our Author's Judgment hath scarce been more universal, than the Censure of his Composition; which though, by All, acknowledg'd to be expressive, yet to most appears so difficult and discouraging, that they sometimes fancy the Sense to have broken its way through the Phrase, and to have left these Irregularities, as the Token of its Violence.' It has seemed desirable to preserve not only the thought, but, to a certain degree, also the style of Pufendorf, which, for all its intricacies and obscurities, has a certain flavour of the author's personality and age that ought not to be entirely lost, as is frequently the case in the extremely free paraphrases of which Barbeyrac and Kennett generally avail themselves.

As to format, the references which Pufendorf gathered from almost every field of literature, he incorporated into the body of the text. These might have been relegated to notes, as has been done by Barbeyrac and Kennett, but in many cases they form an integral part of the argument, while such a removal would have produced an erroneous impression of the author's style, and at the same time made it much more difficult to refer quickly from the translation to the original.

With but a few necessary exceptions the references to other works have been left in the Latin as Pufendorf gave them. In the Index of Authors and Works Cited the Latin abbreviations have been modernized and standardized, and the titles of many of the most familiar works given in English.

In the matter of quotations from other works Pufendorf often took considerable liberties with the text, in omitting words and phrases at will, and sometimes whole sentences, as well as changing the word order. But he was apparently most scrupulous in not modifying the actual views expressed by his authorities. The question arose whether the translators should reproduce Pufendorf's Latin translation of, let us say, Plato's original Greek, or translate the Greek of Plato directly. The latter seemed to be on the whole the proper course to follow, especially with the most famous works, although, of course, no matter has been introduced which was not in Pufendorf, and all really noteworthy deviations have been recorded. For the more important authors quoted and the longer passages, standard translations have been used and the source acknowledged by giving the initial of the translator in parentheses immediately after the quotation. A list of these translations is given on p. 1369. All of Pufendorf's direct quotations from other authors have been verified, wherever the work in question was accessible, and in case of error the correct reference is given in brackets.

The voluminous and frequently very helpful notes of Barbeyrac on Pufendorf may be found by English readers for the most part in the 1717 edition of the translation of Kennett.

The bold-face figures inserted in the margin of the text indicate the beginnings of pages of the edition of 1688, which has been photographically reproduced.

TO THE SECOND EDITION

TO THE GENTLE READER, GREETINGS:

You have here the second edition of our work On the Law of Nature and Nations, enlarged by more than one-fourth with the addition here and there of material which served either to round out the study or to throw light on it. It had been my intention also to insert such objections as had been raised by certain men to one passage or another, as well as my replies to them. But my friends opposed this, for the reason that to insert such things as had for the most part been suggested to malevolent minds by stolidity or a passion to calumniate me, would not only break the unity of my work but defile it as well. Such as I have opposed have been treated more as they deserved than as would have accorded with my nature.

There still remain not a few things which could have served to adorn this study, and which might make our work much more comprehensive; but my mind is made up to add to it not another word, lest I be responsible for lovers of these studies going to useless expense in purchasing several volumes of different editions. But if God prolongs my life and permits me in the midst of other occupations to devote occasional hours to this study, I am resolved to add some appendices to certain sections and to elaborate such as still appear to require it. For in addition to the fact that there circulate on every hand false views upon this subject, the refutation of which is in the interest of truth, there remains more than one topic for study, which, when properly set forth, would be suited to add especial lustre to it, and to place its worth and true value in a clear light. Thus every one knows that most of the material in the books of the Roman Law concerns the subject of the Law of Nature and Nations, that is, the law which obligates all men and nations; but there is interspersed with it much that is positive, and of application to the special nature of the Roman state. If these two elements have not been carefully separated, any knowledge of law proceeding therefrom cannot avoid being confused, unstable, and fraught with idle controversies. Therefore, it would, in my judgement, be well worth while to make a concise index to the books of the Roman Law, which would determine what matters therein concern natural law, and what positive law, and whether the bounds are drawn carefully enough between Natural, or universal, Law, and Roman Law properly so called, or that peculiar to the Roman state.

So also for many years I contemplated a Commentary on Greek Politics, but up to the present other more necessary undertakings have prevented it. I had planned to present therein the political theories of Greek writers, especially of Plato and Aristotle, which later passed over into Roman authors and also into the schools and writers of our generation, and in which are found not a little that is absurd and erroneous, and some things that are liable to give rise in states to tumults and revolutions. Such a work might very well have been cast in the teeth of those, who, in their defence of the authority of the tottering Aristotle, are said still to enter conspiracies on the order of Catiline's, save that in binding their brothers with the sacred oath they no longer pass around the blood-mixed cup but mugs of beer turbid with dregs. It would also have been a valuable undertaking to inquire whether anything more finished and sublime than our own moral teachings is to be found in the writings of the Stoics, of Seneca, Epic-tetus, and Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius]. And especially, whether at all, and if so, how far, the Christian Moral Theology rises above the common rules of duty as laid down in Natural Law.

Finally, since the acts of supreme sovereigns and of independent states often seem to deviate from the rules of duty which private individuals have to observe in their dealings with one another, it would not be out of place to inquire whether at all, and if so, how far, supreme sovereigns are exempt from the rules of private Law, and how far those acts can be approved, which are commonly said to be done 'for reasons of state',¹ and fall among the French under the phrase Coups d'État. If any one undertakes a study of this subject, he will realize the need of no little native wit as well as a knowledge of civil affairs. But whether we will have enough leisure to discuss these subjects, the mist beclouding the future does not allow us to promise. And perhaps there will be found some one with more leisure, who will set forth these matters in a worthy manner and relieve us of that task. Meanwhile, just as my single purpose is to offer some work of use to the public in keeping with my feeble ability, so in all modesty I ask of You, Gentle Reader, your favour against the bitings of ill-will.

Farewell.

TO THE GENTLE READER, THE BEST OF GREETINGS,

IF I had sufficient confidence in my native ability or industry, it would be idle for me to muster reasons why I too have devoted my efforts to the study and adornment of a most noble and useful branch of learning, which, long neglected and practically ignored, has in our day finally begun to lay claim to its own dignity--since to merit the well wishes of mankind is considered by all men a sufficient justification. But since the writers who were the first to shed light upon this subject are accorded such universal fame, it will not be out of the way to set forth the reasons for this undertaking of mine, in order that I may not appear to be repeating what has already been said, or to be striving for an unworthy comparison with the monumental works of men of such outstanding reputation. And first of all, because once, when I was still a young man, I undertook to publish some *Elements*¹ of this branch of learning, not so much out of temerity, or from a lack of respect for this learned generation, as that they who wished me well at that time might have some sort of specimen of what I was capable, from which they could find an occasion for commendation—and most men excused my Elements in consideration of the immaturity of my age and effort—it seemed highly fitting that I should by a more mature work publicly apologize, as it were, for the immaturity of the first. This consideration alone gives the open lie to the remarks of a certain scoundrelly sycophant, which he has published abroad against that dissertation in a slanderous work. Although worthy men have before now confuted that calumny of their own accord also in published works, while I for my part never thought it fitting to accord that man the recognition which an answer would have implied.

But there was a further reason which had power to impel me to some undertaking along this line of study: When THE MOST SERENE ELECTOR PALATINE most graciously called me to the chair of this discipline in the University of Heidelberg, and commanded me to be the first to take the title of Professor of this branch of learning (and others have apparently followed his example, in introducing into their Universities a Professorship of the Law of Nature and Nations), it became my first and necessary task to make some contribution to the study of that subject, which had taken its place on the public platform with me as its first exponent. Now the subject was still able to supply matter which called for no less native endowment than industry, and there was not merely left in this field the σωματοποιεῖν [organization] of the opinions of each and every learned man: derived, no doubt, from the dictum of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. V, chap. x [120]: 'Every kind of argument was made before any instruction was given respecting them; and writers afterwards published the forms of them when they were observed and collected.' Indeed, it has been believed not unjustly that first place has thus far been held by Hugo Grotius, who was apparently the first to call his generation to the consideration of that study, and was also so grounded in it, that in a large part of the field he has left all others nothing further than the task of gleaning after him. But, however much we cherish the fame of that man, so much so that we have been accorded the special designation of his 'Son', it must after all be acknowledged that he has entirely omitted not a few matters, some he has accorded but a passing touch, and introduced some other matters, which prove that after all even he was only a man.

Especially do those cast no slight aspersion upon a most noble work, in whose eyes it often departs from the accepted teachings of the orthodox Church. Now to present some new doctrine in religion has always struck me as a most unhappy undertaking of great intellect, since there is such a mass of other matters in which any man can without risk deceive the most wary.¹ And it is by such methods that the authority of true and useful discoveries is disparaged, and that the sharpest censures are called forth from a host of critics, who were otherwise unworthy even to open their mouths in the presence of such men. Certain learned men have, indeed, essayed to remedy these defects by editing the books of his De Jure Belli et Pacis with notes, and one or two of these commentators have rendered a service that is not to be scorned. Yet others have felt that it would be far more useful to lay all that material a second time on the anvil, and to reshape it into a different form.

So also Thomas Hobbes, in his works on the science of civil government, has a great deal that is of the highest value, and no one who understands such matters would deny that he has so thoroughly explored the structure of human and civil society, that few before his time can in this field be compared with him. And even where he goes astray, he still causes a man to think about matters, which, in all probability, would otherwise never have occurred to him. And yet by virtue of the abominable theories, which he has elaborated in the field of religion, and are peculiar to himself, he has turned many against him, and this not without reason; although you may see it happen often enough that he is censured with the greatest scorn by those who have read and understood him the least.

John Selden might possibly have held a position second to none, if he had set himself to apply the law of nature to all mankind with the same ἀκρίβεια [precision] as he did to the traditions of the Hebrews; or if the decisions of a single nation could have been regarded a sufficient proclamation of a law that would obligate all nations.

Moved, therefore, by these considerations I have put my hand to this task, and arranged all this material in that order which appeared to me the most suitable; and I have endeavoured to establish all my contentions with substantial and lucid reasons, in so far as that was possible, and to avoid those errors into which writers of repute before my time had fallen; in all this bearing in mind the words of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XII, chap. xi [27-8], 'If men had been inclined to think that no one could surpass the man who had hitherto been the best, those who are now accounted best would never have distinguished themselves. And although there is no hope of excelling, it is yet a great honour to follow closely behind.' In general, although I have restored in good faith to all from whom I had learned any point touching this subject, what was his own, since 'it is the mark of a generous heart and one that is characterized by frankness and modesty to acknowledge one's indebtedness to other men', but 'of an abject heart and perverted mind to prefer to be caught in the act rather than acknowledge a debt',¹ still, in a subject of this nature where reason reigns by its own right, no man's authority could possibly appear so great in my eyes but that I preferred to embrace that to which the weightier considerations led. And so I have not the slightest fear that offence will be taken by learned men who are still alive, and especially by my fellow countrymen, because of the fact that not infrequently I have gone counter to their views, yet in a modest spirit, and without any intent to belittle them, and never without balancing off reason against reason. Accordingly, that which I have claimed for myself against others, I freely grant others as well against my own views. For I do not acknowledge any association with that type of men who immediately burst out into imprecations and rage, if all their utterances are not revered as though they had been delivered from the oracular tripod, or who do not hesitate to thunder with intolerable arrogance that they acknowledge no errors.

And yet I would not fear to proclaim, now that HIS ROYAL MAJESTY has most graciously judged this work worthy of his approval, that I tremble before the authority of no other censor. And to those who are moved either by an arrogance joined with ignorance, or by a sort of carping πολυπραγμοσύνη [meddlesomeness], to criticize such works upon this subject, the best reply would be to repeat the old proverb: Let the cobbler stick to his last. If any others would undertake to criticize, let them know that in dealing with me they must use nothing but reasons. For not even if some of those who have been called to elucidate Holy Writ have undertaken to decide some of the questions which properly belong to this field of study, have such questions, for that reason alone, been able to pass into articles of faith; nor ought their final decision to be closed to sane reason; nor is it proper for such men to lay claim to a greater authority in such matters than belongs to those who make a profession of this study. Nor, indeed, need we, in the discussion of this subject, any more flee from or fear the opprobrium of novelty, provided sound reason grants its favour, than need those, who in our generation have, to their immortal glory, cast light upon medicine, natural science, and mathematics by discoveries of what was unknown before their day. Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. III, chap. vi [65]: 'Longer perseverance in study would be superfluous, if we were not at liberty to find out something better than what was advanced before.' (W.) Idem, Bk. VIII, chap. vi [32]: 'But now, as if everything that was possible in that way had been accomplished, we do not dare to produce a new word, though many that were formed by the ancients are daily falling out of use.' Add Bacon of Verulam, Cogitata et Visa, pp. 581-2,¹ and Novum Organum, Bk. I, chap. lxxxix, where he gives the reason why 'respecting increases and new fields, as it were, of philosophy, the whole subject is fraught with base suspicions and impotent dislike from the side of religion'.

Although that I have not detracted from the honour due to antiquity is clear from the way in which on every occasion I prefer to cite the ancient authors to witness to my theses. To add to them by calling in a cloud of more recent writers seemed superfluous. The reason why, especially, I have excluded from my work those writers, who, among the followers of the Roman sect, have undertaken to direct to their liking the customs and consciences of men, and whom even Grotius and others² like to call to their side in such great numbers, will be patent, I fancy, to all men of judgement. It is this: Those men as a general thing lay down no fixed foundation or hypothesis for their traditions, but, in addition to what they habitually borrow from the Jurisconsults, just as they are content for the most part to establish idle contentions with equally idle and trivial logic-chopping, and in general hold it a great accomplishment to have adduced whole legions of writers of their sect—to know one of whom is to know them all³—so they all devote futile labour to utter trifles—with the result, however, that there is scarcely any question on which they do not break up into factions. The hidden reason for this condition is that, inasmuch as it is one of the pillars of their sacred Commonwealth for the consciences of men to be directed not by reason but by the authority of priests, these should always have ready at hand a cloud of authorities which is capable of supporting any view whatsoever, according as it is to their interest for any man to be persuaded. And therefore we feel that they deserve very ill of the commonweal, who, in the full brilliance of the solid sciences, still strive to guide the youth to such persistent follies, which are the offspring as well as the mainstay of the kingdom of darkness. Nay, he makes poor use of his time, yokes foxes to the plough and milks he-goats,¹ who puts himself out to list their views on one side or the other and reconcile them with sound reason.

But I have felt it fitting also to point out that I have made the basis of all natural law the social life of man, because I have found no other principle, which all men could be brought to admit, without violation of their natural condition, and with due respect to whatever belief they might hold on matters of religion. Nor does it appear, that, when such a foundation is laid, the bounds of this study will be made any more narrow than is proper, although this is the burden of the Introduction of a certain important work. It is true, there is the saying, 'Natural law is older than society'. Yet, not to mention the fact that it is not inconsistent for an obligation to lie upon a person before the existence of the object towards which it can be exercised, there is the word of God, spoken as soon as the first man was created: 'It is not good for man to be alone.' There are, of course, also duties or 'virtues directed towards God, as well as those of every man towards himself'. But since, in so far as religion touches the study of natural law, it is limited within the sphere of this life, it can upon that score be referred to social life, in so far as this last furnishes the most effective bond for the associations of men. And such things as a man should observe in relation to himself, make him all the better adapted to society.

But the nature of that 'uprightness and innocence of manners which should be observed everywhere and even outside the bounds of society', that is, without consideration of its relation to other men, I have been unable to comprehend. The further statement: 'The formation of society and the application of means to it are left to the choice of nature, and for that reason if the law of nature were only that of society, it would be merely voluntary, arbitrary, and changeable,' is nonsense. For the nature of man has ever been determined by God for social life in general, but it was left to the choice of men to establish and enter particular societies under the guidance of reason, which fact does in no way make the law of nature arbitrary. What, furthermore, is more obvious than this? That the nature of man, in so far as it was made by the Creator a social one, is the norm and foundation of that law which must be followed in any society, whether it be universal or particular. Nor, indeed, do they contribute greater stability or light to this study, who commend that foundation thus: 'The final argument for whatever is naturally just is nature herself, which makes her own law. The guidance of nature must be followed, and we must diligently inquire what that is to which in moral matters she of herself leads, or from which she restrains us. Wherefore natural law must be sought in agreement or disagreement with nature. But, for this purpose, nature must be understood, not as she is at this time, depraved by her corrupt

Now in addition to the fact that most of these words appear to beg the question and to explain the obscure by the equally obscure, the statement, that the nature of man was first created by God uncontaminated, and was afterwards depraved by man's own sin, is a question of fact, the truth of which can be established only on the authority of Holy Writ. And the result is that so important a foundation is only accepted by those Christians who acknowledge the theory of the origin of sin as held by our churches. Yet since this study concerns not Christians alone but all mankind, surely it would be more appropriate to set up such a principle as no one, provided he be of sound mind, can deny. But on this point let every thinking man decide for himself.

In conclusion, just as I am not without hope that good and wise men will hold this work of mine worthy of their approbation, so I most earnestly pray that, wherever I shall have fallen into error, they may charge that to the imperfection of man's condition; since it would surely be an inhuman and almost insane piece of folly to burn the whole field because of one or two weeds; as Horace [Art of Poetry, 351 ff.] says: 'Where a poem has many shining beauties I am not the man to be offended by a few spots which carelessness has let fall on it or human weakness has failed to guard against.' This is not a matter of pride on my part, nor do my white hairs yet bring with them such a degree of obstinacy that I am going to feel that I should blush to have learned or changed aught at the admonition of more learned men. Nay, I shall be ready both to refute without obstinacy, and to be refuted without indignation. How should a sensible man blush to apply to himself the words of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VI, § xxi? 'If any one can prove and bring home to me that any conception or act of mine is wrong, I will amend it, and be thankful. For I seek the truth, whereby no one was ever harmed. But he is harmed who persists in his own self-deception and ignorance.' Nor would I care to be included in the number of those of whom Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VII, chap. x, says: 'People who are self-opinionated, or ignorant, or boorish, are all obstinate.' (W.) Farewell.

THE task of prime philosophy [metaphysics], if it was to fulfil the calling of its own very nature, was to give the most comprehensive definitions of things and to divide them appropriately into distinct classes, giving in addition the general nature and condition of every kind of thing. Now the classification of natural things seems to have been sufficiently treated by those who have so far undertaken the consideration of that science, but it is perfectly clear that they have not been as much concerned with moral entities as the dignity of these requires. Many, indeed, have not considered them at all; others have but lightly touched upon them, as if they were unimportant or figments of no moment. And yet their nature should by all means be known by man, to whom has been given the power to produce them, and whose life is deeply penetrated by their influence. This consideration impels us to give by way of preface, in so far as shall seem necessary for our undertaking, a discussion of this field of knowledge which has been neglected so far by most writers; so that the definitions of moral things, which we shall give, may not by their obscurity or novelty delay the reader, who has doubtless met but rarely such terms in the common treatises. And if those who have been bred on delicate letters take offence at much of this and frown upon new words unknown to Latium, we ask of them this indulgence, that, as we bear from time to time with them in their excessive niceties regarding their own fancies, so they will pardon us when we pay heed for a few moments more to the exact meaning of things than to the ornaments of speech.

For we do not know how such matters can be expressed more conveniently, unless by tedious circumlocutions we are willing to involve them in greater obscurity. Cicero will free us from the charge of novelty, On Ends, Bk. III [i]: 'We are forced to give new names to new things. And this is what no one who is even moderately learned will wonder at, when he considers that in every art which is not in common and ordinary use, there is a great variety of new names.' He then adds examples from the liberal and manual arts, and remarks: 'And much more is this course allowable in a philosopher; for philosophy is the art of life, and a man who is discussing that cannot borrow his language from the forum.' (Y.) And Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. III [39 ff.]:

I'll leave thy passions and instruct thy mind.
And though some word of foreign stamp appear,
Seem harsh, untuned, uneasy to thy ear;
This is the subject's not the writer's fault;
Some things are stiff and will not yield to thought.
I must be plain. And if our art hath found Expressions proper, it neglects the sound. (C.)

However, if it so be that a man cannot by any means abide these inelegancies, he may pass them over and move at once to smoother fields.

2. According as all things which this universe embraces consist of their own principles, which the Great and Good Creator has apportioned and assigned to the constitution of their essence, so each several thing is observed to have its own properties, which arise from the disposition and aptitude of its substance, and to exert itself in distinct actions according to the measure of strength imparted it by the Creator. These properties we usually call natural, since by the term 'nature' has generally been designated not merely the entire sum of created things, but also their modes and acts which follow from that innate strength which produces those infinite varieties of motion, whereby, as we observe, all things in this universe are stirred. Now those things which act with no perception at all, or with mere downright perception, or with perception but slightly aided by reflection, are led solely by the instinct of nature, and can in no way temper their actions by any measures that are taken of themselves. But to man there has been given, not merely beauty and adaptability of body, but also the distinctive light of intelligence, by the aid of which he can understand things more accurately, compare them with one another, judge the unknown by the known, and decide how things agree among themselves; so that, as it would seem, not only is he freed from the necessity of confining his actions to any one mode, but he can even exert, suspend, or moderate them. Furthermore, to that same being, man, there has been granted the power to invent or apply certain aids to each faculty, whereby it is signally assisted and directed in its functioning. It is the task of others to set forth all that in the way of concepts has been discovered to help save the intellect from being confused by the infinite variety of things. It is for us to observe, how, chiefly for the direction of the acts of the will, a specific kind of attribute has been given to things and their natural motions, from which there has arisen a certain propriety in the actions of man, and that outstanding seemliness and order which adorn the life of men. Now these attributes are called Moral Entities, because by them the morals and actions of men are judged and tempered, so that they may attain a character and appearance different from the rude simplicity of dumb animals.

3. We seem able, accordingly, to define moral ideas most conveniently as certain modes [qualities], added to physical things or motions, by intelligent¹ beings, primarily to direct and temper the freedom of the voluntary acts of man, and thereby to secure a certain orderliness and decorum in civilized life. We use the term modes, for the term entity seems more fittingly to be divisible into the two great subdivisions of substance and mode, than into those of substance and accident. Furthermore, as mode is distinguished from substance, so moral ideas clearly do not exist of themselves, but have their basis only in substances and in their motions, which they can affect only to a limited extent. Now some modes flow, as it were, from the very nature of the thing itself, while others are superadded by intelligent agency to physical things and modes. For whatever has been endowed with intellect is able, by means of reflection and a comparison of one thing with another, to form concepts, which are suitable to be the guides of a consistent faculty. Moral entities also are of the same kind. You may justly call the Great and Good God their maker, who surely did not will that men should spend their lives like beasts without civilization and moral law, but that their life and actions should be tempered by a fixed mode of conduct, which was impossible without moral entities. Nevertheless, the majority of them have been superadded later at the pleasure of men themselves, according as they felt that the introduction of them would help to develop the life of man and to reduce it to order. And so of these latter the purpose is clear: It is not the perfection of this world of nature, as is the case with physical entities, but it is the perfection in a distinctive way of the life of man, in so far as it was capable of a certain beauty of order above that in the life of beasts, as also the production of a pleasing harmony in a thing so changeable as the human mind.

4. Now as the original way of producing physical entities is creation, so the way in which moral entities are produced can scarcely be better expressed than by the word imposition. For they do not arise out of the intrinsic nature of the physical properties of things, but they are superadded, at the will of intelligent entities, to things already existent and physically complete, and to their natural effects, and, indeed, come into existence only by the determination of their authors. And these authors give them also certain effects, which they can also remove at their own pleasure without any accompanying change in the object to which they had been added. Hence the active force which lies in them does not consist in their ability directly to produce any physical motion or change in any thing, but only in this, that it is made clear to men along what line they should govern their liberty of action, and that in a special way men are made capable of receiving some good or evil and of directing certain actions towards other persons with a particular effect. Also the efficacy of moral entities instituted by God flows from the fact, that, as man's creator, He has the right to set certain limits to the liberty of will which He has deigned to vouchsafe man, and to turn that will, when reluctant,¹ by the threat of some evil to whatever course He wishes. Nay, even men themselves have been able to give a force to their own inventions, by threatening some evil that lay within their power, on him who refused to conform to their dictates.

5. Since, therefore, moral entities have been instituted to bring order into the lives of men, for which purpose it is required that they also, who must live according to their rule, should adopt a set standard in their relations towards one another, in determining their actions, and finally in fixing their attitude towards those things which are used in the lives of men; for this reason they are understood to be inherent primarily in men, but also in their actions, and even, to some extent, in things, as they are found in nature, acting either of herself, or with the aid of human industry. But although a division of moral entities might have been made with very good reason according to these three heads, it has seemed more convenient to classify them according to the system of physical entities; and that, partly because philosophers have studied the latter with greater care, and from a comparison with them much light can be thrown on the former, and also because our intellect, immersed as it is in things material, can scarcely comprehend moral entities without the analogy of physical.²

6. Although moral entities do not exist of themselves, and consequently should in general not be classified as substances, but rather as modes, we nevertheless find many of them considered like substances, because other moral things appear to be directly founded in them, in the same way that quantity and qualities inhere in physical substances. Indeed, in the same way that physical substances sub-pose, as it were, space, in which they fix the natural existence which they possess, and exercise their physical motions, so persons, especially moral persons, on the same analogy, are held and understood to be in some state, which is, as it were, likewise sub-posed or sub-set for them, so that in it they perform their actions and produce their effects. Hence the nature of a state may not improperly be defined, by virtue of the analogy that it has with space, as a sub-posed moral entity; since space, indeed, does not appear to be a primary entity, but is merely sub-posed, as it were, beneath other things and upholds them in a definite manner. In this way also definite states have been postulated, not for their own sake but only that in them moral persons may be understood to exist. Although a state differs from space in that the latter is a certain kind of immobile substance, both extended from the first and of itself capable of existence even when natural objects are removed; while the former, and indeed other moral things, considered formally and as such, has but the force of mode and attribute, so that when the persons are removed, which are said to be in such a moral state, the state itself can scarcely any longer maintain its own existence.

7. Now space has two aspects: the first, according to which things are said to be where or in a place, i.e. here or there; and the second, according to which things are said to be when, or in time, i.e. to-day, yesterday, to-morrow. In the same way we note two aspects for a state, the one denoting a moral where, and so bearing some analogy with place, and the other having respect to time, in so far as it has a certain moral effect on those who are said to exist in that time. State in its former aspect, analogous to space, can be considered either indeterminately, in that it results from moral qualities alone, or determinately, in that it involves also the consideration of some moral quantity and a moral comparison. A state¹ of man considered indeterminately is either natural or adventitious. We call a state of man natural, not because without any imposition it derives from the physical principles of the essence of man, but because it arises from the imposition of the Divine Will, not from the determination of men, and accompanies man from the very² moment of his birth. We are accustomed, moreover, to consider the natural state of man either absolutely, or in relation to other men. Considered in the former manner, the natural state of man, so long as we can find no more convenient word, we shall designate 'humanity', or that condition in which man is understood to have been constituted when the Creator willed that He should be distinguished above other animate creatures. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [i.iii]: 'Nature herself has stamped on us a character in excellence greatly surpassing the rest of the animal creation.' From such a state it follows that man should be a creature who recognizes the Author of his being, gives Him due worship, and admires His works; and that there should be expected of man a life utterly different from that of the beasts. To this state the life and condition of animals is opposed.

Now since the very being a man is a state out of which arise certain¹ obligations and certain rights as well, it will not be amiss at this point to consider when that state begins in individual men. And this seems properly to be when any one can really be called a man, despite the fact that those perfections are still wanting which come to a man only in the course of time, when, indeed, he first shows life and sensation as a distinct being, although he has not yet left his mother's womb. But since the fulfilment of obligations requires of a man a knowledge of himself and of that which he is doing, it follows that they do not have any efficacy in action until a man knows how to regulate his actions to some norm, and how to distinguish them one from another. But since rights lay an obligation for action upon others who already have the use of their reason, and hence may be of advantage to those who cannot yet discern what is being done, they are in force from the very beginning of man's existence. Hence, on the ground that the right of not suffering injury at the hands of others is common to all men, if any one while still in the womb receives bodily harm, the injury is done not merely to the parents but also to the embryo as well, and we judge that the same child when grown and become aware of that injury can demand satisfaction in his own right. But if any one should destroy or dissipate what is in the mother's womb before it has taken on a human form, it cannot be said that that mass sustained any injury, although in fact an offence has been done to the law of nature in cutting off a member of society, and an injury done to the state in the loss of a citizen, and to the parents in the loss of anticipated offspring.

Considered in its relation to other men, the natural state of man is when men order their lives on nothing but a simple universal kinship resulting from the similarity of their physical nature, before any human act or covenant has arisen which has rendered one man beholden to another. In this sense those who have no common master, who are not subject to another, and who are unknown to each other by way of either benefit or injury, are said to live in a mutual state of nature. And to this may be added a third way of regarding a natural state, namely, as one which lacks all the inventions and institutions, discovered by man or divinely revealed to him, that have given him dignity and comfort.

That is an adventitious state which comes to men at birth, or some time thereafter, by virtue of some human deed; the divisions of this state will be treated more conveniently in another place.

Here it should be observed in passing, that no one should think²

that a natural state, in the second of the senses given above, never has existed or can exist, because a group of men has never been joined together, free from any adventitious bond, by that simple similarity of physical nature which arises from kinship; since, indeed, Eve was joined to Adam by the conjugal bond, and their descendants have been welded even more closely by a common blood and ancestry and by kinship. But it should be recognized that the bond arising from kinship is gradually weakened among those who are far removed from the common stock, and it is generally considered to have no force beyond the circle of definite terms which men have invented to express degrees of relationship. And although that state did not exist in fact at the birth of the human race, in the course of time it also did emerge, when the memory of a common ancestry had disappeared, or the feeling of relationship arising from it had been lost.

8. Now although every state presupposes in the man who is said to be in that state a certain respect and attitude toward others, since, indeed, every state is accompanied by a right or obligation which cannot be understood without an object for its force; still, some states more expressly denote a relation toward other men than do others, since they signify distinctly the mode in which men mutually transact their business. The most outstanding of these are peace and war. Libanius, Progymnasmata [p. 5, Chriæ, i. 6]: 'Two states control all the actions of men, I refer to war and peace.' Now peace is that state in which men dwell together in quiet and without violent injuries, and render their mutual dues, as of obligation and desire. War, however, is the state of men who are naturally inflicting or repelling injuries or are striving to extort by force what is due to them. Peace may be divided into common peace, which is maintained towards all men whomsoever, through those duties alone which arise from the law of nature, and particular peace, which is based upon formal treaties and definite pledges. This latter again may be internal, when it is maintained between members of the same body politic, or external, when maintained with people outside our body politic, either ordinary friends or particular friends and allies. There is no such thing as a common or universal war of all men against one another, for that is a consequence of the state in which beasts are. A particular war, which is carried on between distinct groups of men, is either internal, that is, civil, or external; the former is waged between members of the same body politic, the latter between those who do not belong to the same body politic. When the acts of war are suspended, but the state of war still remains, we call it a truce.

9. Some states can be considered determinately, according as they enjoy a greater or less degree of esteem, or as they are accorded much or little honour. For since certain rights or obligations accompany each and every state, that state is generally considered the more outstanding, the more numerous and the more powerful the rights which it has associated with it; or when its obligations are such that it is expected to perform tasks which call for an unusual ability of courage or intelligence. On the other hand, those which require but rude labour are for the most part considered to have a low standing.

10. The second sort of state, that, namely, which has respect to time considered with a moral effect, is divisible, first, into juniority and seniority. Each of these may be used with respect to the duration of life, when they are called age, with the stages of infancy, childhood, puberty, youth, manhood, maturity, declining age, senility, and decrepitude; or with respect to some adventitious state, according to the length of time that one has continued in it. Second, into majority, when a man is held able, because of his age, to administer his own affairs upon his own responsibility; and into minority, when a man has need of a tutor or guardian, because, from weakness of judgement or an inclination toward a wayward life, he is considered unable to manage his own affairs intelligently. Different limits are found to be set for this state among different peoples.

Different from minority is the age capable of guile, for which, likewise, in general no definite limit can be set. Aelian, Bk. V, chap. xvi, relates an interesting way of detecting guile: 'A boy who had picked up a golden plate which had dropped from the crown of Diana, was brought into court. The judges accordingly laid before the boy playthings, knuckle bones, and a golden plate, and when the boy again took the gold, he was punished as being guilty of sacrilege.'¹

11. Before we proceed to other matters, it should be observed that from the paucity of vocabulary we are frequently forced to express² by the same terms both the state itself and the attribute proper to such a state, though they are in fact distinct and are conceived differently. (Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. II, chap. xxxiv: 'There is an enormous mass of things without names, which we do not speak of under distinctive names of their own, but by the names of other things transferred to them.' (S.)). So, for instance, liberty is conceived both as a state, with analogy to space, and as a faculty of action, with resemblance to an active quality. So also nobility denotes now a state, and again the attribute of a person, because it is conceived as a passive quality. So also the words truce and peace signify both the state and the means of attaining it.

Also we should not forget, that, just as one person may at the same time be in different states, provided only that obligations accompany- 7 ing those states do not conflict, so the obligations attached to any one state may in their parts be derived from different principles. Hence he who gathers the obligations flowing from any one principle, and omits all others, does by no means immediately form a state to which no obligations can or should adhere, save those which he himself remembers. So he who has gathered from the Sacred Scriptures alone the parts of the duty of priests, assuredly cannot deny that those priests are also obligated to perform such duties as are required by the constitutions of individual governments. And so we also who are here treating merely the duties of man, which can be shown to be necessary by the light of reason, do by no means insist that any such state of man, which includes such obligations alone, ever did exist, can exist, or should exist. Although it would be perhaps superfluous to inquire at length whether such a state of man might ever properly have existed. For what some assert has not yet been clearly proven, namely, that 'If man had continued in his state of original holiness, the law of nature which guided him at first, would have continued to do so, except that one or two positive laws might have been added.' For I doubt if it is likely that the human¹ race, even though free from sin, would have remained for all time within the limits of a single garden, subsisting on the fruits furnished by nature, without advancing in civilization through industry and the inventions² of the arts. I cannot as yet understand how they would have compromised their original purity, if, as men multiplied, they had formed certain groups and instituted civil conventions. But it does not seem possible to conceive of such societies without positive laws.

12. Moral entities, regarded on the analogy of substances, are termed moral persons. These are either individual men, or men united by a moral bond into one system, considered together with their status, or the function which they perform in common life. Now moral persons are either simple or composite. Simple persons, on the basis of a difference in their status or functions, are either public or private, as their function is directly for the use of a civil group, or for the advantage of individuals as such. In the usage of Christian peoples public persons are divided into civil and ecclesiastical. The former are either principal, or inferior. Some among them rule a commonwealth with supreme authority; some, by virtue of the power given them from the supreme authority, have charge of a certain part of the administration and are properly called magistrates, or aid in the proper administration of the state by their counsels. Inferior persons render a less important service to the state and to the magistrates as such. In war the superior and inferior officers correspond to the magistrates, and are in command of the common soldiers, who, in this respect, may be considered public persons, because they are authorized, directly or indirectly, by the highest civil power, to bear arms in behalf of the state.

There is also a special group of political persons who may be called representatives, inasmuch as they represent the person of others. These, having been invested by another with power and authority of action, transact business in his place with the same validity as if it were done by the person himself. Such are legates, vicars, syndics, and others of the sort.

It has, however, recently been observed, that a distinction should be made between ministers who have a representative character, such as ambassadors, and ministers of a second degree, such as envoys or residents who do not represent so fully as the former the full authority of those who dispatch them. See the anonymous work Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, p. 542.¹ Among private persons, tutors and guardians bear a resemblance to these, in so far as they manage the affairs and business of orphans and minors. On this point Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xvi, is mistaken in holding that in communities a man may frequently represent the person of an inanimate object, which in itself is not a person, such as a church, a hospital, a bridge, &c. For it is not necessary by a fiction of law to assign a personality to any of these things, since it is very much simpler to say that certain states have assigned to particular men the duty to collect the revenues for the preservation of such places, and to prosecute and defend any suits that shall arise on such an account.

The variety of religious persons is easily recognizable by any one according to the religion in which he has been brought up. Any educated man, also, can understand what kinds of persons schools produce.

Among private persons there is a great variety. The main differences arise, first, from their business, their pursuit, or the trade with which they are occupied, and from which they make their living, such being either an occupation worthy of a free man, or one to which some disrepute attaches. Second, from the condition or, as it were, moral state which one occupies in a community, whereby one is a citizen with more or less exclusive rights, another an alien, another a foreigner. Third, from the place in a family, according to which one is the head of a family, and so may represent at once the person of a husband, a father, and a master; another is a wife; another a son; another a servant. These are all members of the ordinary family, with whom, but outside their number, may be included at times a guest. Fourth, from lineage, which gives rise to nobles of different degrees in different communities, and common folk. Fifth, from sex and age; by virtue of the latter, boy, youth, man, and old man; by virtue of the former, male and female. For although variation in sex and age is not due to imposition, still such things involve some moral distinction among men in common life, since different things are recognized as becoming to persons of different sex, and it is proper to treat them differently.

13. A composite moral person is constituted when several individual men so unite that whatever, by reason of that union, they want or do, is considered as one will, one¹ act, and no more. This takes place when several individuals so subordinate their will to the will of one person, or of a council, that they themselves are willing to recognize, and wish others to regard, whatever that one person has decreed or done, concerning matters pertaining to the nature of that body and agreeable to its end, as the will and action of all. It follows, therefore, that although in other cases what several persons want or do is considered the will and desire of as many men as there are physical persons or individuals present, but one will is ascribed to a person, to the composition of which many have united, and the action which proceeds from them as such a body is regarded as one, no matter how many physical individuals have been concerned in it. And so a composite person of such a nature may, and commonly does, obtain some special privileges and rights, which individuals as such in that body cannot claim or secure for themselves.

But here it should be observed, that, just as physical bodies remain the same, although in the course of time, by unobserved forces, through the addition or subtraction from them of minute particles, no small change may be effected in them, in like manner the same person does not cease to exist when there is a succession of individual members, unless at one and the same time such a change takes place as completely to dissolve the nature of that body. But this point will be discussed at greater length elsewhere.

We may divide compound moral persons or societies, like individuals, into public and private. The former are again either sacred or civil. Among the sacred we may call some general, such as the Catholic Church, and any particular church, whether it be confined within the fixed limits of a commonwealth, or distinguished by public forms of the confession of faith; and some particular, such as councils and synods, consistories, presbyteries, &c. A civil society is likewise either general, as a state, of which there are many kinds, simple and compound, regular and irregular; or particular, as a senate, an equestrian order, a tribe, a parliament, &c. A military society is called an army, and is composed of legion, squadron, cohort, company, &c.

Private societies are not merely families, but also, when within states, corporations, such as those of the merchants, the artisans, &c. It has not seemed desirable for us to consider all these species here in any great detail.

14. We shall now make this further observation regarding the nature of simple moral persons, how far, namely, one and the same man can be in different states not mutually antagonistic. So the same man can at the same time represent several persons, provided the various functions which attend such persons can be simultaneously met by the same person. For although by virtue of physical considerations the same person cannot be both husband and wife, or both son and daughter, or by virtue of moral considerations cannot be at once master and slave, judge and prisoner, litigant and witness, yet nothing prevents the same person from being at one and the same time in his house the head of a family, in parliament a senator, in a court of justice a lawyer, at the king's court a counsellor; in so far, at least, as the various duties concerned do not engage the entire man, but can easily be met at different times. Cicero's remarks, On Duties, Bk. I, [xxx], have some bearing upon this point:

We are to observe that nature has, as it were, endowed us with two characters. The first is in common to all mankind, because all of us partake in that excellency of reason, which places us above the brutes. The other character is peculiar to individuals. . . . [xxxii] (To these) is added a third which either accident or occasion imposes on us; and even a fourth, which we accommodate to ourselves by our own judgement and choice. (E.)

And again, On the Orator, [II. xxiv]: 'I conceive myself in three characters, my own, that of the adversary, and that of the judge.' (W.) And it was for this consideration that the wiser among the heathen undertook to defend polytheism,¹ which they well knew was contrary to reason; on the ground, namely, that several persons were conceived in the same deity according as he manifests himself in various acts in the world of nature. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. vii: 'God may have as many titles as he has attributes.' (S.*) Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, xxiii [p. 240] [xxxix, Vb]: 'The Gods have but one nature, though many names. Yet we, from the help which they vouchsafe mankind, give them separate names, which are but the index of our ignorance. Different gods go by different names.' Furthermore, it is easily understandable from the nature of imposition, that, when a man assumes, as it were, a new person, there is no physical change in him, no new physical qualities are produced, nor his old ones augmented, but whatever new is thus produced lies entirely within the sphere of things moral. So when one is elected consul he does not become therewith more prudent, nor when he leaves that magistracy less so; although some have observed that the actions of many have borrowed no little dignity from the honour of the office, and that some have not appeared to be the same men when in office that they were as private citizens. This, however, I should reckon among the deceptions of eyesight produced by a display of vanities. In the same way simple folk think that the title of physician adds some efficacy to a prescription. Juvenal, Satires, vii [135-7]: 'It is the purple robe that gets the lawyer custom—his violet cloaks that attract clients. It suits their interest to live

And yet there are some whose abilities are quickened by the importance of their tasks, but lie dormant at times of leisure. See Cornelius Nepos, Alcibiades, chap. i, sections 3-4. One must, indeed, believe that, when God imposes a particular person upon a man, He can and does add qualities that surpass the measure of moral attainments. See Exodus, iii, iv; Deuteronomy, xxiv. 9; 1 Samuel, x. 6 and 9; Matthew, x. 1, 19, 20. From what has gone before it is, furthermore, patent that the Jews once attributed too great effects to their regeneration, whereby formerly the new person of a Proselyte of Righteousness was imposed upon a Gentile, in holding that none of his former relationships continued, and that he should no longer consider as his relatives, his brother, sister, father, mother, or children begotten in his former condition. See Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. II, chap. iv, where the cause of this error is shown to be the belief that a new soul had been given the proselyte.

15. In conclusion it should be noted that men sometimes create a kind of shadow and imitation of moral persons which represent them in sport. Hence it has come about that the stage has in a very special way claimed for itself the word persona. The essence of a feigned person consists in the fact that the dress, gesture, and speech of a different¹ and real person is cleverly represented. Thus the whole procedure bears merely the appearance of mirth, and whatever is said or done by such a person leaves behind it no moral effect, but is valued solely in the light of the cleverness of the impersonation. And for this reason, I may add in passing, I wonder why Peter, Bishop of Alexandria, approved of a baptism given in play by Athanasius when a boy, as Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. II, chap. xvi, records. Compare also the argument of the Bishop of Minorca upon the intention of the minister in administering the sacrament, in Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. II, pp. 214-15.

However, the imposition which produces real moral persons is not at all a free thing, but it should presuppose such qualities as are appropriate, so that some real benefit may thereby accrue to mankind; and he who has no respect for this consideration in constituting persons, should be regarded as insulting mankind with his recklessness and folly. So Caligula might have made a worthless and stupid man consul, provided he was a Roman citizen and knew enough to perform at least the routine functions of that office. But to give the consulship to his horse Incitatus,² was sheer madness and silly impudence; and further, to give him the person of a householder, with slaves, a house, and furnishings, so that guests invited in his name might be entertained more sumptuously. See Suetonius, Caligula, chap. lv. It was an equal insanity, combined with the grossest impiety, when many ancient peoples placed their kings, the founders of their states, and other illustrious men, after their death, among the number of the gods, and that either because of their merits, or for purposes of flattery. See the oration of Tiberius in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. IV [xxxvii, xxxviii]. And any man of sense can readily judge what he ought to think of canonization as practised by the Papists.

16. Now as to things, in so far as they come under the object of law, there seems no occasion to enter them in the list of moral¹ entities; for although men are regarded as different persons because of a different status or function, we regard things in a different way, whether, namely, they are understood to belong to us, or to some one else, or to no one. When, indeed, certain things came under ownership, and the rest were still free from ownership, no new qualities should be understood to have been imposed on such things; but rather, upon the beginning of ownership in things, a certain moral quality arose among men, of which the men were the subjects, and the things only the terms. For just as when at the creation all things were in common, man had the right to apply to his own ends those things which were freely offered for the use of all, so, when ownership had once been established, each man was given the right to dispose of his own property, and among the non-owners there arose the obligation to keep hands off such property. The things themselves, however, obtained therefrom only an extrinsic denomination, inasmuch as they form the object of such a right or obligation. Thus when certain things are called religious and sacred, no moral quality and sanctity inheres in them, but an obligation is simply laid upon men to treat them in a certain manner; and when this obligation terminates, such things are supposed to fall back into common use. If, however, any one should contend that certain things as well as persons ought to be considered moral, his words ought so to be explained as to make it clear that morality is being attributed to them not formally but only objectively.

17. So much concerning moral entities conceived upon the analogy of substances. We must now consider those which are formally modes, and are conceived as such. Modes may be divided most conveniently into modes of affection and modes of estimation. According to the former, persons are understood to be affected in a certain manner, according to the latter, persons and things may be valued. The former fall under the term quality, the latter under the term quantity, such terms being used in their broadest sense. Qualities may, for our present purposes, be divided into formal and operative. The former are those which do not tend or are not directed towards any act or operation, but only agree and are joined to the subject as bare forms; hence you may call them also simple attributes. An operative quality is either primary or derived. According to a primary quality a thing is conceived as suitable or fit for an act, and is either internal or external, and may also be termed a moral passive¹ quality. A derived quality is that which proceeds from a primary, such as acts.

18. A conspicuous place among moral attributes is occupied by titles, which are designations for the distinctions, made in the civil life of persons, upon the basis of their esteem and status. They are in the main of two kinds. Some, indeed, denote the degree of the esteem of individuals in civil life, or the qualities peculiar to them, but they only connote and hint more or less clearly at the status, according as such and such a title is ordinarily applied to few or many statuses. Such are those honorary titles which are commonly appended to the names of persons of distinction, as 'most serene', 'most eminent', 'most illustrious', &c., the implication of which is greater or less according to the force of the substantives to which they are attached. Other titles directly signify some status or some seat or peculiar place in a status, while they indirectly connote a degree of the esteem which commonly attaches to that status or position. Such are the names of moral persons, at least of those who occupy any post of honour. These are not so important in themselves, inasmuch as they are only ideas representing to one man's mind the status and position of a certain person, as they are when by the imposition of men they signify the rights, power, and function of him to whom they are attributed. So it is not unreasonable that time and again men fight with great ardour over titles, since the denial of the title is understood to be accompanied by the denial to a man of the status, function, power, and rights, which that title customarily expresses or indicates.

Here we must carefully note that the imposition of most titles is not perpetual and uniform, but among different peoples, and even among the same at different times, it shows a wide latitude of variation. So how very simple and modest were the titles of the first class as used among our ancestors! and what was once enough for the first man of the state is now despised by a common clerk. For the increase of titles of this kind does not always argue an increase in dignity, but when the titles wax, while the thing itself remains the same, we must regard² their worth as having diminished.

When, further, some laudatory title is given to a social class, that is because the quality denoted by that title is or should be present in the majority of its members; and so even those who do not possess the quality denoted, frequently come to possess the title. Thus in literary circles some men are called 'most famous' and 'most learned', who are anything but that. So also a lazy nobleman is regularly addressed as 'most active'. Often, also, people in private life, or others, magnify or reduce the titles of others, according as the present condition of their own affairs leads them to flattery or to scorn. And in titles of the latter kind [the designations of status] it very often happens that the title continues, while the position, or the dignity and right, increases or diminishes not a little. Nay, it is even extremely common that in different states the same word is used for varying degrees of honour. Hence it would be highly naïve to rate in the same class all those who anywhere the world over enjoy the same title. It should also be observed that sometimes the mere title is given to a person without the position, or without those functions and emoluments, which generally accompany such a title; to the end merely that by virtue of it he may enjoy external insignia, and occupy a certain position among his fellow citizens. And last, in connexion, chiefly, with the titles of the leading houses of Europe, it happens that the same title sometimes signifies both the line and the possession of the estate mentioned, and sometimes the line but not the possession, with merely the right of succession in the due course of inheritance.

19. Moral operative qualities are either active or passive. Of the former the most noble species are power, right, and obligation. Power is that by which a man is able to do something legally and with a moral effect. This effect is that an obligation is laid upon another to perform some task, or to admit as valid some of his actions, or not to hinder them, or that he shall be able to confer upon another a power of action or possession, which the latter did not formerly possess. For this quality is, indeed, to a very high degree diffusive, as it were, of itself. On the side of its efficacy, power is divided into perfect and imperfect. The former is that which can be exercised by force against those who unlawfully endeavour to oppose it (force being chiefly exercised inside the boundaries of a state by an action at law; outside the boundaries, by war). In the case of the latter, if any one be prohibited unlawfully from its exercise, he is being treated inhumanely, indeed, and yet he has no right to defend it either by a legal action or by war, unless it so happen that necessity has supplied what it lacks in efficacy.

On the side of its subject, power is divided into personal and communicable. The former is that which one cannot lawfully transmit to another. But in this there are several differences, for some powers are so intimately connected with a person that the acts belonging to them cannot rightly be exercised at all through the instrumentality of another. Such is the power of a husband over the body of his wife, the exercise of which by another no laws would admit. Such are also the powers the possession of which cannot be transferred by us to another, although the commission of the acts proper to them can be delegated to others; provided, however, that the acts derive all their authority from him to whom those powers inherently belong. Of this nature is the power of kings who have been constituted as such by the will of the people. For they cannot transfer to any one else the right to rule, and yet they can employ the services of ministers for the exercise of the acts that belong to such a right. Communicable power is such as can properly be transferred from one person to another, whether that be at his own pleasure, or by the authority or consent of a superior.

Finally, with regard to objects, most kinds of power can be classified into four groups. For powers concern either persons or things, and both these according as they are one's own or another's. Power over one's own person and actions is called liberty (although the ambiguities under which this word labours will have to be set forth elsewhere). Liberty is not to be understood as a principle distinct from him who enjoys it, or as a right of forcing oneself to an abhorrent task (compare Digest, IV. viii. 51; IX. ii. 13), but rather as a man's faculty to dispose of himself and his actions in accordance with his own desires; which faculty of itself involves a negation of any hindrance arising from 13 a superior power. Power over one's own possessions is called ownership. Power over the persons of other men is properly command; power over another's possessions is easement.

20. The word 'right' (iur) is highly ambiguous. For in addition to the meanings where it is used for law, and for a body or system of homogeneous laws, as well as for the decision rendered by a judge, it very frequently happens that it is taken as the moral quality by which we legally either command persons, or possess things, or by virtue of which something is owed us. This difference, however, seems to exist between the words power and right, namely, that the former tends more to introduce into things or persons the actual presence of the quality mentioned, and less expressly connotes the mode by which one has secured it. Right, however, directly and clearly indicates that a thing has been lawfully acquired and is lawfully now retained. Because, however, most kinds of power have a distinguishing name, which that quality, whereby something is understood to be owed us, lacks, it is convenient to designate this quality in a special way by the word 'right', although we have not seen fit to avoid the other meanings of this word, because of customary usage.

Now we class right among active qualities, since by virtue of it something can be demanded of another. But it is also placed among passive moral qualities, since it enables a man lawfully to receive something. For passive qualities are those by which one can lawfully have, suffer, admit, or receive something. Of these there are three kinds: The first is that whereby we properly receive something, in such a way, however, that we have no power to demand it, nor is there any obligation on another to render it. Such is the ability to receive a gift that is purely gratuitous. And that such a quality is not an absolute fiction, may be ascertained from the consideration, that, for example, a judge may be forbidden to receive under any consideration a gift from parties to a suit. The second is that whereby we are capacitated to receive something from another, not in such a way that it can be extorted from him against his will, unless a chance necessity requires it, but only in so far as he is obliged by some moral virtue to give it. This is called by Grotius an 'aptitude'. The third is that whereby we are able to force a man, even against his will, to the performance of something, and he himself is fully obligated to such performance by a specific law that prescribes a definite penalty. It should, however, be further observed that many things commonly pass under the head of rights, which, if we cared to speak accurately,¹ are a kind of a complex arising from power and right, used each in its proper sense, and at the same time involve or suppose some obligation, or honour, or something similar. Thus citizenship, or the right of citizenship, embraces the faculty to exercise, to their fullest effects, the acts pertaining to the members of that commonwealth, and the right to enjoy the benefits proper to it, supposing likewise an obligation toward the commonwealth. So, for example, the honours of learned men embrace the power to exercise the specific acts proper to that position, and the right to enjoy the benefits of that calling, to which there is further attached a high degree of esteem.

21. An obligation is that whereby one is required under moral necessity to do, or admit, or suffer something; its divisions will be treated more in detail below. There are also moral 'sensible' qualities which are understood to affect the judgement of men in a particular manner, just as among physical qualities this term is used for those which affect the faculty of sensation; such are honour, disgrace, authority, dignity, fame, obscurity, and the like.

22. A few remarks must also be added now on the topic of the modes of estimation or moral quantities. For it is clear that in a society persons and things are rated not only according to the extent of their physical substance, or the intensity of their motion and physical 14 qualities, when they are considered from the point of view of natural principles, but also according to another kind of quantity, which is different from any physical or mathematical quantity. And this quantity arises from the imposition and determination of a rational power. Now moral quantity is found both in things, where it is called price (value), in persons, where it is called esteem—both of these coming under the idea of value, and in actions, for which we lack a distinct term. Each of these will be discussed in its proper place. What we

23. In conclusion, as moral entities owe their origin to imposition, so from this they obtain their stability, as well as their variations, and when it has ceased to operate, as it were, they simultaneously disappear, just as a shadow disappears the instant a light is extinguished. Moreover, those which are of divine imposition are removed again only at the divine pleasure. Those which have been established by the will of men are abolished again by the same, even though the physical substance of the persons or things remain unchanged. For although it is impossible, from the nature of things, that what has once been done should be made as though it had not been done, as, for example, that he who has once been consul should not have been consul, still we see every day how one ceases to be that which he once was, and how all the moral entities which resided in a person entirely disappear, leaving behind not a single real vestige, as it were. For a moral entity can never attain to the strength of a physical quality. Hence it is folly to believe, that, if any person is imposed upon an individual, by this mere imposition a permanent moral character has been given him. Thus, if a commoner become a noble, he acquires merely new rights, but his substance and physical qualities are changed not one whit. If a noble be expelled from his order, he loses merely his rights; all of his natural endowments remain unimpaired.

THE majority of scholars have for long firmly held, that moral science lacks that certitude, which is so characteristic of other knowledge, and especially of mathematics, because it has no place for demonstrations, from which alone is derived knowledge that is pure and free from fear of error; and because what is known of it rests on probability alone. This feeling has worked an immense injury to sciences most noble and most necessary to the life of man. For it has caused scholars to investigate but diffidently into that which they believed rested on so slippery a foundation; and those who neglected the moral sciences were supplied with the plausible excuse, that they were founded on no certain demonstrations, and could be treated merely in a rough and ready fashion. This error was to no slight extent fostered by the authority of Aristotle, who in the eyes of most men has attained the very pinnacle of learning, as though the mind of man could proceed no farther. These are his conclusions on moral science, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. I, chap. i: 15

It would be wrong to expect the same degree of accuracy in all reasonings. Things noble and just, which are the subject of investigation in political science, exhibit so great a diversity and uncertainty that they are sometimes thought to have only a conventional, and not a natural, existence. As our subjects, then, and our premisses are of this nature, we must be content to indicate the truth roughly and in outline. For an educated person will expect accuracy in each subject only so far as the nature of the subject allows; he might as well accept probable reasoning from a mathematician as require demonstrative proofs from a rhetorician. (W.)

Now in truth we are not at all moved by the sole authority of this one man, and we shall make a fitting reply to the principal arguments of Aristotle and others, after we have made a few introductory remarks upon the nature of a demonstration.

2. To demonstrate is, therefore, in our opinion, to deduce by a syllogism for things proposed the certain conclusion that must be unreservedly accepted from particular principles taken as their causes. Now although this is perfectly clear, and can readily be seen every day in the pure practice of mathematical demonstrations, to which no sane man has denied the power of demonstration, still a faulty understanding of one or two words has miserably misled most philosophers hitherto on this point, and caused them most erroneously to exclude demonstrations from many fields of philosophy. Their error came mainly from the fact, that, although the subject of a demonstration, as is commonly said, must be necessary, they interpreted this proposition to mean, that, in a demonstrative syllogism, the subject of the conclusion, distinct from the predicate, ought to be a necessarily existent entity. So, for example, in the trite and threadbare instance, 'man is rational and therefore capable of laughter', man is the subject of the demonstration, and is of course a necessary being. But as a matter of fact the subject of the demonstration is not some simple term, but an entire proposition, the necessary truth of which is deduced by a syllogism from fixed principles. It is of little consequence here, whether or not the subject of a demonstrable proposition necessarily exists; but it is sufficient, if, when its existence is posited, certain affections are necessarily agreeable to it, and it can be shown by unquestionable principles that they are agreeable to it. Thus it is of little concern to mathematicians whether a triangle be something necessary or contingent, if only they can demonstrate that the sum of its angles equals two right angles. And so the subject of a demonstration is said to be necessary, because of the necessity of the connexion by which the predicate in such a conclusion cleaves to the subject.

- 16 3. The true nature of those propositions that can be used in a demonstration may readily be understood from its end and effect. Science is that which we seek by means of demonstration, that is, a certain and pure knowledge, in every way and at all times constant and free from fear of error. 'We all conceive that that which we know is invariable.' (W.) (Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VI, chap. iii.) It is necessary, therefore, that the propositions be true in fact, and not so from mere agreement or hypothesis. For although a long chain of conclusions can be deduced from a certain hypothesis, nevertheless, since they derive from a precarious or partly clouded principle, the streams cannot escape sharing the nature of the fountain. And though two absolutely contrary propositions should be taken, one of which must of necessity be true, of these, nevertheless, only the τὸ ὅτι [the fact of the case] could be conclusively proven, for τὸ διότι [the reason why it is so] always presupposes as a condition the firmness of the hypothesis upon which it is based.

The propositions of demonstration must also be axioms, so that they do not need any further proof, but merit belief upon their own evidence, or else are reducible finally to some axiomatic truth. But inasmuch as some propositions are closer to first principles and others farther away, it should not be expected that every demonstration can be concluded in a single syllogism; but rather that the arguments from the proposition to be demonstrated must be continued until some first principle is reached. For those who are ever and anon droning their quicquid ['everything'], atqui ['but'], ergo ['wherefore'], are not the only ones who reason correctly, but those who begin with evident principles, and know how to weave a train of necessary conclusions from connected arguments, reason quite as well.

It is also necessary that these propositions be immediate, that is, that they flow from one another continuously, without interruption or gap. For a demonstrative argument must be like a chain, the propositions being fastened together like links, so that if one is broken or defective, the whole structure of the argument breaks up.

Finally, propositions must be the causes of the conclusion, because they contain the reason why a predicate is a demonstrable proposition necessarily agreeing with the subject. All of the foregoing is explained in complete detail by Erhard Weigel, Analysis Aristotelica ex Euclide restituta, whose merits in this field of science have been equalled hitherto by no other man of our country.

4. After these preliminary remarks, we should further observe, that, although it is a common characteristic of all moral sciences that they are under obligation not to remain within the limits of bare theory alone, but to turn their findings to some practical use, still a great difference may be observed between the two principal representatives. One of them concerns the rectitude of human actions in their order according to laws, the other concerns the successful management of one's own actions and those of others, with an eye to the security and welfare primarily of the public. The latter, indeed, properly fall under the head of prudence, as Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VI, chap. v, defines it: 'A true rational and practical state of mind in the field of human good and evil.' (W.) Hence, in the same passage, he designates the duty of a prudent man in the following words: 'It seems to be characteristic of the prudent man to be capable of deliberating well upon what is good or expedient for himself [. . .] as concerns the means of living well.' (W.) And he bases these conclusions of his upon axioms drawn from a keen observation and comparison of the customs of men and the events of human history. Says Fabius in Livy, Bk. XXII, chap.¹ xxxix: 'Nor does the outcome only, that instructor of fools, demonstrate it, but that same reasoning which has continued hitherto, and will continue unchangeable so long as circumstances shall remain the same.' (S.) These axioms, however, do 17

not appear to be so firm that infallible demonstrations can be deduced from them; and that is partly because of the remarkable flux and inconstancy which repeatedly manifests itself in the dispositions of mankind, as well as partly because the outcome of affairs is often changed by a slight force, and they fall out quite otherwise than had been anticipated. It happens also that the wit of man often goes astray in the application of those axioms, because of unforeseen events which suddenly upset all calculations, and because divine providence often makes sport of the dispositions of men, however cunningly contrived. Therefore, those who are engaged in the conduct of affairs do not endeavour to draw their plans to the nicety of demonstrations, but when they have used the wisest circumspection and a kind of divination, as it were, they leave the outcome in the hands of fate. See 2 Samuel, x. 12. For although what is possible may be known, and several possibilities may be compared, and it can be definitely ascertained not only which of two possibilities is of more and which of less value, granted that they exist, but also what will result from a large number of causes, and what from fewer, now existing, or soon to come into being; and although that which can come about in several different ways is more likely to take place, and consequently the expectation of it is better justified (see Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. iii, sec. 4, n. 4); nevertheless, the mind of man cannot at all times and places grasp and weigh correctly all possibilities, and, because of unforeseen circumstances, many things which seemed more probable, look quite different when we come to the point. And so nearly all men think it sufficient in matters touching the acquisition of prudence to follow the advice of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VI, chap. xii:

It is right, therefore, to pay no less attention to the undemonstrated assertions and opinions of such persons as are experienced and advanced in years or prudent, than to their demonstrations; for their experienced eye gives them the power of correct¹ vision. (W.)

But let others struggle over this Helen.

Now that knowledge, which considers what is upright and what base in human actions, the principal portion of which we have undertaken to present, rests entirely upon grounds so secure, that from it can be deduced genuine demonstrations which are capable of producing a solid science. So certainly can its conclusions be derived from distinct principles, that no further ground is left for doubt. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. i: 'Whatever things tend to make us better² or happier, nature has rendered either obvious or easily discoverable.' (S.)*

This assertion will be still more clear if we discuss what can be brought forward in opposition. Although Hobbes, De Homine, chap. x, is mistaken when he claims that ethics and politics, i.e., the science of justice and injustice, of right and wrong, can be demonstrated a priori, because we ourselves have made the principles, i.e. the causes of justice, namely, laws and pacts, by which distinction is made between justice and equity, and injustice and injury; since before the institution of pacts and laws there was, of course, no justice or injustice, no public good or evil among men any more than among beasts. We shall demonstrate the falsity of this position in another place [I. vii. 13; VIII. i. 5], and also how a fallacy underlies the use of the word public.

5. Some there are who maintain that things moral are always uncertain and changing, and that no greater certitude can attach to any science than to the objects with which it deals. The reply is, that, although moral entities owe their origin to imposition, and for that reason are not in an absolute sense necessary, yet they have not arisen in such a loose and general manner, that scientific knowledge about them is on that account utterly uncertain. For the very condition of man demanded the institution of most of them, a condition assigned him by the most Good and Great Creator out of His goodness and wisdom; hence such entities can by no means be uncertain and weak. This point will be made more clear below, when we inquire into the origin of natural law. And even if human actions are called moral, 18 chiefly because they are not necessary, but free, still it does not follow, that, when certain principles are posited, such affections as can be unquestionably demonstrated concerning these actions, may not agree with them. For it is clear that the acts which are ordered by the law of nature have an intrinsic force towards a social life, although their real existence depends upon the free will of men. And so long as we deliberate, we are properly called free, while the effects that will follow our actions are properly called, with respect to that liberty, contingent; but when we have determined upon some action, the relation between our acts and all the effects depending thereon, is necessary and quite natural, and therefore capable of demonstration.

Further, it is irrelevant when some deny that any clear judgement can be passed upon human actions, because of the variety of the circumstances, any one of which seems to put a new face on an action, so that legislators can rarely frame a law which admits no exception, and does not necessitate abandoning the letter of the law and having recourse to equity. For there are definite principles according to which it can be shown how much force any circumstance may have in affecting or varying any action. And those same principles constitute the reason why legislators often care very little about excepting from their legislation cases clothed in unusual circumstances, but find a little more security in the use of general terms. Because, indeed, they assume that the judges, whose task it is to examine particular facts with reference to the laws, will understand what circumstance exerted an influence upon a certain action. The general reason for this is to be found in Digest, I. iii. 3-6:

Laws ought to be laid down, as Theophrastus said, in respect of things which happen for the most part, not which happen against reasonable expectation. [...] Rules of law are not founded on possibilities which may chance to come to pass on some one occasion. [...] What occurs once or twice, as Theophrastus says, lawgivers pass by. (M.)

From this, however, it must not be concluded that the judgements of a perpetual law sometimes fail; but only that it is not worth while for legislators to promulgate written laws about cases that rarely happen, since the judges can easily decide them by the principles of natural law. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturæ, chap. iv, § 4, n. 1.

6. Now in order that this knowledge of natural law with which we are now concerned, and which includes all moral and civil knowledge¹ that is genuine and solid, may meet the full requirements of a science, we feel that we need not declare, with certain writers, that some things are noble or base of themselves without any imposition, and that these form the object of natural and perpetual law, while those, the good repute or baseness of which depends upon the will of a legislator, fall under the head of positive laws. For since good repute, or moral necessity, and turpitude, are affections of human actions arising from their conformity or non-conformity to some norm or law, and law is the bidding of a superior, it does not appear that good repute or turpitude can be conceived to exist before law, and without the imposition of a superior. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. iv: 'The distinction in acts between good and bad, or base and reputable, is produced by law. Thence arises among persons obligation and indebtedness toward the performance of a duty.'

And, indeed, they who set up an eternal rule for the morality of human actions, beyond the imposition of God, seem to me to do nothing other than to join to God some co-eternal extrinsic principle which He Himself had to follow in the assignment of forms of things [at the moment of creation]. All, furthermore, admit that God created all things, man included, of His free will; it must follow, then, that it lay within His own pleasure to assign whatever nature He wished to this 19 creature whom He was about to create. How, then, can an action of man be accorded any quality, if it takes its rise from an extrinsic and absolute necessity, without the imposition and pleasure of God? On this argument, in very truth, all the movements and actions of man, if every law both divine and human be removed, are indifferent; while some of them are termed naturally reputable or base, because the condition of nature, which the Creator freely bestowed upon man, most rigorously requires either their execution or avoidance; it does not follow, however, that any morality can exist of itself, without any law, in its own motion and

Actions vary according to the manner of their performance. Take, for example, that which we are now doing, drinking, singing, and talking; these actions are not in themselves either good or evil, but turn out in this or that way according to the mode of performing them; and when well done they are good, and when wrongly done they are evil. (J.)

This rule he also applies later on to love. Hence every day we see beasts committing without sin deeds the performance of which by man would have involved him in the grossest misconduct; not, indeed, because the physical motions of man and of a beast differ, but because there has been imposed by law on certain actions of man a morality which is wanting in the acts of a beast.

Nor is this true, as some one may rejoin, because there is a natural difference between the actions of man and those of a beast, in that the former has reason, which the latter lacks. For if we consider reason, in so far as it is not imbued with an understanding and sense of law, or a moral norm, it might perhaps be able to permit man the faculty of doing something more expeditiously and adroitly than a beast, and to supply sagacity as an aid to his natural powers. But that reason should be able to discover any morality in the actions of a man without reference to a law, is as impossible as for a man born blind to judge between colours.

Another argument is furnished by J. Adamus Osiander, Notae ad Grotium, p. 60:

If there were any such thing as moral good and evil before the existence of law, how could there be any obligation there? since obligation proceeds only from a superior. For moral good and evil involves a relation to a person that performs the act in question; but if there is no obligation resting on that person, neither is there any good or evil.

Here it should be carefully noted that this indifference of physical motion in the actions of men is maintained by us only in respect to morality. For otherwise actions prescribed by the law of nature have, through the determination of the first cause, the native power to produce an effect good and useful to mankind, while actions similarly forbidden produce a contrary effect. But this natural goodness and evil does by no means constitute an action in the field of morals. For there are many things which contribute to the happiness and convenience of man and yet are not morally good, since they are not voluntary actions, nor are they enjoined by any law; while many acts which tend to the welfare of man have the same natural effect among beasts, although among the latter they possess no moral quality. So to refrain from mutual injury, to partake of food and drink in moderation, and to watch over one's offspring, work for the preservation both of men and of beasts; and yet beasts are not on that account said to perform acts which are morally good. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 9.

So in the last analysis human actions which fall under the direction of the law of nature can be resolved into the natural power that they possess to aid or to injure men, considered either as individuals or in 20 general. But the reverse, namely, that whatever has natural power to aid or injure any kind of animal is therefore the object of natural law, does not always hold.

Another objection is raised by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. vi:

But it is not every action or every emotion that admits of a mean state. There are some whose very name implies wickedness, as e.g. malice, shamelessness, and envy, among emotions, or adultery, theft, and murder, among actions. All these, and others like them, are censured as being intrinsically wicked, not merely the excesses or deficiencies of them. It is never possible to be right in respect of them; they are always sinful. (W.)

But surely we have here a case of non sequitur, to wit: there are words for affections or actions, which signify vice of themselves, irrespective of whether they are excessive or moderate; therefore, an affection or action can be base in itself without any reference to law. Nay, these very terms do not signify simple physical motions or acts, but only such as are contrary to laws, and are for that reason complete moral acts. For why should ἐπιχαίρεκακία [Schadenfreude] and envy be considered evil affections, unless it is that by a law of nature every man should be touched by another's fortune? while this rule is broken when one takes pleasure in the misfortunes of others, and grieves at the sight of their success. Add Stobaeus, Sermones, cxi. So what is impudence but a vicious firmness of mind in the face of things at the commission of which the laws bade one to feel shame? For failure to feel shame deserves no reprimand, if the laws do not require it. So adultery is the pollution of another man's wife, whom the laws have assigned to her husband alone. Theft is the taking of the property of another without the permission of its owner, whom the laws recognize as its sole disposer. Murder is the killing of an innocent man, and against the laws. Incest is intercourse with a person whom the laws have not allowed us to touch, and that out of a respect which the law likewise affirms is owed by men to their next of kin. The same conclusion is to be drawn regarding other vices also.

But if, indeed, you remove from all these actions any respect to law, and any element of morality, the mere physical act involves no reason why such actions should still necessarily be held base without consideration to law. For on such a theory it is a matter of complete indifference, whether you have intercourse with a woman who is very closely connected with you by ties of blood, or have intercourse with the same person as does another who has no special right to her; whether you take the life of a member of your own species; whether you take something which another had set aside for his own use, but which no law had given him the right of removing from the use of others.

The reason why many men cannot understand such an indifference in actions, is because from childhood on we have been imbued with a hatred of such vices; and this hatred, impressed on a mind still simple, appears to have grown to have the strength of a moral judgement, the result being that few have thought of distinguishing between the material and the formal in such actions. Hence it is patent that Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace, Bk. I, chap. i, § 10, had not considered this matter thoroughly, when he refers the wickedness of some human actions to the class of things to which the power of God Himself does not extend, because they involve a contradiction. Twice two, indeed, can only be four, because twice two and four are one and the same thing, differing only in name and in the point of view. It is, however, a contradiction for something simultaneously to be and not to be the same thing. But surely such a contradiction does not appear in the case of actions which are opposed to natural law. For the same reason Grotius shortly thereafter undertakes to derive this wickedness from a comparison with nature when following sound reason. And yet in 21 the words sound reason, as attributed to man, there is involved a reference to the law of society as given to man by the Creator. Again, in § 12, he says that the absolute existence of any natural law is tested by its necessary agreement or non-agreement with rational and social nature. And yet man received this social nature not from any immutable necessity, but from the pleasure of God. Therefore, the morality of actions as well, whether they do or do not suit him as a social being, must be derived from the same source. And so morality is fittingly attributed to these actions, not of an absolute necessity, but of a hypothetical necessity, since such a position is posited for man as God freely assigned him above all other creatures.

Nor can any help be found for the defenders of the opposite opinion in the words of Sacred Scripture which are adduced in the foregoing passage. For without doubt from the very beginning God declared to the race of man that He would be a rewarder of the good and an avenger upon the evil (Hebrews, xi. 6), and that He would render to each man according to his works (Romans, ii. 6). And since His truthfulness does not permit Him to depart from His word, Abraham properly makes his appeal (Genesis, xviii. 25). Add Ezekiel, xviii. 25; Romans, iii. 6. But how can it follow from this that there is any morality in human actions of themselves apart from divine imposition? Just as it has not yet been shown how this conclusion can be drawn from the statement in Isaiah, v. 3, that He may justly stop cultivating the vineyard, where He loses His time and His trouble. Finally, in Micah, vi. 2, it is asserted that men by their own judgement can understand that thanks ought to be rendered in return for benefits. But one has no right to conclude from this, that, because men can appreciate benefits rendered them, and should be grateful for the same, such an ability was not given them by any law, but is a necessary thing in itself before the existence of all law. From all this it is evident that the familiar and oft-repeated saying, 'The precepts of the natural law are of eternal verity', should be limited to this extent, that such eternity should not reach beyond the imposition of God, or the origin of the race of man. Although, as a matter of fact, the eternity which is attributed to natural law should be measured and defined in terms of its opposition to positive laws, which are subject to change.

7. It can be maintained, and with some degree of reason among common men, that good and evil repute exist in human actions of themselves, and by their own nature, and not by imposition, because the very blood seems to have a kind of natural sense of base deeds, since it brings blushes to our cheeks, even against our will, as we remember or feel ashamed of them. Nay, they add, it seems to be a contradiction to attribute a physical effect to a moral quality; and so, since a certain movement of the blood, bringing a blush to the cheek, comes as a physical effect from a base action, baseness is to be regarded as an affection or physical and necessary quality of action.

We grant, of course, that the all-wise Creator has planted in the minds of men a sense of shame, to act as a guardian of virtue, and as a bridle for restraining evil. It is also probable that had not God wished mankind to regulate their actions according to law, He would not have implanted in the spirit of man this sense, since only on such grounds does it serve any use. But it is not at all unreasonable that a moral quality, and one, indeed, which owes its origin to imposition, should produce in man, although of course not directly, a physical effect; for the soul, which is most intimately conjoined with the body, can, because of its apprehension and sensitiveness to moral things, give motion to some portion of the body. And it should be carefully noted that shame arises not merely because of some base action, but also from 22 anything, even though not morally base, which is thought to diminish our reputation. And, indeed, according to Descartes, Les Passions, art. 205: 'Shame is a kind of sadness, which is based upon self-love and issues from the thought or fear of disgrace.' Or, according to Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. vi: 'Shame then may be defined as a pain or trouble about those ills [. . .] which seem to lead to ignominy.' (J.) For man is an ambitious animal, and conceited about his own excellence, and he finds the greatest pleasure if he can discover in himself such things as will enable him to distinguish himself above others, and to boast. And when he fears that the estimation of his excellence is going to be lowered in the eyes of others, he experiences the deepest sadness; a manifestation of which is visible in the special seat of man's pride, when the heart suddenly sends blood to the face. But man wants to have his excellence measured not alone by his avoidance of evil deeds, but also by many other things, in which there is inherent no morality. Hence we see many people blush because of shortness of stature, lameness, baldness, a tumour, a hunched back, or some other bodily deformity, because of some disease, or poverty, poor clothes, at some exhibition of ignorance, to which one can attach no blame, at a harmless mistake, and other things that are not morally base. Add Sira-cides, chap. xlii. 19 ff. And among sins those especially bring a blush, which particularly indicate a weak or abject mind, and which make us an object of disdain, and that not, indeed, in the sight of man in general, but of those whose esteem we especially desire. See Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. II, chap. vi. But those who have lost all interest in their reputation cease to blush at even the basest deeds. Add Descartes, Les Passions, art. 207. But all these facts have absolutely no force in lessening the certainty of moral knowledge, which can still be considered quite firm, even though the morality of men's actions arise entirely from imposition.

8. But what will become of that notorious moral latitude which is opposed to η^1 ἀκρίβεια [the exactness] of mathematics? Does not it also detract somewhat from the certainty of this discipline? That will be perfectly clear, if we shall consider, first, how far we maintain that demonstrations apply here, and then in what things that latitude is to be found. Now demonstrations in moral questions are applied to moral qualities, in so far only as it is agreed that they are clearly, and for certain reasons, suited to such actions and persons; for instance, whether a given action be just or unjust, and whether a given right or obligation lies upon such and such a person considered in general. Things like this, we maintain, can be deduced so clearly from their own peculiar principles and causes, that no man in his senses can cast any doubt upon them. And even if any latitude, or something akin to it, should here be found, it would of itself furnish no obstacle to that certainty. In the goodness or badness of actions, indeed, so far as they denote an agreement or departure from the rule of law, no latitude seems possible, but any digression from the right must at once be considered bad in itself.

Yet in another respect, i.e. as they are concerned with men, a degree of latitude is found (for ordinarily, of course, latitude applies only to quantity). In the first place, because the force which laws have to bind men does not always exist to the same degree, but is more loose in ordering or forbidding certain actions, more strict in others. Hence it follows that one thing is said to be due according to the letter of the law, another in equity; that is, according to justice in the strict use of the word, or according to what is fair and right. Justice and equity differ in this respect, that a sterner necessity is laid upon us to do the former, while we are more gently bound to do the latter; yet the latter has a wider scope than the former, for without doubt the 23 duties of other virtues have a wider range than those of justice. It happens, further, that among men, and in their courts, the law takes a slight account of petty misdeeds. And some things are enjoined in so half-hearted a manner that they may be considered as left to one's sense of shame; and he who does them merits praise, while he who omits them need not fear reproof. Among these Grotius, Bk. I, chap. ii, § 6, seems to include 'concubinage, divorce, and polygamy' before they were forbidden by divine law. 'These things', he says, 'in fact are of such a nature that reason itself declares that it is morally better to abstain from them, but they are not such that wickedness (that is, open fault) would be manifest in them without divine law.' (K.) These matters, however, will be taken up elsewhere. Also the following passage of Aristotle bears on this matter, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. ix: 'It is not, however, one who deviates a little from what is right, but one who deviates a great deal, whether on the side of excess or of deficiency, that is censured, for the latter is conspicuous.' (W.*) It often happens, also, that something is unowed and indifferent in itself, and yet its omission or commission may be of the greatest use, either under all circumstances, or only in a special situation. The words of the apostle bear on this point (1 Corinthians, vi. 12; vii. 6-9; x. 23); also those of Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace, Bk. I, chap. i, § 10: 'Sometimes, also, by misuse of the term, things which reason declares are honourable, or better than their opposites, are said to be according to the law of nature, although not obligatory.' (K.) This enables one to understand whether and to what extent there can be said to be degrees of good. Certainly, if we take the word in its strict meaning, as that which is in accordance with law, it is clear that a thing can no more be better than the good, than it can be 'righter' than the right. Yet one good can be said to be better than another, according to a different degree of necessity inherent in each, whereby one yields to the other under circumstances where both cannot be accomplished at the same time. See Matthew, viii. 21-2, where it was recognized as good to bury one's father, but better to follow Christ, and Acts, vi. 2, where it was recognized as good to minister to the poor, but better to preach the gospel. This topic will be discussed again in more detail. When, finally, actions lawful in themselves, and indifferent, are measured by their usefulness, one is said to be better than another, to the degree that more benefit accrues from it.

9. On the basis of what has just been said, that passage of Grotius is to be explained where he discusses causes of doubt in moral actions (Bk. II, chap. xxiii, § 1). Here he says :

Certainty is not to be found in moral questions in the same degree as in mathematical science. This comes from the fact that mathematical science completely separates form from substance, and that the forms themselves are generally such that between two of them there is no intermediate form, just as there is no mean between a straight and a curved line. In moral questions, on the contrary, even trifling circumstances alter the substance, and the forms, which are the subject of inquiry, are wont to have something intermediate, which is of such scope that it approaches now more closely to this, now to that extreme.

Thus it comes about that between what should be done and what it is wrong to do there is a mean, that which is permissible; and this is now closer to the former, now to the latter. Hence there often comes a moment of doubt, just as when day passes into night, or when cold water slowly becomes warm. (K.)

We grant that about other actions, as well as with special relation to the declaration of war, doubt can arise, either because it is not yet entirely clear whether the cause, which would bring on the war, is just or unjust, or because it is not known whether the cause is sufficient to justify war, a thing always open to any turn of fortune that brings such great evils in its train; or because minds still hesitate between the two courses, whether it be good for the state in its present condition to avenge its injuries by war, or better to conceal the affront and defer the satisfaction, lest an inopportune attempt at revenge occasion even greater misfortunes. But that any grounds for doubt come from the uncertainty of moral matters, we emphatically deny. The reason why accurate demonstrations are to be found in mathematics, is not the fact of their abstraction from matter, but something different, which we shall soon discuss. The dictum, 'In morals the least circumstance alters the matter', is ambiguous. For if the meaning is that the least circumstance alters the quality of an action, that is, causes an evil 24 quality to take the place of a good, this does not work towards uncertainty in moral knowledge; for it is also true that a line which varies in the slightest degree from straightness, tends to curvature, but that fact does not produce any uncertainty in geometry. If, however, the saying means that the slightest circumstance increases or lessens the quantity of an action, we answer that this is not always true, at least in a civil court, where the judge often pays no regard to trifles. And even granting this, the fact does not lessen the certainty of moral matters, since even in mathematics the slightest addition or detraction makes a change in the quantity. A lawful [licitum] act, which is a medium between what is enjoined and what is forbidden, as we have said, inclines to either part, in the respect that it is sometimes better that it should be done, and sometimes better that it should not be done. But this does not cause any uncertainty, nor does it form an intermediate field, which does not allow one to draw a clear distinction between good and evil. And so the comparisons with 'twilight' and

'lukewarm water' are not justifiable. For these belong to what are usually called media of participation [media participationis], as lukewarm water participates in both hot and cold. But what are called media of negation [media negationis], such as an indifferent and lawful thing, partake of neither of these extremes, but equally deny them both. For the statements, 'good is not indifferent', and 'evil is not indifferent', are equally true; and it does not appear how such a medium can be a cause of uncertainty.

10. But, as a matter of fact, a certain latitude is found in moral quantities, and principally for that reason mathematical knowledge is generally held to surpass moral in the delicacy of its processes. That is due to the different nature of physical and moral quantity. For physical quantities can be exactly compared with one another, and measured and divided into distinct parts, because they are in a material way objects of our senses. Hence one can determine accurately what relation or proportion they have to one another, especially since with numbers, which we use, all such relations are most exactly set forth. And besides, those quantities are a product of nature, and hence unmoved and eternal. But moral quantities arise from imposition, and the judgement of intelligent and free agents, whose judgement and pleasure is in no way subject to physical measurement; and so the quantity which they conceive and determine by their imposition, cannot be referred to a like measure, but retains the liberty and laxness of its origin. Neither did the end, for which moral quantities were introduced, require such a measure of exactness, and such straining after details, but it was enough for the purpose of man's life that persons, things, and actions be roughly rated and compared. So a latitude is found in the value set upon persons, that is, in the esteem by which we can understand how one person should be preferred to another, but which does not allow us precisely to determine whether his position is two-, three-, or four-fold as good as that of another. A similar latitude is also found in the values of different things, and of actions which form a commodity by which an exact price can be scarcely set on any things other than those which are by their very nature for the use of man; for the rest, they are considered equal, except as the agreement and pleasure of men have determined. In the same way the proportion between many misdemeanours and punishments is set up with a certain degree of latitude. For who can stipulate precisely how many stripes, and how severely administered, shall measure up to the guilt of, say, some particular case of theft? In such a case the estimate of the crime is somewhat lax and careless.

25 Nay, sometimes great latitude is found in many affairs of human life. Civil legislators are not accustomed to cut everything down to the quick. 'The laws', says Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xvii], 'abolish frauds one way, philosophers in another; the laws, as far as they can, lay hold of them by the arm; philosophers, as far as they can, check them by reason and wisdom.' (E.) And in rendering a decision it commonly happens that the judge is not over concerned with the slight details. So also in the decisions of worthy men, latitude claims its place as if by its own right. Add also Digest, XLVI. iii. 105. Furthermore, in the exercise of vindictive justice, some latitude is allowed not only for clemency, but also for severity. The saying of Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV, chap. xlv, applies here: 'Every great judicial warning involves somewhat of injustice to individuals, which is compensated by the general benefit.' (O.) And also the remark of Jason of Pherae in Plutarch, De Sanitate Tuenda [xxiii, p. 135 F] and Political Precepts [xxv, p. 818A]: 'One must do wrong in small matters, in order to do right in large matters.' Nay, the majority of virtues, including justice, allows a sufficiently free liberty and latitude in their exercise, such as mercy, generosity, gratitude, equity, and charity. So also in everyday life, words denoting habits are frequently applied with a certain latitude to men. Thus a man is called just who commits but a few deeds of injustice, even though he commits these deliberately. And so, when in moral matters some quantities are found reduced even to the point of exactitude, as in the prices of certain things, in appointed times, and the like, such a precise determination does not come so much from the things themselves, or from the times, as it does from the imposition and pleasure of men. See Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. viii, § 14. And so we feel that there is a real difference between mathematical and moral demonstrations, because the former are concerned first of all with quantities which can from their nature be exactly determined, while the latter are satisfied merely to point out a certain quality of the subject, leaving the determination of moral quantities to the general pleasure of man's will.

11. But we must take care not to confuse the moral certainty, which we have hitherto been endeavouring to establish, with that which is often applied to questions of fact, when we say, for example, this or that thing, which¹ has been confirmed by trustworthy witnesses, is morally certain. For such a moral certainty is nothing other than a strong presumption, which rests on probable reasons and can very rarely deceive us. This certainty, Ziegler, in his notes on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 1, has not quite clearly distinguished from the former, although he allows to the more general precepts of ethics a degree of evidence equal to the propositions of any science properly so called. Yet he says: 'The particular conclusions have much less certainty, and, indeed, are often involved in obscurity, because the things from which they are drawn are in many ways changeable and contingent.' And as an example he adds: 'Moral certainty and evidence is the belief that what an upright and respected gentleman has confirmed with an oath, is true. And yet this evidence is not absolutely such, but only conditionally, because it is not entirely impossible for a just and respected man to perjure himself, since he may possibly fall from his virtue.' And yet the certainty by which perjury is known to be evil is very different from that by which it is believed that a good man does not commit perjury, nor is the latter conclusion a proper deduction from the former. In the same way the faith reposed in historians is held morally certain, when they testify about some fact, which is far beyond our own memory, and for which there is no longer possible any actual testimony, as it were, especially if several historians have told the same story; for it is not probable that many would have willingly agreed together to pass on a falsehood to posterity, or would have been able to hope that their lies would not some day be brought to light. Despite 26 this, however, there are examples of popular stories, as it were, which have been propagated through many centuries under the guise of truth.

CHAPTER III

ON THE UNDERSTANDING OF MAN AS IT CONCURS IN MORAL ACTIONS

SINCE the chief task of this discipline which we have undertaken to present is concerned with the demonstration of the right or the wrong, the good or the evil, the just or the unjust in human actions, all the principles and the affections of these actions will first have to be considered, and then why they are understood to be connected morally by imputation with man. Now the dignity of man far outshines that of beasts by virtue of the fact that he has been endowed with a most exalted soul, which, by its highly developed understanding, can examine into things and judge between them, and, by its remarkable deftness, can embrace or reject them. And for this reason the actions of man are put in a class far above the motions of beasts, which are but a reflex of their senses, without any previous reflection, whatever Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv, n. 7-8, has maintained to the contrary.

That power, furthermore, which the soul of man carries like a light, goes under the name of understanding, and this is conceived to have two qualities which it exerts in voluntary actions. By the one an object is displayed to the will as if in a mirror, and why it is agreeable or disagreeable, good or ill, is at first glance discernible. By the other the reasons for good or ill, which surround many objects on either hand, are weighed and compared, and a judgement is finally passed as to what should be done, and when and why, while at the same time consideration is taken of the means best suited to the end. In this connexion it should be observed that the initiative for any voluntary action, without exception, proceeds from man's understanding. Hence the well-known saying: 'There is no desire for an unknown object.' Yet this knowledge preceding a voluntary act is not always distinct, since even a confused knowledge is sufficient to make the will bestir itself. For this reason there often arises a desire to try out something unknown.

2. It should further be observed, regarding the former faculty of the understanding, that it belongs to those which are usually called natural, as opposed to free, so that it is not within the power of man to apprehend things in any other way than as their forms present themselves to his understanding, and the will cannot prevent the understanding from assenting to a proposition which seems to it clear and manifest. But it is, nevertheless, within man's power to give his undivided 27 attention to the object considered, and by careful thought to balance well the reasons for good and ill, not, indeed, stopping with a mere superficial examination, but penetrating into the very innermost being of a matter. And by such means he can obtain an accurate judgement on the subject. In the same way it makes a great deal of difference, in looking at things with the eye, whether you give a thing but a fleeting glance, or contemplate it with a steady gaze. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 9.

From what has been said it is easily understood how large a place this feature of the soul allows for education and laws. The power of man, indeed, cannot enable the understanding to conceive things under any other form than that in which they appear to it. And since agreement or belief cannot but assent to the appearance as apprehended by the mind, a man can only reach a judgement on a matter, as he himself has seemed to have perceived it; and by no law can one justly demand that he do otherwise. Just as also no one can be made wise by a bare and simple command. Yet because many things, which are most self-evident to those who explore them with attention, are not to escape the careless inquirer, and the will can divert the mind from the examination of some truth by thrusting before it other objects, a diligent contemplation of things contributes greatly to confirming a judgement of the understanding, and consequently those who have the oversight of others should take care that a proper opportunity is afforded for its use. And they may also sanction with punishments the demand that one make careful use of those means by which the obscurity of things can be dispelled, and their real nature represented.

3. Now since the understanding carries, as it were, a torch before our actions, and when that gives an uncertain light we cannot fail to wander from our course, we must insist upon the truth of the principle, that, in the faculty of apprehension and in the judgement there is inherent a natural rectitude, which does not allow us to be misled in moral questions, if proper attention be paid to them, and which does not suffer those faculties to become so corrupted that we cannot but be misled. An ill-shaped mirror, indeed, presents distorted images, and a coating of bile on the tongue prevents any proper judgement of tastes; and of course a mistake could not be ascribed to us as a fault, if we have not the ability clearly to distinguish between right and wrong, while it would be the greatest injustice to charge us with an error which we could in no way avoid. Hence, if we do not wish to destroy all morality in actions, we must at any hazard maintain that the understanding of man is by nature sound, and that upon sufficient inquiry it apprehends clearly, and as they actually are, the matters which present themselves to it. And further, that the practical judgement, at least as concerns the general precepts of natural law, cannot be so corrupted that it may not be held responsible for any evil actions that come from it, on the ground that they proceeded from an insuperable error or ignorance. Compare Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 10.

Now at this point we give notice that we are not here discussing what power the understanding may have, without¹ the special assistance of divine grace, in² matters depending upon a particular revelation of God; for such an inquiry belongs to another discipline. Nor are we concerned whether in speculative truths, which require for their investigation the most subtle resources of the mind, a man may not, by being misinformed, embrace a false opinion so heartily that he can by no possible means free³ himself from it. But we are discussing the powers of the understanding, as they are needed to adapt our actions to the law of nature. And here we hold, that no man of mature years, and possessed of reason, is too dull to comprehend at least the general precepts of natural law, especially those which are most commonly kept by society,⁴ and observe to what extent they accord⁵ with the rational and social nature of man. And however much a man may have failed, through indolence, to meditate on one or another precept, or through haste and boldness have reached false decisions of action, or, due to false information, or else a mind corrupted by evil habits and a vicious²¹ life, have brought doubt upon their truth and necessity, or have fashioned for his own use rules of action contrary to natural law, still we do not acknowledge such ignorance or error to be so insuperable that actions based upon it cannot be imputed to the doer of the same. For these general precepts have been so fully set forth, and so interwoven with nature, that man can never descend so nearly to the level of brute beasts as to be incapable of understanding and judging between them. Why, no outstanding mental ability is required for this or any special intellectual acumen, but the ordinary light of one's native wit is sufficient, provided the mind be not affected by some disorder. This is illustrated by the statement of Cicero, Tusculan

⁴ [For invita read in vita.—Tr.]

⁵ [For convenientiam read convenientiam.—Tr.]

Disputations, Bk. III [v], when he says that 'folly', that is, 'an unsettled humour, that proceeds from not being of sound mind, can perform the ordinary duties, and discharge the usual and customary requirements of life, but raving is a total blindness of the mind.' (Y.)

4. The judgement passed on moral actions by the understanding, in so far as it can take cognizance of laws, and so is responsible to the lawgiver for their execution and observance, is given the special name of conscience. As the actions of men either precede or follow it, we get a distinction that enables us to speak of antecedent conscience and consequent conscience. The latter is a judgement or reflection of the understanding, approving what has been rightly omitted or done, and condemning the opposite; it is attended by peace of mind or agitation, according as it gives us its witness and makes us expect either the blessing or the wrath of the lawgiver, as well as the goodwill or anger of other men. Pliny, Panegyric [lxiv. 3]: 'One man may possibly deceive another, but no one has ever deceived himself. Merely let him look into his own life and ask himself what he deserves.' The other variety of conscience precedes acts, telling us what is good and what evil, and what, therefore, must be done or avoided. But here it should be observed, that a place is allowed the conscience in directing the actions of man, only in the respect that it can take cognizance of laws; for the direction of human actions is their special prerogative. Hence, if one wishes to ascribe to the practical judgement or conscience some particular power to direct actions, which does not emanate or arise from law, he ascribes the power of laws to any fantastic idea of men, and introduces the utmost confusion into human affairs. And it must be confessed that such a use of the word conscience, so far as I have been able to find out, is not to be found either in the Scriptures or among the ancient Latin authors, but it was first introduced by the Schoolmen, while in recent times what are called 'cases of conscience' have been invented by crafty priests to enable them thus to bend the minds of men to their own caprice. Nay, if we maintain the proper meaning of the word, to do something contrary to the conscience is nothing other than for you to do something consciously and willingly which you knew was wrong, and its opposite is to do something through error or ignorance. However, we have decided to withdraw the word from such a misuse and to employ it in its proper sense.

5. A correctly informed conscience is of two kinds: either it clearly knows that the conclusion, at which it has arrived, to do or to avoid something, rests on sure and unquestionable principles, that is, it agrees with the laws which form the rule for actions, and agree with the conscience; or else it holds its conclusion true and sure, and can see no reasons that might throw doubt upon it, but it does not know how to reduce the conclusion to the form of a demonstration, and so falls back on commonplace arguments. The former is called right conscience, the latter probable conscience. Regarding a right conscience, this is the rule that has been given: Every voluntary action which is opposed to it, and every avoidance of an action which it declares to be necessary, is sin; and a sin all the more heinous the more clearly a man knew his duty, the non-performance of which argues a greater depravity of mind. See Luke, xii. 47-8. 29

A probable conscience, we feel, differs from a right one, not because it does not recognize the truth of its conclusion, but because it does not know how it can, by its own power, reduce this conclusion to the form of a demonstration, and so it does not have so clear and fixed a recognition of its correctness. For, as others say, nothing is probable in itself, but only in respect to our intellect. Now most men govern their actions by this rule, since, forsooth, to few only has it been given to examine how the duties of life flow from their first sources. Most men feel so secure in their common tenor of life, in the authority of teachers regarded as being above the suspicion of fraud, in custom, and in the obvious decency or convenience of acts, that they feel it is idle to inquire with some care into the reasons for such things; just as most workers are satisfied to perform their tasks with certain convenient tools and to leave to mathematicians the demonstration of their working. And this holds all the more true for propositions which are some distance removed from their first principles, and which require, therefore, a longer operation in deduction, a full understanding of which is practically beyond the reach of those whose minds have not been disciplined in the different sciences. However, this fact gives no support to that pernicious doctrine of probability, devised mostly by more recent Casuists and Jesuits, which falls back upon the authority of a single Doctor, and he a man devoid of reason, with whom all others disagree. That by this principle every moral doctrine is subverted, and that the consciences of men are thereby dependent upon the caprice of priests, to use to their own ends, has been proved by Ludovicus Montaltius [Pascal], Lettres Provinciales [Letter V]; compare also the notes on the same by Wendrock [Nicole] and Samuel Rachel.

Here we make the further observation, that probability of fact, and probability of statement, or law, are improperly confused by them. In questions of fact, indeed, the authority of one estimable man can form a probable presumption and a half-established proof. But, in defining matters of the law, it would be clearly absurd and rash to place so much value on the remark, not based on reasons, of one man, with whom others of no less authority disagree, that it could safely be admitted to be a rule for action.

6. Some rules are commonly laid down for the direction of a probable conscience, concerning which our opinion is that they have a place, when strict law and equity seem to clash, or when both sides of a question lie outside the scope of laws, and yet one seems to approach more nearly than the other to what is reputable, or else one is regarded as more likely to produce some advantage or disadvantage. For in matters which are specifically enjoined or forbidden by a law, there is no such opportunity for choice that one may be rejected and another taken (since, of course, laws will not be satisfied if their explicit prohibitions or commands are met by several different equivalents); but choice is restricted to the things that are permissible, and these lie outside the province of law. Now the chief rules are as follows:

1. In a probable conscience, when two opinions are advanced, neither of which is opposed to a law, and one rests on more substantial considerations, while the other is safer, either may be taken.

2. When two opinions are advanced, one of which rests on weaker considerations, while the other is safer, the safer is properly preferred.

3. In a probable conscience, a well-informed man can follow the opinion that seems most probable to him, although it may not seem so to others, unless he fears that some inconvenience may arise from the fact that he is departing from the common view.

4. An ignorant man is safest in following the authority of the more prudent.

5. A person under the authority of another may properly, at the command of his superiors, do something, if he is not¹ certain that it is unlawful, even though it does not seem to him probable that it should be done.

6. In matters of little importance, if there are probable arguments on each side, either may be chosen.

7. In matters of great importance, if probable arguments are to be found on both sides, the safer side is to be preferred, or the side from which, even if one should fail by a wide margin to achieve his purpose, less harm can come than from following the opposite course.

7. To proceed, even though we have set ourselves, first and foremost, the task of discussing the good and evil, the just and unjust, leaving any treatment of the useful and useless to another branch of learning, still it might not lie outside the bounds of our subject, to outline at this time what rules the understanding should follow in its deliberations upon a useful judgement. This is especially true, since the conclusions drawn above depend very much on these, and in directing our actions much regard must be taken of utility, according to the statement of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians, vi. 12: 'All things are lawful for me', that is, what he has just been discussing, 'but not all things are expedient.' And in business positions some affairs are entirely committed to an individual's prudence and care, and he is held to have managed badly, if, either through shortsightedness or inadvertence, he has undertaken something that offered less advantage. So in the deliberations which naturally arise regarding such matters, in the performance of which we are not bound by necessity or determinate obligation (for necessity precludes deliberation, and determinate obligation leaves to the agent only the execution), it is laid down as fundamental, that nothing should be undertaken, from which in moral estimation (that is, so far as the eye of man can judge between uncertain consequences, and penetrate the obscurity of the future), it seems likely that as much evil as good, or even more evil than good, may arise. The reason for this is clear. For the more an object loses in goodness, the more it gains in evil, and it loses all claims to goodness, if it have an equal amount of evil. A farm is considered worthless, if its income does not surpass its outgo. Cato, On Farming, Bk. I [i]: 'With a farm [. . .] however productive it may be, if it has the spending habit, not much will be left over.' (H.) For undertakings of the nature that we are discussing are made with the sole purpose of getting for ourselves some return. Xenophon, Greek History, Bk.¹ VI [iii. 6]:

For my part, I can neither commend those persons, who, having become competitors in public games, and having gained reputation by several victories, are so fond of contention, that they will not cease from it until they are beaten and forced to relinquish their profession; nor can I praise those gamesters, who, if they are lucky in one trial, play for double stakes; for I see that the greater part of such adventurers sink into utter destitution. Contemplating these examples, it is incumbent on us never to reduce ourselves to such a struggle, that we must either gain all or lose all. (W.)

Lucan, Bk. I [282]: 'Equal labours and anxieties are being sought for a greater reward.' (R.) The saying of Isocrates, Archidamus [37], also applies here: 'Now, when two good things are set before us, the one evident, the other unknown, you would behave ridiculously, if you were to reject the acknowledged good, and decide to choose that which is the subject of doubt.' (F.)

From such statements Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiv, § 5, deduces the following corollaries: 1. 'If the matter under discussion seems, in moral estimation, to have an equal efficacy for good and for evil,' that is, if as much loss as profit will come from it, 'it should be chosen only if the good has somewhat more possibility of good than the evil has of evil'; that is, if the profit will be far greater in case the undertaking turns out well, than the loss, if fortune decrees otherwise. Thus it would not be rash to hazard ten if you stand to gain, by the favour of fortune, a hundred. Compare Epictetus, Enchiridion, chap. xxxv-xxxvi. 2. 'If the good and evil which may result from some matter in debate seem equal, that thing only should be chosen which is more likely to lead to good than to evil'; that is, if it is easier for profit rather than loss to come from it. This is borne out by Arnobius, Bk. II [iv]:

Since, then, the nature of the future is such that it cannot be grasped and comprehended by an anticipation, is it not more rational, of two things uncertain and hanging in doubtful suspense, rather to believe that which carries with it some hopes, than that which brings none at all? For in the one case there is no danger, if that which is said to be at hand should prove vain and groundless; in the other there is the greatest loss [even the loss of salvation] if, when the time has come, it be shown that there was nothing false in what was declared. (B. and C.)

Add M. Pascal, Pensées, chap. vii. 3. 'If the good and evil seem to be unequal, and the efficacy of the same no less unequal, the matter under consideration is to be chosen only if its efficacy for good, as compared with that for evil, is greater than the evil itself compared with the good'; that is, if the evil produced is less than its ability to produce good; 'or if the good is greater in comparison with the evil, than is the efficacy for evil compared with that for good'; that is, if the efficacy by which evil can result instead of good, is less than the surplus of good over evil. 4. When, however, there is as much good as evil in a thing, and its ability to produce each is uncertain, a cautious man will abstain from the thing, if no necessity urges him on.¹

8. When the judgement of the understanding is perplexed, and cannot decide whether something is good or evil, and so ought to be done or avoided, it is called doubtful conscience. For this the following rule is given: So long as no urge, that is born of reasons, inclines the judgement of the understanding to either side of a question, action should be held in abeyance; and he who undertakes something while his conscience is, so to speak, in equilibrium, is guilty of sin. For such a person has, so much as in him lies, violated a law. For it is as if he had said to himself: 'I am, it is true, uncertain whether this action is against the law, but I will undertake it, whether it is or not. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [ix]: 'Those, therefore, are wise monitors who teach us to do nothing of which we are doubtful whether it is honest or unjust; for whatever is honest manifests itself by its own luster, but doubt implies the entertainment of injustice.' (E.)

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxiii, § 2, remarks on this passage: 'This rule', that is, of abstaining from an action, 'does not apply when a person needs must do one of two things and there is a question whether either is right; for then it will be permissible to choose the one which seems less harmful. For when a choice cannot be avoided, the lesser evil assumes the character of good.' (K.) This maxim, we feel, properly applies to evils of damage and not to moral evils, where, indeed, it amounts to some profit to be able to avoid a greater damage by accepting a lesser. But when it is applied to moral evils it requires a careful interpretation. Properly speaking, therefore, neither of two moral evils should be chosen. Yet it frequently happens that two affirmative laws, or one affirmative and another negative, seem to clash in such a way that at a given time a man cannot satisfy both. In such cases simple persons, indeed, believe that there is a comparison between two evils or sins of omission, and the one should be chosen which seems to avoid the greater sin. But, as a matter of fact, in such cases it is not true that the lesser of two sins is chosen, but that which, except for such a conflict, was a sin, ceases to be a sin, once the necessity becomes incumbent of fulfilling the stronger law. So, for instance, when there is a conflict between the affirmative precept, 'Give alms', and the negative, 'Thou shalt not steal', one certainly must not steal so as to have means for alms; according to the words of the Apostle: 'Evil is not to be done that good may come of it.'¹ However, in this case the failure to give alms is not properly a sin, since affirmative commands have no power to obligate one, when the means to fulfil such commands are lacking. In the same way, when a conflict arises between two affirmative precepts, as, for example, 'Obey God', and 'Obey the magistrate', one should without doubt obey God rather than men (this rule Socrates, in Plato's Apology [p. 29 D], also laid down: 'Men of Athens, I honour and love you; but I shall obey God rather than you.' (J.)); not because the lesser of two evils should be chosen, but because ³² disobedience to a magistrate is not an evil, when it cannot be avoided without a violation of the obedience due to God. For a weaker obligation yields to a stronger, when both cannot be met at the same time.

9. To a doubtful conscience is related a scrupulous conscience, as it is called, when a judgement of the understanding is accompanied by anxious fear that possibly what one decided was good, may turn out to be evil, and vice versa. When a scruple of this kind rests upon probable grounds, action should be suspended until it may be removed by reason or the authority of wise advisers, but when it arises from unmanly superstition, it should be disregarded and banished from the mind. Add Descartes, Les Passions, arts. 170, 177, where for 'fluctuation of the mind' and 'remorse of conscience', which precede an action, he quite properly prescribes this 'remedy', namely, 'to accustom oneself to forming sure and fixed judgements on all matters which one meets.' But it should be added that such judgements are to be formed on a pure and firm moral science or system of natural law, as well as on the Christian religion purged of all the vain additions of men. For although without this the mind can perhaps be so confirmed, that it will not experience remorse and fluctuations of the conscience, still such a firmness does not avail for long, and does not free one from the imputation of sin. Hence the words which follow the above quotation cannot be approved: 'And a man should feel that he has always done his duty when he does what he judges to be better, even though that judgement be the worst possible.' And yet this does not mean that one is curing an ill, but that he is merely drugging the mind by an unsuitable opiate.

10. When there is no intellectual understanding as to whether some action should be undertaken or avoided, it is called ignorance. So far as this concerns our discussion, it is divided with respect to its influence on action, or with respect to its origin. In the former respect it is twofold: Either it is the cause of something which takes place unbeknown to it, or else it is not. The former may be efficacious, the latter concomitant. The former denies to the understanding that knowledge, which, if present, would have prevented the action. Such was the ignorance of Abimelech, Genesis, xx. 4, 5, who would never have conceived the idea of taking Sarah for his wife, had he known she was the wife of Abraham. The latter denies to the understanding that knowledge which would not have prevented the deed; so that a man would have done something just the same, even if he had known what he did not. So a man may in ignorance kill his enemy, whom he would have killed none the less, had he known he was in the place into which he throws his weapon quite casually, and without intending to injure any one. This is illustrated by the remark of the man who threw a stone at a dog, but by a bad aim hit and killed his mother-in-law: 'Fortune plans better than we.' Some wish to distinguish these two forms of ignorance thus: That which proceeds from the former kind may be said to be done simply through ignorance, that from the latter kind, by a man who is ignorant. And yet, even in the latter case, only an accidental homicide has been committed. For that ill-feeling was, to be sure, tainted with evil, but nevertheless it did not contribute to the murder.

With respect to its origin, ignorance is divided into voluntary and involuntary. By some the former is also called consequent and vincible; the latter antecedent and invincible. The former (whether it be directly affected or caused by inattention and laziness) is when a man does not know what he could and should have known. The latter is when a man does not know about a matter which he was neither able nor expected to know. Now invincible ignorance is either such in itself but not in its cause, or both in itself and also in its cause. It is the former when one cannot get rid of, and dispel in an action the ignorance out 33 of which that action arises, and yet one is at fault for falling into such ignorance. So a man who sins because of drunkenness, often does not know what he is doing, but yet he is at fault, because he does not know it. It is the latter, when a man not only does not know what he was unable to know before an action, but he was also not at fault for remaining in such ignorance, or for falling into it. The remarks of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. i, as well as the notes of Eustratius on the passage, apply at this point, where he distinguishes between what is done by one who is ignorant, and what is done through ignorance. As an example of the former is given the act of a drunken man, or of a man in anger. For although such men often do not know what they are doing, still the cause of the action is not ignorance, but drunkenness, or anger, of which the man could have avoided the former, and restrained the latter. And he then adds, that they cannot be said to do wrong involuntarily, who do not know what should be done and what avoided, but he calls this ignorance in election, or ignorance of universals; for every man was expected to know such things. But ignorance which is concerned with particulars, makes an action involuntary, such ignorance regarding the questions as 'who, what, about what, and in what, by what means, [for what cause],¹ and in what way? No sane man can be ignorant of all these together, for certainly he will know that he himself is acting, thus answering the particular 'who?' But regarding the others there is a possibility of ignorance. Those will admit that they have erred in 'what?', who have told what they did not intend to. Another illustration is when one wished merely to show his friend a catapult, but let it go off and wounded him. An illustration of ignorance 'about what' and 'in what' (which are the same thing), is when one mistakes his son for an enemy and kills him. Ignorance in regard to the instrument is when a man would throw at somebody a pointed spear, which he thinks has no point, and so unintentionally kills him. 'For what cause?' is when we apply a medicine to another for his recovery, and do not know that it is poisonous. 'In what way?' is when a man, wishing to give a light blow for the sake of instructing another, inflicts a serious wound.

The Roman Jurisconsults treat under a special head ignorance of law and ignorance of fact. Yet they do not consider ignorance so much for the effect it has on moral actions, as for its influence on the retention, acquisition, or loss of some right or legal action. But what they have to say on both of these points can be reduced to this position, namely, that ignorance of law is for the most part connected with a degree of culpable negligence, but ignorance of fact is not; hence equity directs that the former should be prejudicial to a man, but the latter not.

II. When not only is there no knowledge of the true state of affairs, but also in its place a false belief has so filled the mind that it is held to be true, the mind of man is said to be in error. This error is either superable or insuperable. The former is that which a man should and could have overcome, by using the diligence which is morally possible, or allowed by the common condition of human affairs. The latter is that which a man could not overcome by the use of all diligence morally possible. Here it should be observed that, even allowing the sentiment of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, chap. xlii (add Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xxviii): 'For every one that doth amiss misses his true mark and hath gone astray' (H.), still, since that error was not invincible, the evil deeds consequent upon it cannot be removed from the class of sins, nor can a general pardon be granted them.

12. But it should be carefully observed that error has different effects; touching actions which a man is entirely free to undertake and to neglect, or the exercise of which has been left to his judgement; and touching actions which are commanded or forbidden him by law, or 34 by the order of a superior. In actions of the former kind, error is understood to interfere with consent, so that they are not followed by those effects, which are otherwise likely to flow from an action to which you have consented, especially when the error did not befall you as the result of supine and excessive carelessness. And so in contracts, an error about a thing or some quality of it, in view of which a man was induced to enter the agreement, renders the agreement void. For it is supposed that the man consented not absolutely but because of the supposition of the presence of that thing or quality, on which as a condition he based his consent; and when the thing or quality is not to be found, the agreement also is understood to be void. This point will be discussed more fully below in its proper place.

13. But the case appears to be different, when it concerns necessary actions, or such as are commanded or prohibited by a superior. Here the distinction must be made as to whether the error concerns theory or practice; that is, whether one entertains a false opinion about the necessity of actions, and thinks that what really ought to be performed should be neglected, and vice versa; or whether an error occurs in the very exercise of an action, which gives the action an entirely different application from what was expected. We feel that errors of the former kind do not prevent the imputation of an action to the agent, according as it shall appear to agree or disagree with the rule prescribed, since they are regarded as being in every way superable. For he who wishes to lay down a rule for the actions of another, should make his will so clear that it can be easily understood by the one whom he has undertaken to bind. For it is most unjust to demand obedience to an unknown law, or to one whose inner meaning is beyond the capacity of the minds of those for whom it has been enacted. Therefore, if any one errs in theory, that is, if he has persuaded himself that something has been enjoined upon him, which has actually been forbidden, and vice versa, it is felt that he has not shown proper diligence, and so he cannot avoid the imputation to himself of what was done through his error.

This principle is expressed by others in the following form: If the conscience entertains a superable error about an evil thing, the man sins, whether he acts according to it or contrary to it; that is, if a man has persuaded himself that an action has been enjoined, which was to have been avoided, or that an action should be avoided, which had been enjoined, he sins in performing the former and in avoiding the latter; for such a performance, or such an avoidance, is a real departure from the law, and the agent was able, and under obligation, to understand the full sense of the law. And yet the same man would have sinned no less if he had avoided an action which was in fact forbidden, but which he thought was enjoined; and had he performed an action which was indeed enjoined, but which he thought was forbidden. For although there is here no overt act which is contrary to law, nevertheless, because he thinks that his conscience is following the law, that false moral choice, at least, which is at variance with the law, will be imputed to him as sin. For the evil intention of the agent makes the action appear evil, at least as concerns the agent. Thus it appears that actions which can be imputed to the agent as good cannot proceed from an erroneous judgement of the understanding, and that when a man has been falsely persuaded that a thing is unjust, it is for him illegal, so long as he has not seen the error of his belief. Add Digest, XLVII. xlvi. 8.

14. However, if a speculative error concerns a matter in itself indifferent, that is, if a man be persuaded that something, which is in fact indifferent, should be done or avoided, he will be guilty of sin, only if he has acted from a wicked moral purpose, contrary to what his false apprehension suggested, but not if he has acted in accordance with this error. For things indifferent are beyond the scope of the law, which is, therefore, not violated either by their commission or omission. And an error which affords no occasion to sin, seems harmless. But it is clear that actions originating in such an error cannot have effects like those which otherwise follow actions commanded by laws. Thus, if a legislator had offered a reward to those who obey his laws, certainly¹ that man could not claim it for himself, if by error he had observed indifferent 35 things, on the supposition that they had been fully covered in the laws.

15. But it is more common that an error appears in the exercise of actions enjoined by laws; for instance, if the true object of an action has been withdrawn, and another substituted in its place. So also, if a mistake has been made about the time and place to execute some command. Although such actions are not attended by the effect which actions properly directed to their end produce, they still avoid the effect appropriate to bad actions, since the error was not contracted from any culpable negligence. Others state this principle as follows: An intervening error prevents the action from being imputed to one in either way, either as good or as evil. Seneca, Hercules Raging, [1237]: 'Who ever called an act of madness crime?' (M.) Thus, although you would otherwise be free from the obligation, if you pay a man whom you owe, should you have paid him by error, you have not committed a sin, but the former obligation has not been removed. Again, if any one in good faith, but with ill-considered generosity, has conferred some kindness on a wicked person, who proceeds to use it for evil ends, he will certainly be unable to pride himself on a good deed, but he will be cleared of any connexion with the evil deed, nor will he be held to have contributed anything towards its commission. But when a man has been commanded to examine carefully the object, place, or time of an action, he will have difficulty in escaping the imputation of the effects of the applied action, unless he can prove that his error was morally invincible. Thus, if you command your servant to awaken you at a certain hour of the night, he will not be listened to if he should say that he made a mistake in counting the strokes of the bell; but he will be free from blame, if for some reason the clock was wrong.

16. But it also happens frequently that an error occurs in the execution of an evil action, in that a man misses the object which he had intended. In such a case the malice of the agent will remain the same, but the gravity or unimportance of the act will vary directly with the importance of the object upon which it happened to fall. Thus, if a man who had intended to strike an enemy with a missile, should by chance strike some one else, he will be none the less guilty of homicide. See Digest, XLVII. x. 18, § 3; Digest, XLVIII. viii. 14; Grotius, Florum Sparsio on this passage. But the crime itself will be considered more or less grave, according to the worth or meanness of the man who is dead of a wound intended for another. Here belongs the case of a man unintentionally killing some one else, when he wished merely to wound him or to inflict a minor injury upon him, for in such a case judgement is rendered on the basis of the fact itself. But when an action, although going wrong, happens to light upon a lawful object, there will be no further evil than that which emanates from the evil intention of the agent, so that such an error will prevent the act from coming under the name of the crime which¹ a man intended to commit. And so the saying of Seneca, On the Steadfastness of the Wise Man, chap. vii, will not hold good, at least in a civil court: 'If a man lies with his wife as if she were a stranger, he will commit adultery, but his wife will not.' Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. II, chap. xix; Bk. V, chap. xiii, towards the end. But compare Libanius, Declamations, xxxv (p. 780 B, C, D, ed. Morellius).

ON THE WILL OF MAN AS IT CONCURS IN MORAL ACTIONS

SINCE the most wise Creator wished to make man an animal to be governed by laws, He implanted in his soul a will, as an internal director of his actions, so that after objects were proposed and understood, he might be able to move himself to them by an intrinsic principle apart from any physical necessity, and be able to choose what seemed to him the most fitting; as well as turn from those which did not seem agreeable to him. Now the will is conceived as working in human actions through two faculties, through one of which it is understood to act spontaneously, through the other freely. To spontaneity, so to speak, men attribute certain acts or motions, of which some are internal, usually called 'elicit' [elicit], others external, usually called 'enjoined' [imperati]. The former are those which are produced immediately by the will and are received back by the same. Some of these are concerned with the end, such as volition, intention, fruition; others with the means, as consent, choice, and use. Volition is that act of the will by which it is merely carried to the end, without any consideration whether it be present or absent; that is, an act by which the end is only approved. Others call this the will of simple approbation, whereby something is apprehended as being agreeable with the nature and inclination of some person, although he has not yet started actually and effectively to produce or to attain it. Intention or choice is a desire capable of securing an end; that is, it is an act of the will, whereby it effectively moves toward an absent end, and strives by action to produce or attain it. Since this act is joined with attempt and hope of attaining that end, it is easy to gather what are the things with which it is concerned. They are, as Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. iv, observes: 'It seems to be a general law that our moral purpose is confined to such things as lie within our power. A man embraces what he thinks is within his own power.' Therefore 'moral purpose is not concerned with what is beyond our power'.¹ (W.) Ibid., Bk. VI, chap. ii:

Nothing that is past can be an object of the moral purpose. For we deliberate not upon what is past but upon what is future or contingent; but the past cannot be undone. Thus Agathon says rightly enough:

God himself lacks this power alone
To make what has been done undone. (W.)

Now although there are many degrees of intention, according to its variation in strength, yet for the purpose of civil life it is usually divided into plenary and semi-plenary. The former term is used when the will, after sufficiently examining a thing, and without having been swept away by the violence of its passions, directs itself towards something; a semi-plenary will is when sufficient deliberation has not been taken, or the reason was carried away by a swirl of passions. Fruition is the peace or delight of the will in an end now obtained and present. The opposite of this is repentance, which is usually joined with shame and grief, and is an aversion to something which we before intended or accomplished. Consent is a simple approbation of means, in so far as they are judged useful to some end; these means, when once in our possession, are selected by choice to secure some end, and applied to use. Acts are termed 'enjoined' [imperati] which are turned over for 37 execution by other human faculties, as these are moved by the will.

2. Freedom, men call a faculty of the will, whereby, given all things requisite for acting, it is able, from among many objects before it, to choose one, or some, and to reject the rest; or, if but one object be presented, it may admit or not admit it, do or not do it. Requisites for acting are sometimes summed up under the single word 'occasion', from which requisites the final determination of the agent is considered to be a separate thing; and when determination is added to the other requisites, action at once follows. Now the requisites connected with liberty are distinguished from that aid to actions which is furnished by the man himself. But more particularly the faculty of choosing, from among many objects, one or several, is called liberty of specification or contrariety; the faculty which is concerned with the choice or rejection of but one object, is called liberty of contradiction or of exercise.

Now liberty is supposed to add to spontaneity, firstly, an indifference as to the exercise of its acts, so that the will is under no necessity to exert one of its acts, that is, to will or to refuse, but, touching a particular object before it (for in general it cannot help but turn to that which is good as such, or renounce evil as such), it may choose whatever action it please, although chance may incline it more to one than to another. Liberty also adds a free determination, so that the will¹ by an internal impulse may choose here and now either of its acts, that is, to will or to refuse.

It should, however, be added, that, even though it may seem to a man that something should be desired or avoided, this is not dependent on the will but on the state of the object, according as it presents an appearance of good or evil; although that desire or aversion, which thus follows the appearance of the object, is not so strong but that there still remains to the will the liberty to shape itself to some outward action upon the object; especially since the appearance of an evil thing can seem desirable only so long as another evil is at its side. Hence, in order to refute the idea of Hobbes, De Homine, chap. xi, § 2, that appetite and aversion necessarily follow our preconception of some pleasure or trouble, which will arise from those objects, and that, therefore, no place is left for free will, we must carefully distinguish a volition of simple approbation, from an effective volition or previous choice, the latter of which does not necessarily depend upon particular objects. He employs in the following words an idle subtlety when he says: 'When we say that a man has a free will to do this or that, it must always be understood with this further condition: if he pleases; for to say that any one has a free will to do this or that, whether he pleases or not, is absurd.' Surely no one is so stupid as not to recognize that this implies a contradiction. Besides, it is folly to wish to add to the proposition, as a condition, the very thing which it asserts. That a man is able to desire to do a thing, if he so desires, is as if I should say, 'Peter runs, if he runs.' Who would call this added clause a condition? From what has been said, it is also clear what one should think of the remarks of Antoine Le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae, Pt. vii, art. 5; as if a man could not desire what he clearly and distinctly perceives to be good, and vice versa; and that a man sins only because he does not clearly and distinctly perceive the good.

3. But the chief affection of the will, which seems to rise immediately from its very nature, is that it is not restrained intrinsically to a definite, fixed, and invariable mode of acting, which affection we shall denominate indifference, and that this intrinsic indifference cannot be entirely destroyed by an extraneous means. And this must be maintained all the more firmly because upon its removal the morality of human actions is at once entirely destroyed. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xvii:

What, I say, can overcome impulse but another impulse; and what can overcome the will 38 to get or the will to avoid except another will to get or to avoid? 'If he threatened me with death', one says, 'he compels me.' No, it is not what he threatens you with which compels you, but your own decision that it is better to do what you are bidden than to die. Once more, then, it is your own judgement which compels you—that is, will puts pressure on will. (M.)

Idem, Bk. I, chap. xxix: 'The will may conquer itself, but nothing else can conquer it.' (M.) Add Simplicius,¹ On Epictetus, chap. i, p. 22.

And yet it must be held that they are doing this very thing, who imagine some sort of physical determination in human actions, according to which even the very movement in itself, considered as a physical entity, is so determined by the first cause that it cannot take place in any other manner than as it has been determined, and its morality arises afterward from a second cause. The same thing is done by those who wish to lay human actions under an absolute necessity due to divine foreknowledge. Granted that this foreknowledge cannot be deceived, still, that it does not at once destroy the indifference of the will, can be easily understood, if we either clear the word foreknowledge from the imperfection which it seems to imply, in common with other words which are drawn from human affairs, and applied to God (since with God there is no succession of time); or, if we say that the divine concurrence accompanies secondary causes in such a way as to leave to them the ability to act in the way assigned them by God, and yet without lowering them, as concerns moral actions, from the class of principal causes to that of mere instrumental causes. Add Lucian, Minos [Dialogues of the Dead, xxx]; Jupiter confutatus; Antoine Le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae, Pt. VIII, chap. xvii-xviii. Grotius, Opuscula de Dogmatis Reipublicae Noxiis, gives good warning how dangerous such ideas are to the state. "Those who completely take away free will can scarcely escape making God the author of all crimes; a thing which Plato said should by no means be allowed in a state (Republic, Bk. II [p. 379]: "The causes for evil should be sought anywhere but in God.") Suetonius, Tiberius, chap. lxix, quite properly says that Tiberius despised all religions because he believed that everything took place by fate; and Proclus, On Timaeus, agrees with this, since he says that those whom he calls atheists fall into three groups: the first comprises those who deny that God takes any interest in the universe and in the acts of men; [. . .] the third comprises those who ascribe to God so great an interest that man is under necessity to do whatever is done, and no liberty is left to him. The philosopher Sallust, De Diis et Mundo, chap. ix: "To ascribe to Fate injustice and wantonness is to make out ourselves good and the gods evil." Also in Plautus, The Pot of Gold [743 f.], when one person says: 'I think it must have been fated; otherwise it wouldn't have happened, I'm sure of that'; the other [Euclio] neatly¹ retorts: 'Yes, and I think it must have been fated that I'm to shackle you at my house and murder you.' (N.)

4. But some preliminary remarks should be made concerning the nature of good, so that the indifference of the will may be correctly apprehended. Now good is considered in an absolute way by some philosophers, so that every entity, actually existing, may be considered good; but we pay no attention to such a meaning, and consider a thing as good only in so far as it has a respect to others, and it is understood to be good for some person, or on his behalf. Taken in this sense the nature of good seems to consist in an aptitude whereby one thing is fitted to help, preserve, or complete another. And since this aptitude depends on the very nature of things, whether this nature be native or adapted by some contrivance, that good which we can call natural, is firm and uniform, and in no way dependent on the erroneous or changeable opinions of men. But since good does not arouse a voluntary appetite on the part of man, unless it be perceived, at least in a general way; and since true sense or perception gives only a rough 39 idea of the real being of things and what may come from it; since also errors often deceive the very mind itself, and impede the force of senses and passions, it results that certain persons incorrectly assign an idea of good to some thing, and so a good arises which is called imaginary. Moreover, individual men seek and love a certain thing according as they think it has something for their advantage, and will aid in their preservation and improvement; while the opposite things they regard as evil and avoid. But just as it is not required of a thing to be good and to have some power to attract the desire, that it be held a good only for him alone who seeks it, and to the degree that it is taken away from the advantage to another, especially since the social ties and intercourse of other men can give advantage to us, as well as to themselves; so among all men there is so wholehearted an agreement on the general nature of good, and of its main divisions and kinds, that there would appear to be no compelling reason why the general, and therefore unbroken and uniform, idea of good should be denied, because of a difference on some particulars, or why it should depend solely in a state of liberty on the opinion of one man, in a commonwealth on that of the highest in authority, and be weighed by that opinion alone. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. iii, where he refutes certain errors of Hobbes on the nature of good, and chap. i, § 20. Moral good, which is found in the actions of men, is treated below in its proper place.

From what has been said it is clear that it belongs to the nature of the will always to seek what is inherently good, and to avoid what is inherently evil. For it implies a clear contradiction that you should not incline to what you see is agreeable to you, and should incline to what you feel is not agreeable. And so this general inclination of the will can admit no indifference, as though the will might seek good and evil by an appetite of simple approbation. But the will of individuals exerts the force of its indifference on particular goods and evils, as men incline to different things at particular times. And this is so because scarcely any things good or evil appear to a man uncontaminated and distinct, but intermixed, evil with good and good with evil. This is accompanied by the personal inclination of individuals towards special things, nor is it given to all men to distinguish the substantial and enduring from the simulated and transitory; hence comes the almost infinite variety in the wishes and desires of men, all seeking their own advantage, indeed, but each by a different road.

Furthermore, many men do not know what things are good for them and so do not desire them; many because of outward signs of evil do not measure the advantage attached, and so reject what should have been desired, while they desire what should have been shunned. This point is made by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. vi:

It will perhaps be best to say that in an absolute or true sense it is the good which is the object of wish, but that in reference to the individual it is that which appears to be good. (W.)

You may apply here the words of Gunther, Ligurinus,¹ Bk. III [289 ff.]:

If one speaks false alone he can deceive no man;
Untruth creeps in through imaged truth, deceives the ear
By stealth, and dominates the mind.

Hence, in almost any thing or action, aspects of good and evil, both real and apparent, present themselves and draw the mind this way and that way until finally the will by some intrinsic power determines on one side or the other. An action undertaken in this way is called spontaneous, according to Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. xiii [III. iii]: 'An action would appear to be voluntary, if the agent originates it with a knowledge of the particular circumstances.'

40 (W.*) On this passage Eustratius observes:

Both the following factors are necessary for a spontaneous decision, namely, that the principle be in the agent, and that the agent know the particulars; for he who acts from ignorance has the principle, and he who knows the particulars can be led to action by compulsion.

5. But it does not always happen that the mind, from a state of equilibrium, as it were, brings itself to some action or non-action without the influence of any external force. Oftentimes, rather, from different causes it is violently led to one path, sometimes an external compulsion falling upon it with such force that it can no longer be considered master of its own strength. In the same way the mariner does not always speed with a favouring wind, but is sometimes buffeted by gales and can scarcely hold the steering gear, or again is hurled from the helm to yield his vessel to the will of the winds.

Therefore, among the things which make the will of man incline to different ends, are to be classed the individual qualities of mind by which some become strongly inclined to a particular course of action, qualities to be found as much in whole nations as in individuals. To their production, it seems, the heaven above us contributes not a little, as well as the character of the soil, as Lucan, Bk. VIII [365], says:

The mildness of the climate makes the nations effeminate.

Herodotus, Bk. IX [cxxii]:

Nature has so ruled that soft countries give birth to soft men, nor is there any region which produces very delightful fruits, and at the same time men of a warlike spirit. (R.)

Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xlii. Their production is also affected by the temperature of the humours of the body, arising from the race to which a man belongs, his age, food, health, manner of life, and other causes, by the form of the organs which the mind uses in performing its functions, and similar considerations. Add Hobbes, De Homine, chap. xiii, and Bacon of Verulam, The Advancement of Learning, Bk. IV, chap. i. Regarding all these factors it should be maintained that no one of them, in so far as they influence the production of any moral act, has enough power in any way to turn the will from its course. Horace, Satires, Bk. II, sat. viii [Epistles, I. i. 39-40]: 'No one is so uncouth that he cannot grow refined if he but lend a willing ear to culture.' Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. I [ii. 23]: 'Now I believe that everything fair and noble can be attained by study and effort.' And although it does not seem possible at times for the will to prevent some impulses, based on the very constitution of the body, from making themselves felt, and even breaking forth into action, still it can at least prevent their breaking into sin. Thus, if one be so strongly moved by the desire of love that he cannot restrain them, it is still within his power to satisfy them without sin. See I Corinthians, vii. 2. And Plato, On Laws, Bk. VIII, rightly claims that unnatural vice can be suppressed in a Greek state, although among that people and at that time it had a strong hold on public morals. The same conclusion must be drawn about much that is said concerning the morals of the age, in the Art of Poetry of Horace, and by other authors in general. So, granted that old men are inclined to avarice, it will still be within their power to gain wealth without injury to others, and without depriving them unjustly of their property. Add Huartes, Scrutinium Ingeniorum, chap. v.

6. Another thing which also strongly inclines the will to certain acts is the repetition of the same acts, and the consequent familiarity with them, which causes an action to be undertaken easily and gladly, and the mind to seem, as it were, drawn to an object before it. And inclinations of such sort, when joined with desire and adroitness in action, commonly go under the name of habits, which are called virtues and vices, in so far as they are concerned with good and bad moral acts. There is no need to weary ourselves in enumerating these, since most of those who have thus far announced their intention to discuss moral philosophy believed that they have expounded the greater part of 41 their science when they have explained the names of the eleven virtues. Let it suffice to remark in general, that those dispositions of men's minds are virtues which move men to actions that conserve themselves and society; and those are vices which make men inclined to do what tends to destroy themselves and society. In this connexion Hobbes, De Homine, chap. xiii, § 9, is deserving of criticism, when he says that 'only in civil life can there be a common measure for virtues and vices'; and therefore, 'there is no such a measure, in a state of nature, by which virtue or vice can be weighed and defined'. For surely the definition just proposed by us can apply also in a state of nature. And whatever things are commanded as virtues in states, should be demanded on the measure of this definition. And if in a state anything¹ be enjoined, with which that definition does not square, such an injunction should be considered absurd. The variation to be seen in the laws of different states does not make impossible the existence of a common and uniform definition of virtues. For this diversity is either concerned with those things which lie outside moral laws; or it arises from the fact that sometimes the force of civil law is added to some precept of natural law, and sometimes not; or, finally, it is an indication that some legislators were not befriended by a sane reason. This topic will be treated more fully below.

Now vices and evil manners, developed by long habit, seem to become so engrained in a man's nature, that they can be resisted only with great difficulty. Calpurnius Flaccus, Declamations, ii: 'When once shame has vanished, no disgrace is unlovely to minds bent upon vice.' Lucian, Adversus Indoctum [xxv]: 'For when a dog has once learned to gnaw leather,² he cannot stop.' Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xxxvii. And yet actions proceeding from such a nature do not cease to be considered spontaneous. Nay, even if those actions, by which a habit is formed, and which precede it, are undertaken with a stronger previous choice, and with a stronger effort, than those that follow the acquisition of a habit, when as it were of their own accord, and without the command of the will, the rest of the faculties rush to an object, still this fact should not detract from their quality of good or evil. For surely it would not be fitting, that an action be accounted less good, because it has been often undertaken by the same person; or that he should be held to have sinned less, who has sinned often; especially since such a person himself would be largely responsible for his acting so easily and readily. On this point Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. viii, [vii] observes:

But actions and moral states are not voluntary in the same sense. For while we are masters of our actions from beginning to end, inasmuch as we know the particulars, we are masters only of the beginnings of our moral states; we do not perceive the particular steps by which they advance, as we do not perceive the particular steps in diseases. But as it was in our power to act in one way or another, our moral states are voluntary. (W.)

On this passage Eustratius remarks:

We have a control only over the beginning of habits, not over their increase and end. For their additions and increase are not known and not perceived, since, indeed, they grow gradually and unobserved, and so some now and then go to greater lengths in depravity and vice than they could have desired. This can be seen in the case of drunkenness and debauchery, in which men advance a bit freely and carelessly, as if the contraction of a habit were in our power, and acquire a habit by continued acts before they realize it. Nor is it merely in the case of vices that additions and increments are not noticed, but in virtues also the advance is made without our realizing it, so that no one can recognize his own progress until he has made it.

7. The will is also in no slight degree impelled to certain actions, 42 by those motions of the mind, which are chiefly stirred by the appearance of good or evil in some object, and are called passions; while in addition they greatly becloud the judgement of the mind. Pindar, Olympian Odes, vii [30-1]: 'Tumult of mind hath ere now caused even the wise man to go astray.' (S.) Their number, how they are aroused and calmed, and their use have been ably discussed first of all by Descartes, Les Passions, and Antoine Le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae, Pt. VII, chap. xix. With these may be compared Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. vi; De Homine, chap. xii. For our purpose it is enough to add that the passions, however violent they be, do not entirely extinguish the power of the will, but even those who have rather weak spirits can acquire an absolute control over all their passions provided they devote sufficient industry to their formation and control, as is shown by Descartes, Ibid., art. 50. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. I, chap. iii [IV. xiv. 31]: 'All the disorders and perturbations of the mind proceed from a neglect of reason.' (Y.) And Medea is wrong when she says in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VII [19]: 'But some strange power holds me down¹ against my will'; especially since she herself recognizes that the dictate of her reason is struggling with her passion: 'Desire persuades one way, reason another. I see the better and approve it, but I follow the worse.' Not irrelevant also are the remarks of Grotius, On Matthew, v. 22, namely, that τὸ πάθος, ἡ ὁρμή, and ἡ συγκατάθεσις, are different. Πάθος itself, or the faculty by which we can be angered, τὸ θυμοειδές, planted in us by nature, cannot be plucked out of our being, and is one of those intermediate qualities whose use may be either good or bad. But because that part of the mind, in which τὰ πάθη [the passions] are seated, is in itself ἄλογος [incapable of reason], it happens, that, without expecting any judgement of the reason, ὁρμαί [impulses] exert their force; and unless these are carefully held in check, there follows a συγκατάθεσις [consent], when, in other words, that part of the mind, which was bestowed upon man so as to restrain his passions, lets go the reins and allows itself to be drawn along. And this συγκατάθεσις [consent] is voluntary, and is given at the will of man. But by diligent attention and exercise, and above all by the aid of the Holy Spirit, even these first motions, which philosophers compare to the twinklings of the eyes, can be restrained both from lasting too long and becoming too strong. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. iv.

Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, §§ 26-7, shows how man has been endowed by nature with special powers to curb the passions, and how at the same time his life and strength are more seriously threatened, than are those of other animals, from violent and ill-controlled passions, and how, therefore, he is under greater necessity to restrain them. And so, since some passions are aroused by an appearance of good, and others by an appearance of evil, and they urge one on to acquire some good or avoid some evil, the difference is observed between them, that the former allow little or no excuse, if anything was done on their impulse, other than that which was proper, while the latter allow more indulgence, according as the evil which excited them threatens a greater disaster for man's nature. For it is much easier to go without a good which is not necessary for nature's preservation, than it is to admit an evil that tends to its destruction, as Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. II, chap. ii, says: 'It is more difficult to contend against pleasure than against anger.' (W.) And if any one has done evil in acceding to the continued call of vice, it is understood that he has exposed himself to the fortune of some future evil for a pleasure at hand, and when he has enjoyed the fruit of some thing, which, in his judgement, was worth whatever evil might come of it, he can under no pretext demand that the evil be reduced. But the man who has done wrong, in fear of some impending evil, is strongly defended by the weakness of human nature, because he wished to get off with the lightest evil he thought possible. This point will have to be discussed at greater length in another connexion.

8. Finally, the will is powerfully enticed to some kind of action by 43 drunkenness, caused usually from a drink, or fumes of different kinds, or also by opium, which is most eagerly sought after throughout a large part of the Orient, and which sets the spirit and blood into a most violent disturbance, excites them, and renders men liable first of all to lust (Propertius, Bk. IV [viii. 32]:

When the wine is in her, one lover will be all too few. (B.)

anger, and rashness; and Lycurgus calls wine 'an evil medicine because it turns men's minds'. (Hyginus, Fables, 132.) Isocrates, To Demonicus, [32]: 'For when the mind is destroyed by wine, it is like chariots which have lost their drivers; for as they rush on without control for the loss of men to guide them, so the soul often stumbles when the intelligence is destroyed.' (F.) For this reason the law of Minos¹ among the Cretans was 'not to drink with others unto drunkenness' (Plato, Minos [320 A]). Add Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XIV, chap. xxii. Aristophanes, The Wasps [1253 ff.]:

Drinking ain't good: I know what comes of drinking,
Breaking of doors, assault, and battery,
And then, a headache and a fine to pay. (R.)

Among the Hindus drunkenness is so condemned as to be reckoned one of the five most heinous sins, which are: Intercourse with one's mother, the term including mother-in-law and wife of one's teacher; murder of a Brahmin; theft of gold; drunkenness; and contact with those who do the above. Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. V [226]:

Besides, excess in wine inflames their fire,
And Bacchus makes their fury blaze the higher. (C.)

Mahomet made use of religion to withdraw nations highly addicted to wine from its use.

Whoever voluntarily contracts this habit, since he knew, or was able to presume, its effects, has no more right to demand that injuries committed through it should not be imputed to him, than has one who has himself in a rage torn the roof from his house, to complain at the rain pouring into it. Plautus, The Pot of Gold [750 f.]: 'Drink is altogether too cheap, if the drunkard can do what he likes and not suffer for it.' (N.*). Yet in indifferent actions, and those which one may undertake or avoid at his own pleasure, a drunkenness which has completely dulled the mind has this force, namely, that the effect which would have followed, had it been undertaken deliberately, does not follow the act.

Now these are the causes which give to the will a physical bias, as it were. But in a moral way an obligation inclines it most, or ought to incline it, which, however, no matter how great it be, does not remove the intrinsic liberty of the will, nor make an action² involuntary, however strongly base desires may perhaps pull in the opposite direction. To this you may apply the words of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. iii: 'But it would seem irrational to assert that such things as ought to be the objects of desire are desired involuntarily.' (W.) We say, however, that obligation ought to incline the will, for such is the baseness of the minds of men that often the mere forbidding of a thing excites the lust to sin. Ovid, Amores, Bk. III, el. iv [9 ff.]:

We ever strive for what is forbid, and ever covet what is denied. Whatever is guarded we desire the more, and care itself invites the thief. 'Tis forbidden joys delight. She to whom erring is free, errs less;³ very power makes less quick the seeds of sin. (S.)

² [For actionum read actionem.—Tr.]

This sin you may more exactly credit in part to the base curiosity of men, to whom everything unknown appears wonderful¹—a conclusion amply confirmed by the harshness of the interdict of it, and by the trouble involved in obeying it; in part, to hatred and disrespect for the person who has issued the interdict, whereby we disdain to have our liberty limited by one towards whom we feel so ill, while on the contrary it is a characteristic of love, when a man gladly accedes to the will of the person whom he loves.²

9. It should be observed, further, that sometimes in the face of most grave ills, and such as are held to exceed the ordinary strength of man's mind, the will is under so strong a compulsion that it agrees to undertake something from which it would shrink in perfect horror were it not under such necessity. Such actions, being partly voluntary and 44 partly involuntary, are called mixed. For they are voluntary, in so far as their principle is in the agent, who knows everything that is involved in the action, and in so far as the will, for the present moment, and from necessity, turns toward such actions as the lesser evil, or but a part of an evil, since any other course would plunge it into an entire or greater evil. And this in the present situation imitates the nature of good, since it is impossible for both the lesser and the greater evil to be avoided at the same time. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. vii: 'The lesser evil in comparison with the greater counts as a good.' (W.) Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. iv [12]: 'In a comparison of evils the less is to be regarded as a good.' (W.) The following passage of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i, applies here:

No one throws anything overboard willingly in the abstract, yet every sensible person will do it for his own safety and the safety of his fellow passengers. Actions like this, although they are of a mixed character, are more like voluntary than involuntary actions. (W.)

But actions of this nature have an involuntary character because the will is forced to them, contrary to its own inclination, since it would never undertake them, if it could escape the greater evil in any other way. For this reason they have this in common with involuntary actions, that the moral effects which follow other purely voluntary actions are in these entirely, or at least largely, lacking. For although, once in a while, so strong an obligation is laid upon one that it ought not to be refused, even at the threat of death, regarded as the most terrifying of natural evils; yet when such an obligation is not expressly evident, it is by no means easily presumed, as being too hard for man's condition; and when it is not actually present, it would be folly for one not to wish to come off with the least possible evil. Hence some things, which would have merited reproof, if done without such a cause, are praised by fair-minded men, if they are undertaken under the pressure of such a necessity; some are held to be more deserving of pity than indignation, others are entirely or partially excused, and the odium and guilt of the action rest in the last analysis on another, while the man who executed the deed is adjudged innocent. This principle is illustrated by the words of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i:

Such actions are at times subjects of praise, when people submit to something that is shameful (that is, unbecoming) or painful for the sake of gaining what is great and noble. There are also some actions which are pardonable, although not laudable, as when a person is induced to do what is wrong by such causes as are too strong for human nature, and do not admit of resistance. Yet it is probable that there are some actions where compulsion is an impossibility: a person would rather suffer the most dreadful form of death than do them. (W.)

Add Eustratius, ad loc. But I doubt whether it were worthy, especially on the part of a Christian Bishop, in this connexion, to give the following example of a mixed action: 'Intercourse with another man's wife, though wrong, becomes no longer wrong when it is the means of assassinating a tyrant.'

10. Lastly, since the requirements for a voluntary action are: (1) that the principle of the motion be in the agent, or that the agent move to the deed by the impulse of his own will, and (2) that he know what would be the outcome; it is clear, that, in the absence of either or both of these factors, the action is made involuntary. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i: 'It is generally admitted that acts done under compulsion, or from ignorance, are involuntary.' Touching the latter he very properly adds, Ibid., Bk. III, chap. ii: 'If an action is to be called involuntary because of such ignorance,¹ it is necessary that it should be painful to the agent, and should excite in him a feeling of regret.' (W.) An action is properly called compulsory, when a man is compelled by an extrinsic stronger principle to apply his body to it, and this in such a way that he shows his aversion and dissent by patent signs, and especially by a bodily reluctance or opposition. 45 Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i, gives an example: 'If the wind, or people who have us in their power, were to carry us in a certain direction.' (W.) In this class falls the example of the warship driven by the force of a tempest into the harbour of the Rhodians, which the state treasurer wished, according to their law, to confiscate, in Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II. So the friends of Lucretia 'comfort her distressed mind, by transferring the guilt from the ravished one to the author of the crime, saying that the mind, and not the body, sins, and that if there was no intent, there was no guilt', as the story is given in Livy, Bk. I, chap. lviii.

This reluctance is assumed, in a court of law, to be present in such actions or experiences which, in the general opinion, were not undergone voluntarily, and in the absence of all signs of actual consent; and this is called by some interpretative reluctance. Now the Hebrew law held that a virgin had suffered violence, when a man had lain with her in the fields and no witnesses were present. But Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [p. 608], denies that the law protects a maiden who has in solitude willingly given herself to a ravisher. Neither can the same law work to the hurt of a maiden, who, in a city, was unable to cry out, or cried in vain. A compulsory thing is such in itself, but not in its cause, when a person is for the present in such a state that he cannot repel an attempted violence; but he was at fault for getting into such a state. To this class you may refer the violation of Dinah, as told in Genesis xxxiv, for the maiden should not have wandered among strangers. It is compulsory in itself, and in its cause as well, when some one was not at fault for getting into such a state, whereby he could be forced into something. We say, 'If he was not at fault,' that is, if he undertook nothing but according to the laws of duty and prudence. For if a man performs a task assigned him, or uses his native right in some other way, and yet is not acting rashly, nor without forethought, he cannot be held responsible for anything that he is forced to do under these conditions.

Now that we have in accordance with our undertaking explained the understanding and will, as the principles from which the actions of men draw the right to be placed in a class distinct from the actions of beasts, it is our next task to examine moral actions in general, since this study of ours is chiefly concerned with the investigation of their¹ rectitude or depravity. Moral actions are, therefore, the voluntary actions of a man considered with the imputation of their effects in common life. We call those actions voluntary which so depend upon a man's will as a free cause, that without its determination, proceeding from its acts as they are drawn from a previous cognition of the understanding, they would not take place; and the performance or non-performance of which rests within the power of man. These are here considered, not in so far as they are movements produced by some power through the nature of things, but in so far as they proceed from a decision of the will, which has the power² to turn to either one of two contradictory courses. For a voluntary act contains two things: The first is material, which is the motion of a power existing by its nature, or its exercise considered in itself; the second is formal, which is the dependence of that motion or exercise on the decision of the will, according to which dependence the action is regarded as decided by a cause that is free and self-determining. The exercise itself, considered apart and in itself, is, for purposes of distinction, called an act of the will, or an act arising from the power in man of willing, rather than a voluntary act. Furthermore, we may consider a voluntary act either in itself and absolutely, according as some physical motion is undertaken by a previous decision of the will, or reflexively, regarding the degree to which its effects can be imputed to a man. Voluntary actions which have this reflexive feature are by a special usage of the word called 'human'. And from the fact that a man is said to be of good or bad morals, according as he performs those actions well or ill, or according as they do or do not agree with some law as their norm, as also the fact that the inclinations of men's minds, resulting from repeated actions, are called morals, it has come about that human actions themselves are designated by the term moral actions.

2. The essence of moral actions, considered in the way just mentioned, includes two elements, the one material, the other formal. The material element is any physical motion of some physical force, whether it be of the locomotive faculty, of the sensitive appetite, of external and internal senses, or of the understanding, so far as concerns the exercise of apprehension. For a judgement is so dependent upon the apparent quality of an object, that in regard to it there is no place for direction by the will, although in forming that judgement there are some opportunities for our own choice and activity. Indeed, an act of the will, considered in its own natural being, or viewed in a narrow sense as an effect, is a product of a power implanted in it as such by nature, as may also be the restraint of some physical motion which a man could exercise either in itself or in its cause. For a man may be liable for punishment by an act of avoidance, as well as by one of commission. Moral actions include also the inclinations of natural powers toward certain objects, inclinations prepared by previous moral actions, at least so far as they furnish spurs for action. And not alone can my motions or habits, or the privation of either, be the material of my moral actions, but also all these as they proceed directly from others, provided that they can and should be governed by my will. Thus at Sparta the lover settled for the shortcomings of the object of his affections (Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. III, chap. x).

Nay, my moral actions can even be furnished material by the actions or operations of animals, vegetables, and inanimate things, if they are capable of a direction that comes from my will. So, in the very law of God, the damage inflicted by a goring ox is charged to the owner, provided he knew beforehand of the tendency of the animal. Add Digest, I. i, at end; Digest, IX. 1, 2 and 3; Digest, IX. ii. 11, 5; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VIII, tit. iv, chap. xvi. Thus a vine-dresser is responsible, if it be due to his negligence that the vine has wasted all its power of bearing by putting out shoots. So also the destruction caused by a fire is laid to him who started it, and damages by the sea or a river to those who broke the dikes, or failed to keep them in repair. Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. x [33], has given an orator's example of this:

A flute-player, who had played a Phrygian tune to a priest while he was sacrificing, is accused, after the priest has been driven to madness, and has thrown himself over a precipice, of having been the cause of his death. (Ibid., Bk. VII, chap. iii [31]): Some youths, 47 who were in the habit of associating together, agreed to dine on the sea-shore. One of them being absent from the dinner, the others erected a sort of tomb to him, and inscribed his name upon it. His father, returning from a voyage across the sea, landed at that part of the coast, and, on reading his son's name, hanged himself. These youths are said to be the cause of the father's death. (W.)

Finally, admissions or receptions of the acts of another, can be the material of my moral acts, in so far as it was my fault that they took place. Thus the woman is held partly accountable in rape if she rashly went to places where she could have foreseen that she might suffer violence.

3. The formality of a moral action consists of its 'imputativity', so to speak, whereby the effect of a voluntary action can be imputed to an agent, or can be considered as belonging to him in a special way, whether the agent himself produced the physical effect also, or caused its production by others. And, from this formality of the action, the agent also shares in the denomination of morality, and is called a moral cause. Hence it is clear that the real basis [ratio formalis] of a moral cause, strictly speaking, lies in its imputation, as imputation, however, concerns its purpose, and so it is nothing other than the voluntary agent to whom the effect is or should be imputed, because he is its author in whole or in part; and therefore, whatever its acceptance carried of good or evil, must be referred to him, and he must be held responsible for both. Thus one man is the moral cause for an injury to another, whether he has raised a bump on his head with his own hands, or broken it with a club, or turned dogs loose upon him, or sent murderers after him. Thus Anah is the moral cause of mules (Genesis, xxxvi, 24),¹ and Jacob of the different colours in the sheep of Laban (Genesis, xxx, 37). Thus Lysias, in his speech Against Agoratus [xiii. 87], who as an informer had caused the death of many citizens, says: 'Is not he who was responsible for their death a red-handed murderer?' Ovid, Heroides, ep. ii [147-8]:

Demophoon 'twas sent Phyllis to her doom;
Her guest was he, she loved him well.
He was the cause that brought her death to pass;
Her own the hand by which she fell. (S.)

Yet he who has furnished only the occasion for another to do something, cannot always be considered the moral cause of the deed. Hence it was not merely a stupid sentence but a cruel one as well, when Cn. Piso, as reported by Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. xvi, gave the following reason for sentencing a soldier to death, for whose fancied death another had been condemned: 'You I order to be executed, because you have been the cause of your comrade's condemnation.' (S.)

Nor does there seem to be any reason for our joining with the author [Velthuysen] of the Dissertatio de Principiis Justitiae et Decori, p. 161, in distinguishing between a moral cause in itself, and a moral cause by accident. For the expression cause by accident is obscure, and likely to lead to idle controversies; while if no effect of an action can be properly imputed to a man, we may by no means call him a moral cause, however greatly he contributed to the material element of the action. It is, however, clear that it makes a great deal of difference regarding the seriousness of imputation, to learn how far a person was the principal of an action; as well as to ascertain whether a person really intended a certain effect, or whether it was attained through his ignorance, or through some other accompanying factor. For in the case last mentioned, the act would be imputed to one, because it was against the laws of prudence or foresight, not against those of justice; and so one is judged to have acted imprudently perhaps or hastily, but not maliciously.

However, it would not be beside the point to consider a little more fully what is set forth in the passage referred to above. Our author [Velthuysen] first of all lays down the following rule:

Whatever is evil by its own nature and can under no circumstances become good, may by accident follow upon the use or defence of my right, without my thereby incurring the guilt of sin, and I am not for this reason obliged to abstain from the use of my right.

Grotius, Book III, chap. i, § 4, also lays down a similar law, but wisely amends it both there and in Bk. III, chap. ii, § 9. Our author 48 continues: 'A sin is said to follow by accident upon another free act, when there follows upon the use of a thing for which I have a right, some effect which I have no right to produce except by such a use of the thing.' There might be given, as an example of this maxim, that which is commonly called by theologians an 'accepted offence', regarding which they say that a person should not omit an honest, pious, and due act, no matter how much offence some base fellow may take from it; and they prove this by the example of our Saviour. Because of His example, surely, no use should be made of the phrase 'cause by accident', for even with this saving clause added, it is blasphemy to call the fount of all good a cause of evil. It should rather be said that he who has committed a good and necessary act, at which another has taken offence, can in no way be considered the cause of the sin which the other consequently commits. This is practically what is meant when we say: 'He who uses his own right does an injury to no man.'

He adds further: 'Since everyone has the right to preserve his health, the use of a drug is proper to recover one's health, although such use may be followed by insanity (for a short time), or drunkenness, or (voluntary) masturbation, or abortion' (when, of course, otherwise both the mother and unborn child would have to die), and so the person who uses such a medicine is only a cause by accident of such effects. It would have been simpler to have said, that the effects in such cases cannot be reckoned as sins. But, aside from that, not all the examples, with which he wishes to illustrate a moral cause in itself, or that which is truly one, are quite proper. For he says: 'Should a criminal who is to be executed walk to the place of execution and ascend the ladder', he cannot for this reason be called a moral cause of his own death; for the officers lead him, if willing, and drag him, if unwilling. But I do not see why a person who drinks to excess, or weakens his vitality by honourable necessary toil, should not be called the moral cause of his untimely death, although the former sins, while the latter does not, and neither can, properly speaking, be called a murderer. But you may properly call that man the moral cause of his death, who is condemned because he refused to offer the evidence by which his innocence could have been established.

4. It should also be observed that the formal part of a moral action,¹ that is, its power to be imputed [imputativitas], has the nature of a positive form, from which, like shoots from a root, are derived its affections, properties, and consequences, and for this reason a moral action can be called a positive entity (at least in the order of morals, if not always in that of natural things), whether its matter be a physical motion, or an absence of physical motion. For it is enough to classify something in the order of morals as a positive entity, if we understand there to be in it that from which true affections of that order arise; for as there are no affections in a non-entity, that which has definite and positive affections can by no means be termed a mere non-entity.

5. Now the reason why a moral action may belong and be imputed to some one (in whom we have said a real basis [ratio formalis] for it consists), is none other than because it lay within his power and ability to cause such an action to take place or not, to be undertaken or avoided. This is so clear that even the most ignorant of men, when charged with some deed accomplished or neglected, think they can offer no better excuse than to say that they could not help it, whether the thing was done or not. Hence it is to be considered a primary axiom in morals, that a man can be asked for a reckoning for those things, the doing or not doing of which lay within his power; or, what amounts to the same thing: Any² action controllable according to a moral law, the accomplishment or avoidance of which is within the power of a man, may be imputed to him. And the contrary: That which neither in itself, nor in its cause, was within the power of any man, cannot justly be imputed to him. And it is no exception to this rule, when one is sometimes expected to do some chance thing that is not in our power, for that case never arises unless a man voluntarily takes upon himself such an obligation. However, it is within a man's power to pledge himself to repair some damage, which has resulted from a cause over which we had no control.

Now for an action or deed to be imputed it must be voluntary, as we have said in the preceding chapter, § 10, and subject to the direction of our will. But for an omission to be imputed to a man, it is requisite that the faculty and the opportunity for the deed have been present. The opportunity [occasio] embraces four factors: That the object of the action be at hand; that there be a convenient place where we cannot be hindered by others, or run the risk of some injury after the action; that there be a convenient time in which more pressing business does not have to be transacted, and which will likewise suit others who join in the action; and, finally, that one have the natural powers for the action. When any one of these factors is absent, through no fault of the man, it is absurd and unjust to impute to him the blame for the action not taking place. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I [xxvii]: 'The occasion is that portion of time which affords opportunity of doing or not doing something.' Add Descartes, Les Passions, arts. 144-6.

6. After these general considerations, it will be worth while for us to consider more clearly the precise actions which can and cannot be imputed to a man. Such things, then, as arise from a physical necessity or from any causes beyond the direction of men, cannot be imputed to any one. So it is a foolish thing told of the kings of Mexico, namely, that on ascending the throne they promised their subjects to see to it that the sun would rise and set at the proper time, the rain fall when it was needed, and the earth bring forth its fruits. Nor can it be imputed to a man that natural causes produce one and not another effect, in one and not another way; for instance, that the fire gives forth heat and not cold. And yet the effects of natural causes give good ground for imputation, in so far as their active power was elicited or strengthened by man, through the application of active principles to passive, or through the awakening of hidden forces by suitable means. On this principle a heavy yield is credited to the farmer, according as his diligent cultivation increased the fertility of the field; the damage from a blaze to him who set it afire; the varied colour of lambs to the cunning¹ of the shepherd Jacob (Genesis, xxx. 37). Such a natural effect can even be attributed to a man, because he moved the Supreme Cause, who directs all things, to determine or not to determine upon that particular effect. On this basis the three-year drought can be attributed to Elijah (1 Kings, xviii. 1; James, v. 17). Similarly it is related that a long continued drought in Greece was brought to an end at the prayers of Aeacus. Apollodorus, Bk. III [ii. 6]. So also the death of those whom the pestilence destroyed, may in a measure be imputed to David, although not to the extent of making it murder (2 Sam. xxiv. 13, 17).

7. Furthermore, one cannot impute to a man the actions and effects of the vegetative faculties which are found in his body, as they are due to his birth, or to causes for which he is not responsible. Although it is within his power to lay before those faculties an object suited or not suited to them, which may nourish, weaken, or destroy their power, as well as to pervert or injure the organs through which they function. Thus a man can deserve no merit for having received from nature an active, strong, and well-developed body. But to overcome a natural weakness by attention to it, and to increase one's native strength, deserve praise; while to destroy one's strength by laziness or wilfulness, is regarded as a disgrace. So no one can be criticized for a feeble, sensitive, and weak body, for distorted or maimed limbs, or for 50 want of strength, since, indeed, such weaknesses were contracted through no fault of his. As Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. vii, says: Not only are the vices of the soul voluntary, the vices of the body are also voluntary in some cases, and in these cases we are wont to pass censure. For while nobody censures people who are born ugly, we do censure people whose ugliness come from negligence and want of exercise. It is the same with bodily infirmities and defects; nobody would find fault with a person who is born blind or whose blindness is the result of illness or of a blow; he would rather be an object of pity; but if his blindness were the result of intemperance, or licentiousness of any kind, he would be universally censured. (W.)

When Ulysses reproacheth Thersites, he objecteth not to him his lameness nor his baldness nor his hunched back, but the vicious quality of indiscreet babbling. [. . .] In this instance, Homer derides those who are ashamed of their lameness or blindness, as not thinking anything a disgrace that is not in itself disgraceful, nor any person liable to a reproach for that which is not imputable to himself but to Fortune. (And a little farther on) [p. 35 r]: For as they who scourge a man's garments do not touch the body, so those that turn other men's evil fortunes or mean births to matters of reproach, do not only with vanity and folly enough lash their external circumstances, but touch not their internal part, the soul, nor those things which truly need correction and reproof. (G.) (Add Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. II, qu. i, p. 633, A-C.)

Yet it was not without reason that among the ancient Gauls, as Strabo, Bk. IV [iv.], relates: 'A youth who exceeded the measure of his girdle was punished,' since they judged that a large stomach on a youth came from gluttony and laziness. Nicolaus of Damascus, De Moribus Gentium [fig. 105 Jakoby]: 'The Iberians have a belt of a certain fixed length, and if any man's stomach is too large to fit that, it is regarded as a great disgrace.'

Under this head come also other faculties, which are in our bodies by the gift of nature without any contribution on our part, when, for example, one is endowed with a quick or a sluggish mind, keen or dull senses, a good or a weak memory; provided such a natural faculty has not been strengthened or weakened by a man. Here applies the passage in Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x: 'There are many things in the course of nature which we both do and suffer with full knowledge, but which are not either voluntary or involuntary, as e.g. growing old or dying.' (W.) These are not the kind of thing that can be imputed. You may also include under this head the fact that parents cannot be held accountable for bringing into the world wicked children, provided they did not contribute to their wickedness by the way in which they brought them up. Hence the statement of Vindex cannot be approved, who said that Nero was justified in killing his mother, 'because she brought into the world such a monster.' Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. V [x].

8. It is clear, also, that such things as exceed our strength, and cannot be prevented or accomplished by it, cannot be imputed, provided that the weakness in question was not contracted by our own fault. On this principle rest the well-known maxims: Impossibilities are incapable of obligation; No one is to be understood as having enjoined impossibilities in his own law; and, consequently, If any impossibility is found in a law, as well as in an agreement or will, it is to be treated as not binding, or else as warranting a more suitable interpretation. Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. I, el. viii [I. vii. 37-8]: 'No power has strength to guarantee that a friend will do no wrong.' (W.) Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VI, chap. iii [28]: 'To insult another's misfortune is thought inhuman, either because the insulted party may be free from blame, or because similar misfortune may fall on him who offers the insult.' (W.) Here applies also the story which Herodotus, Bk. VIII [iii] tells¹ of how, when Themistocles demanded money of the inhabitants of Andros, with the support of the two most powerful goddesses, 'Persuasion and Necessity,' they opposed to him two even stronger, 'Poverty and Helplessness.'

But it should be observed that it is one thing for a matter to be called physically impossible, and another for it to be called morally impossible. The former impossibility offers an obstacle, which so hampers the will that it cannot free itself for action, or wastes all its efforts in the attempt. But a moral impossibility affords no obstacle superior to the power of action inherent in the will, since it arises entirely from the will itself. On the latter basis, therefore, we say it is impossible that all men should be willing to agree to hand down gratis a lie to posterity; or, further, that any man should order his life so circumspectly and piously that he offers no offence in the most trifling thing, at least in the precipitancy of his passions. From such matters the author of De Principiis Justi et Decori [Velthuysen], p. 174, concludes:

A legislator cannot command what is physically impossible, but he can command obedience in things which include a moral impossibility, because he commands nothing contrary to the liberty of the will, since the entire difficulty in obedience lies in the will itself. Thus it is not impossible for a single individual to frame a lie gratis, and if so, it is not impossible for a whole group; yet it is certain that all mankind will not do so. By the same argument every man is free to speak the truth, and therefore so is the whole body politic; but it is absolutely certain that no state will be so happy as to have all its members refrain from falsehood; and yet such an impossibility does not take away the liberty of the individuals, nor does it free them from sinning. So also we say that a perfect obedience to the law is impossible, and yet such an impossibility will not diminish the freedom of the will, because it is as impossible for one man to obey the will of God in all things, as it is for all mankind to be free from the guilt of lying; and yet one can guard himself from single acts of sin, just as individual citizens can keep themselves unspotted from sin, although this will never happen.

In so far as these matters pertain to theological dogmas we leave them for consideration in their proper place. But if we confine our discussion to the bounds of a court of law, there seems to be no reason why these questions should not be admitted rather than those raised by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xx, § 19, where he speaks about sins which some call 'sins of daily occurrence': 'It can indeed be questioned whether such as these can rightly and properly be called sins, since the liberty, which they seem to have in specific cases, they do not have when considered in the aggregate.' How, indeed, can such slips taken together avoid the character of sin, when as single cases they are sins? And yet, in a court of law, such slips are generally regarded as not subject to punishment.

9. Those things also cannot be imputed, which one suffers or does under compulsion, for such things are understood to belong in a moral sense to the man who exerted compulsion, while he who experienced or executed them is properly treated merely as the object or physical instrument. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [lviii]: 'Everything that is involuntary deserves forgiveness.' Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I [xxx]: 'If it is suitable to forgive those who have unintentionally hurt us, then we ought not to feel grateful toward those who have unavoidably helped us.' One is considered to have suffered compulsion, not only when the principle of motion is in another person, who forces a man, despite his resistance and objection, to lend his body to do or suffer something, but quite as much, when, upon the threat of some peril to his life,¹ or of some other grave evil, a man is forced by another to undertake the execution of a deed to which he himself is otherwise strongly averse; yet this in such a way that not the victim of compulsion, but the other, wishes to be regarded as the author of the deed. An example of the former kind is when a stronger man has violently shoved one person against another, or when he has seized the person's hand and struck another with it; or when one has offered violence to a woman who did not, through any fault of hers, incite his passion. Her body, indeed, suffers disgrace in this way, but the taint does not touch her soul. 'My body only was violated, my heart is pure,' says Lucretia in Livy, Bk. I, chap. lviii. This story is admirably treated by Henri Estienne (Stephanus), Apology for Herodotus, chap. xv. But you cannot excuse those women who allow a ring to be stripped from a weakly resisting finger.¹

It is an instance of the latter kind of compulsion, when, for 52 example, a soldier is ordered, upon pain of death, to execute a man whom he knows to be innocent. Nothing can be imputed to him on this count, since he is assigned the mere execution, which is agreeable with his position as a soldier, and which there is no reason to refuse at the risk of his life, since he could by no means save the innocent man by his own death. But it must be agreed that the execution of some acts is so momentous or disgraceful that it is considered noble to prefer death rather than to lend one's assistance to such deeds, even though the guilt therefrom will attach to another. This is shown in the passage of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i, given above. It would be an example of this, if one should be commanded to defile his own mother. When that was done by Oedipus, even through insuperable ignorance, he was so troubled that with his own hands he tore out his eyes. Hence Aristotle in the passage mentioned above, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i, gives as an example: 'If a tyrant, who had our parents and children in his power, were to order us to do some shameful act, on condition that, if we did it, their lives should be spared, and, if not, they should be put to death.' (W.) The word 'shameful' must be accepted with reservations, and not extended to include such things as the example we have just given.

10. Ignorance also prevents imputation, in so far as it makes an action involuntary. Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. III [i. 38]: 'When men do wrong from ignorance, I believe they do it quite against their will.' (M.). Euripides, Hippolytus [1334-5]:

But thy transgression, first,
Thine ignorance from utter sin redeems. (W.)

Certain passages from Aristotle furnish excellent illustrations of this; as Magna Moralia, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv [I. xxxiii]:

When the ignorance is the cause of his doing something, he does not do this voluntarily, so that he does not commit injustice; but when he is himself the cause of his ignorance, and does something in accordance with the ignorance of which he himself is the cause, then he is guilty of injustice and such a person will justly be called unjust. Take for instance people who are drunk. Those who are drunk and have done something bad commit injustice. For² they are themselves the causes of their ignorance. For they need not have drunk so much as not to know that they were beating their father. Similarly with the other sorts of ignorance which are due to men themselves, the people who commit injustice from them are unjust. But where they are not themselves the causes, but their ignorance is the cause of their doing what they do, they are not unjust. This sort of ignorance is that which comes from nature; for instance, children strike their parents in ignorance, but the ignorance which is in them being due to nature does not make the children to be called unjust owing to this conduct. For it is ignorance which is the cause of their behaving thus, and they are not themselves to blame for their ignorance, for which reason they are not called unjust either. (S.)

Seneca, Phoenician Maidens [249 ff.]:

Some are o'ertaken by untimely fate

While still within the womb, yet without sin. (M.)

But I should not be inclined to extend this last consideration beyond the human courts of law.

Although it should be observed, in the case of children, that they are sometimes reprov'd or chastened for such things, not because they could be considered in a court of law as sins, in the proper sense of the word, but as a means only of correction, to keep the children from annoying others by so acting, or, on arriving at maturity, from finding pleasure in a habit which they had formed in their tender years. The same position is to be maintained regarding the insane and delirious, who have come by such an affliction through no fault of theirs; for any blows given such persons have no more the nature of a punishment for a fault, than have the blows that are given a kicking horse to break him of his habit. Add Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. ii, §§ 5-8.

But if a man is the cause of his own ignorance, and knowingly and willingly has become responsible for not knowing what he could and should have known, he is held to have acted knowingly and with deliberate intent. Aristotle, Magna Moralia, Bk. I, chap. ix. 'For we blame the ill and the ugly when we think that they themselves are the 53 causes of their being ill or of their having their body in a bad state, on the assumption that there is a voluntary action even there.' (S.*) And more fully, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. vii [V. vii]:

Legislators punish and chastise evildoers, unless the evil be done under compulsion or from ignorance for which its authors are not responsible. But they punish a person for mere ignorance, if it seems that he is responsible for it. Thus the punishments inflicted on drunken people who commit a crime are double, as the origin of the crime lies in the person himself, for it was in his power not to get drunk, and the drunkenness was the cause of his ignorance.

(Plautus, Truculentus, Act IV, sc. iii [831 f.]: 'It's not wine that's in the habit of ruling men, but men wine; those, indeed, who are virtuous men.' (R.))

Again men punish people who are ignorant on any legal point, if they ought to know it, and could easily know it. Similarly in other cases we punish people, whenever it seems that their ignorance was due to carelessness; for they had it in their power not to be ignorant, as they might have taken the trouble to inform themselves. (W.)

Ignorance of universals and of what every one was expected to know, does not prevent imputation, but only ignorance of particular cases, and of what is concerned with a fact. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. ii:

An action is not involuntary if a person is ignorant of his true interest. The ignorance which is the cause of involuntary action, as distinguished from that which is the cause of vice, is not such ignorance as affects the moral purpose, nor is it ignorance of the universal; for this is censurable. It is rather ignorance of particulars, i.e. ignorance of the particular circumstances and occasion of the action. Where this ignorance exists, there is room for pity and forgiveness, as one who is ignorant of any such particular is an involuntary agent. (W.)

An example of this ignorance is given by Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxx]. There was a law somewhere,

That no one was to sacrifice an ox to Diana. Sailors, tossed by a violent storm upon the deep, vowed that, if they reached the harbour which they saw, they would sacrifice an ox to the god of the place. It so happened that in that port there was a temple of that Diana to whom it was unlawful to sacrifice an ox. Being ignorant of the law they sacrificed an ox after landing, and in consequence were brought to court.

If, in a person's deed, there be no malice of forethought, or ignorance voluntarily contracted, but only such as crept in through a kind of inadvertence (what Aristotle properly calls an ἀμαρτημα [mistake]), imputation is not, indeed, entirely suspended, but it is partly diminished, and to this extent the saying of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. vi [2], may be allowed: 'They commit no fault who follow great authorities.' (W.) This point is covered in that remarkable passage of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x, which is referred to and illustrated by Grotius, Bk. III, chap. ii, § 4. And here I would introduce the example from Aristotle, Magna Moralia, Bk. I, chap. xvii, of the woman who gave her lover a philtre, from which he died. The court of the Areopagus declared her innocent, when indicted, because she did it without forethought and purpose,¹ for she gave it out of her love and with no intent of murdering the man, although she failed to achieve her intention. However, such a decision must, of course, presuppose that it never occurred to the woman that the drink could in any way be harmful. Otherwise the Roman law is superior, Digest, XLVIII. xix. 38. 5. Add Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus V. v. 6, on Digest XLVIII.

Furthermore, since the images which fancy forms in sleep are not within our power, what one seems to do in his dreams cannot be imputed to him, except in so far as our dwelling with pleasure on such things during the day has impressed their images deeply upon our mind. Nonnus, Dionysiaca, Bk. XLII [325 f.]: 'For what a man does in the daytime, the image of that he beholds at night.' Hence no crime can attach to him who, according to Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XI [iv], saw in a dream Claudius crowned with a wreath of wheat. Add Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XV, chap. ii. So also the fisherman in Theocritus,

Idylls, xxii, was not a little perturbed because he thought that he had sworn in a dream never again to set forth to sea. (Add, however, the oath made in a dream by Evagrius in Sozomen, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. VI, chap. xxx.) Nor was Caesar guilty of incest from his dream as told in Suetonius, Julius Caesar, chap. vii. Although Byblis was not 54 entirely innocent, in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. IX [468 f.]: 'When she is relaxed in peaceful slumber, she often has visions of her love: she sees herself clasped in her brother's arms and blushes, though she lies sunk in sleep.' (M.) And the argument which Plutarch, Quomodo Quis Suos in Virtute Sentiat Profectus [pp. 82 F, 83], offers is not altogether groundless, namely, that a fairly clear conclusion can be drawn from a man's dreams as to how his mind is shaped. Epicurus, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. X [120], says that the wise man 'will be the same man asleep and awake.' (Y.) Some apply to this purpose Psalm xvii. 3. Add Claudian, in the preface to De Raptu Proserpinae.¹ Theocritus, Idylls, xxii [xxi. 44-5]: 'For in his sleep every dog surmises food.'² (E.*)

12. Finally, it is unreasonable that the imputation of some future evil should be dragged, as it were, backwards to deeds already done, unless that future misdeed hangs upon some present or past act of ours, like a necessary effect upon its cause. For an effect is very commonly attributed to the man with whom the cause was connected. In fact, it is not at all strange that by imputation through favour some future deed may work an effect on the doer himself, or some one else, before it is done, for just as one can do a man a favour gratis, so one who knows the future will be able to do some favour upon certain conditions. But since evil actions can only be imputed as they are deserved, it would be absurd to impute them backwards to those who have no knowledge of the future, no obligation or ability to prevent their taking place, and, finally, no communication of action with him who was going to do it. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I³ [xliv]:

That is remote, when one goes too far back; for example: If Publius Scipio had never given his daughter Cornelia in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, and thereby caused the birth of the two Gracchi, there would never have been such serious revolutions; therefore, it appears that Scipio is responsible for this misfortune.

13. With the above exceptions, no action should be thought involuntary and incapable of imputation, no matter how irrational its undertaking be, or how strongly one be led to it by some disease of the mind. Indeed Plato, Laws, Bk. V [p. 731 c], says:

As to the actions of those who do evil, but an evil which is curable, in the first place, let us remember that the unjust man is not unjust of his own free-will. For no man of his own free-will would choose to possess the greatest of evils, and least of all in the most honorable part of himself. (J.)

Add Timaeus, 1085 A [p. 86 E]; Marsilio Ficino, On Plato's Laws, Bk. IX, Preface; Apuleius, De Philosophia [II. ii]. Aristippus used to say, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. II [95]: 'Errors ought to meet with pardon; for that a man did not err intentionally, but because he was influenced by some external circumstance.' (Y.) The same thought is expressed in M. Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IV, § 3; Bk. VII, §§ 22, 63; Bk. VIII, § 14; Bk. XI, § 18. But Aristotle refutes this idea in several places, as in the Magna Moralia, Bk. I, chap. ix:

As Socrates said, to be virtuous or vicious does not rest with us to come about. For if, he says, one were to ask any one whatever whether he would choose to be just or unjust, no one would choose injustice. [. . .] And it is evident that any who are vicious will not be vicious voluntarily; so that it is evident that neither will they be involuntarily virtuous. (S.)

Aristotle rejects this by arguing that otherwise it would be absurd for a legislator to command good actions, and to forbid or punish evil ones, unless both were ἐφ' ἡμῖν, in our power; and that otherwise it would be absurd for praise to be accorded virtue, and blame to follow upon vice. Also at greater length in Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. vii: 'All men aspire after what appears to be good, only they are not masters of the appearance. But what the end looks like to each man depends upon his character.' (W.) For it is within our power, and not so very difficult, to understand properly whether a thing is just or 55 not. Add Eustratius on the passage. Along the same line, and in the same chapter, Aristotle shows clearly that ignorance, contracted by one's own fault, does not make one's action involuntary, nor, also, do base habits and a mind corrupted by frequent sins. 'If', he says, 'a man without ignorance does things whereby he is made unjust, he is such of his own volition; but he will not, by the mere wishing, cease to be unjust and become just.' (W.) (This last statement, however, must be taken either in a composite sense, or on the grounds that the mere will may not by a single effort remove a once established disease of the mind, although it can be cured by long continued effort.)

No more is one who is sick made well [by wishing]. It may happen that he is voluntarily ill through living an incontinent life, and disobeying his doctors. If so, it was once in his power not to be ill; but, as he has thrown the opportunity away, it is no longer in his power. Similarly, when a man has thrown a stone, it is no longer possible for him to recall it; still, for all that, it was in his power to throw or fling it, as the original act was in his power. So too the unjust and licentious person had it in his power in the first instance not to become such, and therefore he is voluntarily unjust or licentious; but when he has become such, it is no longer in his power not to be unjust or licentious (W.) before, of course, they have reformed themselves.

In this connexion what the author [Velthuysen] of De Principiis Justitiae et Decori, pp. 165 ff., says should be considered:

Moral habits, which we commonly call evil, are not in fact sins, and are not deserving of punishment, if considered in themselves. For they do not touch an effect by any moral causality, so long as they remain habits and do not manifest themselves in acts. Whatever obstacle they furnish to virtue they effect through an act, which a man calls forth by his will, this becoming thereby a cause of moral taint. But to wish to create some other moral cause superior to the will, is to destroy the very nature of the will, and to make its elicited act an enjoined one, and to attribute to a habit a real power of operating without any actual operation. For operation is only through the will, and prior to an elicited action of the will no moral operation can take place, since the morality of an act proceeds from the will. Nay, prior to an action of the will, a habit is only a physical thing, or a physical affection of the soul. But when the soul operates for evil through the will, because of this act the habit ceases. The power by which evil habits dispose the mind to evil action, is different from that by which, for example, lascivious conversation arouses licentiousness in the minds of its auditors, since the operation of the speech is previous to that of the will of the auditor, although the effect does not always follow.

This can be made clearer by the following example. A twist to the foot is in itself, and so long as the foot is quiet, not a violation of the rules of dancing. But when the crooked footed makes some wrong steps, the moral cause is not the twist to the foot, but the will of him who moved the foot. Our author continues: 'The reason why we detest evil habits, is partly because the man contracted them by evil deeds, and partly because men who have them are usually inclined to evil acts. And although they are diseases of the mind, they do not deserve punishment of themselves but because they were voluntarily contracted.' Thus, if we beat a boy because he put his ankle out of joint in a wanton and reckless jump, the cause for the blows is not the putting his ankle out of joint, but the reckless jump.

14. Furthermore, not only his own actions, but also those of others, are commonly imputed to a man, but for this to be possible he must in some way have had some real part in the actions. Since otherwise there is no reason for the effects of a moral action passing from one person to another, unless the other has participated in it by doing or omitting something. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xxviii [23]: 'No one comes to his fall because of another's deed.' Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VIII, § 56:

To my power of choice the power of choice of my neighbour is as much a matter of indifference as is his vital breath and his flesh. For however much we may have been made for one another, yet our ruling Reason is in each case master in its own house. Else might my neighbour's wickedness become my bane; and this was not God's will, that another might not have my unhappiness in his keeping. (H.)

So when some sound comes to our ears which we are unwilling to hear, it is not an offence to have heard it,¹ provided nothing else was done. Lucian, De Imaginibus [xxviii]: 'Unless you think that there are mistakes made also in hearing.' Yet a guilty hearing may sometimes be considered a sign of assent. So in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I [xxxv], when some revolting soldiers offered Germanicus the throne, 'he leapt down

Formerly, in crimes of this kind, no line was drawn between guilt and accident; and it was regarded as equally wicked for a man to engage in some unholy machinations, and to hear about the same quite unintentionally. This, however, was a charge brought against nature rather than against man, because nature had given him wide-open ears, which he cannot close and open at will, as he can his eyes and his mouth. And yet hearing is practically the only sense which eludes our control, and whatever pours in thereby, as into a house wide open and without any doors, must be received. But you made a complete separation between hearing and guilt.

It sometimes happens, accordingly, that an action is not imputed to its immediate performer, but to another who commanded it, I mean when a man charges the mere execution of some deed upon a subject of his under threat of the most terrible punishment which he is able to inflict. An example from Procopius, History of the Gothic Wars, Bk. I [vii. 19]:

As for the proposals which the ambassador has received from the lips of him who has sent him and then delivers, he himself cannot reasonably incur the blame which arises from them, in case they be not good, but he who has given the command would justly bear this charge, while the sole responsibility of the ambassador is to have discharged his mission. (D.*)

So when the Roman Senate had decreed that the consul should be delivered over to the Samnites, it was a foolish proposal of some one, that the man who held the swine while the treaty was being made, should also be handed over; Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxx]. Mamertinus, Panegyricus Maximiano Augusto dictus, I [xi. 5]: 'From the Emperor proceeds even that which is administered by others.'

Seneca, Trojan Women [870-1]:

If aught of sin there be,
'Tis his who doth command the deed. (M.)

When Mithridates killed Attilius and others who had conspired against him, he dismissed the freedmen of Attilius unhurt, 'since they had merely served their master,' Appian of Alexandria, Mithridatic Wars [xc].

But an action is more commonly imputed quite as well to him who performed it, and this mainly in three ways: (1) the master is considered the principal cause of the action, and the doer a minor cause; (2) both of them are equally guilty; (3) the master is the minor cause, and the doer the principal¹ cause. In every case, however, a man joins another's action either positively or negatively, that is, by commission or omission.

Now a man is considered the principal cause of an action, which is actually carried out by another, when he commands one who is his subject to do it; or when by some authority of his, that cannot easily be resisted, he moves one to do something which could not be enjoined by his orders in the strict sense of the word. This is illustrated in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [xvii], by the action of Tiberius in the case of Marcus Piso, whom he cleared of the charge of rebellion; "the father", he said, "had given the order, and the son could only obey." Add Digest, IX. ii. 37 beginning; XLVII. x. 11. 3; Ant. Matthaëus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, § 13. Now it was the authority and not any power of a father that could bind him to commit that offence.

He is also the principal cause who gives the consent which is necessary before one can do something. Cf. Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 2; Libanius, Progymnasmata [p. 12 D, Chriae, ii. 14]: 'He was of the opinion that the man who owed the penalty for what had been done, was the one without whose consent it never would have been done in the first place. [. . .] Those whose hands have actually committed the crimes are not to be considered more guilty than those who made the same possible.'

Again, he is a principal cause who ought to have prohibited something, and yet does not, assuming that he is under a perfect obligation 57 to do so, and one has the right to expect from him such a prohibition. See Digest, IX. ii. 45; IX. iv. 2; XLVII. vi. 1. 2. Seneca, Trojan Women [291]:

He who sin
Forbids not when he can, commits the sin. (M.)

Sophocles, Philoctetes [387-8]:

And all the lawless doings in the world
Spring from ill teaching. (S.)

For this reason, also, Diogenes cuffed the teacher of a gluttonous boy: 'Very properly regarding the one who failed to teach, rather than the one who failed to learn, as being at fault.' Plutarch, An Virtus Doceri Possit [ii, p. 439 D]. See also Aelian [Varia Historia,] III. x. Juvenal, Satires, xiv [233-4]: 'No one holds it enough to sin just as much as you allow him, but men grant themselves a more enlarged indulgence.' (E.) Add Digest, I. xvi. 4. 2. In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. IV [xx. 5], Messalinus moved:

To provide by a decree of the senate, 'that the magistrates of the several provinces, however innocent themselves, and even unacquainted with the mismanagement of others, should be punished for the crimes of their wives committed in the provinces, equally as for their own.' (O.)

So also in the English laws, a husband is held responsible and must give satisfaction for the offences of his wife towards others, whether of word or deed, on the ground that he did not use the power which was his to correct her shortcomings. Nay, even if a man and his wife unite in committing a felony, according to the laws of England the wife is not considered a principal in the crime, nor even an accessory, because the obedience she owes her husband put her under constraint. Edward Chamberlaine, The Present State of England, Pt. I, chap. xvi.

He is a principal cause who commands or hires others to commit some crime. See Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. xiii; and V. iii. 16 on Digest XLVIII.

Such, also, is the man who gives his assistance to another; as one who places a ladder to a window, so that a thief may enter a house; who knocks the money out of a man's purse, so that a thief may snatch it up; who scattered a herd of cattle, so that another may steal them. Cf. Digest, XLVII. ii. 54. 4; XLVII. ii. 66. 2.

Or the man that conceals stolen goods, as in the line of Phocylides, [136]: 'Both are thieves, the one who stole and the one who hid.' Plato, Laws, Bk. XII [p. 955 B]: 'If any one knowingly receives anything which has been stolen, he shall undergo the same punishment as the thief.' (J.) Digest, XI. iv. 1. Add Digest, XLVII. xvi; Edict of Theodoric, chap. cxvi. On the abettors of adultery cf. Digest, XLVIII. v. 8 and 9. Periander, the tyrant of Corinth, 'drowned all women panderers,' Heraclides, De Politis [Aristotle, Fragments, XXI. xx]. Add Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, § 11, and his remarks in X. i. 1-2 on Digest XLVII.

He is also a principal cause who should have given help to an injured party and did not. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vii]: 'The man who does not repel or withstand an injury, if he can, is as much to blame as if he deserted the cause of his parents, his friends, or his country.' (E.) Add Ant. Matthaeus, Prolegomena, chap. i, § 15. So if soldiers who were hired to protect travellers should refuse to drive off the attacks of robbers, for whom they are a match, they will be held as guilty as the robbers. A watchman will likewise be held responsible for a fire which he could have quenched at its start and did not. Add Ezekiel, xxxiii. 6. Thus, among the Egyptians, according to Diodorus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii, a man who saw another being murdered on the road, or suffering some violence, and, when he could have aided him, did not, was liable to capital punishment. Even if he was too feeble to give any help he was still expected to point out the criminals and bring their crime into court; should he fail to do this, he was given a certain number of stripes and starved for three days. Add Digest, IV. ix. 7; XLVIII. ix. 2. 6; XLVIII. ix. 7; XLVIII. x. 9. 1; XLIX. xvi. 6. 8. So also Abbas, a Persian king, when he was stamping out the robbers, according to Pietro della Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. 1, published a decree, that, if any traveller was killed or robbed, the inhabitants of the nearest town had to give satisfaction for the deed. And among the Spartans, 'He who did not reprove a fault that was committed in his presence was adjudged equally culpable with the guilty.' (G.*) Plutarch, Instituta Laconica [p. 237 c, viii]. Cato, also, in urging the magistrates to punish offenders, used to say: 'That they that did not prevent crimes when they might, encouraged them.' (G.) [Plutarch, Apophthegms, Cato]. See Digest, IX. iv. 2; XL. viii. 7; XXVII. viii. Plato, Laws, Bk. IX [856 B], has admirably treated the silence and dissimulation of magistrates: 'But he who takes no part in such proceedings' (that is, revolutions), 'and yet being the chief magistrate of the state, knowing of them or not knowing of them, by reason of cowardice does not interfere on behalf of his country, such a one we must consider nearly as bad.' (J.) Add the story of the daughters of Scedasius in Plutarch, Amatoriae Narrationes [iii], and Grotius on Proverbs, xxix. 24: 'He is on the same plane as a thief, who, when adjured by the magistrate, does not give the name of the thief who is known to him.' See also Leviticus, v. 1.

In the same way, if a madman, entrusted to the care of a person, has been guarded rather carelessly¹ and so done injury to some one, the guardian will be held responsible for the deed, even though no responsibility can be imputed to the madman himself. See Digest, I. xviii. 14.

But those who give advice, and praise, and assent, to a contemplated deed, are considered minor causes of another's deed, provided that their advice, praise, and assent, were factors in the undertaking of the deed. For otherwise the man whose praise was not a factor in some evil deed, cannot atone for the deed itself, but only for his depraved will. Ovid, Tristia, Bk. V [xiv. 45-6]: 'He who reminds thee to do what thou art already doing, by so reminding praises thy acts and by his very exhortation approves them.' (W.)

So a law of the Lombards, Bk. I, tit. ix, § 25, holds a man, who stands by and urges on a scoundrel, to be a participant in the crime. Add Romans, i. 32. Quintilian, Declamations, cclv: 'To commit a crime and to approve it are in nature much the same.' Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, §§ 9, 10 and 14. You may also put under this head men upon whose recommendation some business is entrusted to a person; the mistakes of such a man quite properly cause his sponsors also to blush. See the words of Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. II [vi. 36 ff.].

But the question of the guilt of advice, as defined in Institutes, IV. i. 11, deserves some special notice. About this passage there has been much dispute among writers on the law, whether, namely, the words 'by help and counsel' [ope et consilio] should be taken conjunctively or disjunctively. For if the word counsel means 'with intent or purpose', then only the man who aided a thief by his evil advice, and not by some thoughtless word or deed, is guilty of theft. Cf. Digest, XLVII. ii. 52. 13. However, if any one has merely given advice and not help, we must decide whether such counsel was general or special. An example of the former is, when a man advises a person, who is complaining of his poverty, to get something by stealing it. The man who gives such advice cannot be regarded as a thief, at least in a court of law. But if a man gives special advice, as, for example, he should show in what way, and at what time, a house was to be entered, where the valuables are located, or how one could best hide himself, such a person will have all the earmarks of a thief. See Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, § 7. And it should be further observed, regarding counsel and any similar participation in another's act, that by it the guilt is, indeed, communicated, but not entirely transferred from the agent to the counsellor, unless the former was under a special obligation to carry the advice into effect. There is, therefore, some reason to the complaint of Diodotus in Thucydides, Bk. III [xliii], that the orators should be held responsible for their advice,¹ and not the people for listening to them. He adds:

Indeed, if not only those who gave advice but also those who followed it had to suffer alike, you would show greater prudence in your decisions; but as it is, whenever you meet with a reverse you give way to your first impulse and punish your adviser for his single error of judgement instead of yourselves, the multitude who shared in the error. (S.)

So Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xxv, lays down the general rule:

The man who asks for counsel can rightfully neither punish nor accuse the one who gives it. Because when he asks for it he has permitted the adviser to give whatever counsel he pleases. Hence one who gives counsel at the request of his king or of an assembly, whether it pleases them or not, cannot be punished, since it was given upon request.

- 59 (I should add, however, the proviso, that the counsellor give his advice in good faith, and that he have some knowledge of the matter he is advising upon. For it is surely improper to be willing to deliver an opinion on matters about which one is ignorant.)

But if a man advises his fellow-citizens to do something forbidden by law, he can be punished by the state, no matter whether such advice be given with malice or forethought or only in ignorance; because ignorance of the law does not excuse him who should have known the law.

Hence the maxim of the English, the justice of which George Bates, Elenchus Motuum Nuperorum in Anglia, Pt. I, commends, cannot be accepted without some reservation:

The king can never err or do wrong to any man; since all the fault and blame properly belongs to his ministers and counsellors, whose duty it is to advise their prince, to refuse their assistance should he be bent on some wrong, or to resign their positions rather than obey him when he orders something contrary to the laws.

Add the incident in Gellius, Bk. I, chap. iii, about Chilon, who felt pangs of conscience because he himself had privately condemned a friend as clearly guilty of a crime, but had persuaded others, who were his judges, to let him² go free. That is also an interesting story of the same author, Bk. II, chap. xviii, to the effect that a person was convicted as a kidnapper, because he held out his mantle, as if he were covering himself, and prevented an escaped slave from being seen by his master who was passing by.

In this, or in the former class, belong those men who lead others by their example to a sin which otherwise they would not have committed. Matthew, xviii. 6. Juvenal, Satires, II [79 f.]: 'A whole flock perishes in the fields from the scab of one sheep, or pigs from mange, and the grape contracts the taint from the grape it comes in contact with.' (E.) Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 6 ff. and chap. xxi, § 1 ff.; Antonius Matthæus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, § 6 ff.

From what has been said, one can judge of the reason and limitation of the common maxims: A man is held the author of what he does through another; Digest, II. x. i. 1; we make those things ours to which we give our consent; whatever has been done by another at our command, in things pertaining to us, obligates us ourselves; an action is ours, the execution of which we have laid upon another; and the like. As for that communication of actions which arises from uniting into one moral body, it will be discussed in another place.

Finally, if one may be said to share in another's action, because of his permission, or because he did not prevent the occurrence of such an action, it is necessary not merely that he should have been able of his own natural strength to prevent that action, but that he should also have been obligated to prevent it. When either of these conditions is lacking, nothing can be imputed to a man who allowed another to act at his own pleasure. Hence nothing can be imputed to God on the ground that He is said to permit sins. For he is not constrained to prohibit them in the sense that they cannot possibly be committed, that is, by denying or reducing our natural strength, or destroying the liberty of the will. For without these no moral action could be performed by man. Lucian, De Mercede Conductis [xlii], well covers the case: 'God is not responsible, but the responsibility rests with the chooser.'¹ So it is merely a jest when we say, for instance, that we will let it rain. And there is, therefore, no moral effect in our permitting another to perform some action, which we were not enjoined to prevent, or which is beyond our power to prevent, provided such a weakness was not incurred by our own fault; or when it was done without our knowledge, unless this ignorance arose through sheer negligence, and did not surpass the diligence we were expected to show.

And finally, I cannot be imputed with the permission of a good action, which I might, indeed, have prevented, but should not have. And so he can impute nothing to me who has allowed me to avail myself of my own right, or who has not hindered me from doing so, that is, who has done me no wrong.

WE must now discuss that moral rule¹ or law in accordance with which moral actions should be required, and by their agreement² or disagreement with which they are allotted their distinct qualities. First of all, a law should be distinguished from other things which appear to have some relation to it, and are therefore confused by some persons with it; such are counsel, agreement, and right. Now a law differs from counsel, in that by virtue of the latter, a man tries, with the help of reasons drawn from the matter in hand, to induce a person to undertake or to avoid something, but he has no power over him, at least in the present case, to put him under a direct obligation, the person being entirely free to follow his advice or not. Yet counsel may furnish an opportunity for an obligation, in so far as it gives one the knowledge which causes or increases an obligation. Thus a doctor cannot by any authority prescribe to a patient what he must take or avoid, but since he shows him what is wholesome and what unwholesome for him, the patient is expected to lay hold of the one and avoid the other, not from any right which the doctor has over him, but from the law of nature, which charges every man with the proper care of his own life and health. Although a law itself should not lack sound reasons for its promulgation, still these do not constitute the real ground for obedience to it, but it is rather the power of the enactor, who, on publishing a decision of his will,³ lays an obligation upon his subject to carry out the very letter of his command, even though it may happen that the reasons for such a requirement be not entirely clear. The words of Hobbes, Dé Cive, chap. xiv, § 1, apply in general here: 'Counsel is a precept in which the reason for obedience is drawn from the thing prescribed.' But a law or 'a mandate is a precept in which the reason for obedience is drawn from the will of the person prescribing it. For no one can properly say, "so I will, so I command," unless his will is equivalent to a reason.'¹ And so laws are obeyed, not primarily because of their subject-matter, but because of the will of their enactor. Hence, also, 'Law is the direction of one who has power over those whom he directs; counsel is the direction of one who has no such power. To do what law directs is a man's duty, to do what counsel directs is a matter of one's own pleasure. Counsel is directed to the end of him who is directed,' and this end he himself can weigh and approve. But although law also has an end looking to those upon whom it is enjoined, it is not, however, in their power to weigh or reject that end, for it is determined by him who legislates. 'Counsel is given only to those who desire it, but law also to the unwilling. Finally, the right of a counsellor ceases at the will of him to whom counsel is being given: the right of the legislator does not cease at the will of him on whom the law is imposed.' Add Digest, XVII. i. 2. 6.

2. The ancients are not entirely accurate, when they call laws common agreements, κοινὰ συνθήκαι and δμολογίαι,² as in Isocrates, Against Callimachus, a law on amnesty is called an 'agreement of the city', and in Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander, chaps. i, ii and iii, and in general among the Greeks. In Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. X [iv], laws are called the 'common agreements of cities'. For leaving to one side the fact, that neither divine positive laws nor natural ones had their origin in the agreement of men, and hence that such a term can apply only to civil laws, still these last are not really agreements or conventions, although in constituting the civil power there were some agreements on legislation. But it is clear that the Greeks had before their eyes in this connexion their democratic constitutions, just as in their other political theories; and because in their states laws were passed, somewhat as a bargain is conducted with the magistrate proposing them, and the assembly approving and enjoining them, the name agreement was applied to them. And yet not even because a majority of the people must agree, can the laws of a democracy³ properly be called agreements, for that agreement is really only the manner in which the supreme power, represented in the general gathering of the people, expresses itself, that being considered the will and decision of all, upon which the majority has agreed. And so the power of a vote, which the individual members of an assembly cast in enacting some decree, is very different from the consent which a person gives on entering upon an agreement; for in the latter case a man who does not give his consent is not bound, and the agreement cannot be entered into in any other way, but in the former case the man who does not agree is nevertheless bound by the votes of the majority.

The other differences between an agreement and a law are obvious. For an agreement is a promise, a law is a mandate. In agreements the form is 'I will do thus and so', in laws, 'Do thus and so.' Since agreements depend in their origin upon our choice, it is first determined what is to be done before we are obligated in action; but since a law presupposes the power of some one over us, we are first obligated in action, and then what is to be done is determined. And so a man is not bound by an agreement, unless he has obligated himself by giving his consent, but we are obligated by a law, because we owed beforehand obedience to its author. See Hobbes, loc. cit., § 2. Add also the notes of Grotius on Matthew, In Scripturis, the words ἡ καινὴ διαθήκη [The New Testament].

3. Now since the term 'right' often signifies the same thing as law, especially when it is used for a complex of laws, care ought to be taken that we do not use it in the place of law itself, when it means the power, given or left by laws, to do something. So, for example, when the expression is used, that this or that action is right 'by the law of God', we are not to think that it has been commanded by the divine law, and so can properly be done by us, even though it is forbidden in the laws of men. For since a man has the power to do everything that is within his natural abilities, except what is forbidden by law, it has become customary to speak as if one had a right, by virtue of some law, to do whatever is not denied in that law. Now the word 'right' in this usage, means merely liberty, while the word law denotes some bond by which our natural liberty is restrained.

62 4. In general a law may most conveniently be defined as a decree by which a superior obligates a subject to adapt his actions to the former's command. We use the term decree, not because it exists in the mind and will of the one who gives the decree, but because it is communicated to the subject in such a way that he recognizes he must bend himself to it; and on that account it is equivalent for us to a command. We feel that there is little difference whether a law is called a decree or deliverance, provided it be not held that a law must be promulgated by word of mouth or in writing; for it is only necessary that the will of the legislator be made known to his subjects in some way or other, even if only by the intrinsic suggestion of one's inner light. And so we feel that the subtlety of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, towards the end, is bootless, when he says that the laws of nature have the force of laws only so far, 'as they have been promulgated in Sacred Scriptures by the word of God; and not as they are certain conclusions arrived at by the reason regarding things to be done or avoided.' For, indeed, the dictate of reason teaches us not only that the observance of natural laws is profitable to the race of men, but that God also wills and commands mortals to guide their actions by the rule of those laws; and this is enough for the essence of law. Although the reply might be made, that, as natural laws are the dictates of reason, they can be conceived of in no other way than as in some form of speech. Regarding the definition of Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 9, who says that a law obligates to what is right, one should observe that he presupposes the existence of something just and right before a law and norm; and so a law of nature does not create right but merely point out a right already existing. What is to be thought of this proposition has been already set forth above [I. ii. 6].

It is, in conclusion, clear, that the term laws includes not only the things that pertain to justice properly speaking, as it regulates by a perfect obligation our attitudes toward others, but also the things which are concerned with other virtues and terminate in the agent himself. For the latter reason laws can be, and are, passed against drunkenness and other kinds of intemperance which are prejudicial principally to the addict himself. In this class falls the law of Zaleucus, Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. II, chap. xxxvii: 'If any Locrian when ill drank strong wine without the prescription of a physician, even if he recovered he was subject to the penalty of death, because he had drunk it without orders.'

But this law is unquestionably too severe. Here belong also sumptuary laws, which set a limit to the cost of food, clothing, buildings, and other commodities; if a man break these, he is wronging no one, since his expense concerns only himself. And yet a citizen can undoubtedly be enjoined to practice frugality, which is of the greatest advantage to every man.

5. But, as we have already stated in our definition of laws, namely, that they come from a superior and have the power of obligating a person, we should, it seems, at this point show the nature and source of an obligation, and also how one can receive an obligation and how one can lay it upon another; or, what amounts to the same thing, how one can, by virtue of one's power, charge something upon another.

Now we defined obligation above, as a moral operative quality by which one is required to furnish or suffer something (considering, of course, an obligation as it attaches to the persons obligated. Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 27, differs in defining an obligation as an act of a legislator, by which he points out that actions conformable to his law are necessary on the part of those for whom the law is passed). The Roman Jurisconsults called it a bond of the law, whereby we are bound by the necessity of doing something; for by it some moral bridle, as it were, is slipped over our liberty of action, so that we cannot rightly turn to any other quarter than that to which it directs. An obligation, however, can in no way so bind the will that it cannot, indeed, go contrary to it, although at its own peril. This is the sense in which that dictum of Epictetus, in Arrian, Bk. IV, chap. xii: 'No man is master of another's moral purpose,' is true.

63 Now many other things influence the will to turn to one side rather than the other, but an obligation has this difference from them: they bear down the will as by some natural weight, and on their removal it returns of itself to its former indifference, while an obligation affects the will morally, and fills its very being with such a particular sense, that it is forced of itself to weigh its own actions, and to judge itself worthy of some censure, unless it conforms to a prescribed rule.

It is clear from this fact that an obligation contains a force sufficient to change the will, since nothing can constrain the human mind, as it deliberates on the future, to do or to avoid anything, except reflections on the good and evil which will befall others and ourselves from what we do; it being understood, of course, that its proper liberty is left to the will, and that such actions are to be performed as can properly be imputed to the agent. Again, an obligation differs in a special way from coercion, in that, while both ultimately point out some object of terror, the latter only shakes the will with an external force, and impels it to choose some undesired object only by the sense of an impending evil; while an obligation in addition forces a man to acknowledge of himself that the evil, which has been pointed out to the person who deviates from an announced rule, falls upon him justly, since he might of himself have avoided it, had he followed that rule.

6. There is but one reason why a man can receive an obligation, and that is because he has a will which can turn to one side or the other, and so can adapt itself to a moral rule, being in this way different from some other creatures, which are constrained by some intrinsic power to a uniform mode of action. It follows from this, that, in so far as no necessity is laid upon a man from some external principle, he is considered a free agent, with the power to do everything that lies within his natural strength. Indeed, when he has once decided upon something, or when he has resolved within himself on some choice, still in his decision, in so far as it is held to have proceeded from his will, there is by no means so great a power but that he can rightfully modify it at his pleasure, or change it entirely; unless there come some additional influence from without, which prevents the will, once it is determined and declared, from changing. For a man, when once he has declared a decision of his will, can create a situation in which he cannot later by any right depart from that decision.

Now it is understood that there has been a change of will, not only when a man expressly¹ declares that his former pleasure is now displeasing, but also when he has done something which cannot be made to square with a former decision of his will. From this principle must be drawn the conclusions of the Jurisconsults on repentance. Since if we seek the final and general reason, why repentance is allowed in some acts and not in others, it will be found to be that, in some instances, an external bond has become attached, which does not allow a purpose once declared to be changed, while in the rest the will is allowed to exercise its inherent liberty. The former is usually the case when some other person would be seriously injured by such a change of purpose, and so occasion might arise for the breaking off of social relations and friendship among men. From such a declaration of the will the other man is said to have secured a right, which allows him to exact something from the first party, and, if this is not furnished, he may even exact it by force, coming either from himself or from a superior, according as they are in a state of natural liberty or of organized social relations. Therefore, when no right attaches to another from a declaration of my will, I am then free to repent. But a right has not been acquired by a second person, when a superior who exerts power over me has not allowed him the ability to exact what a first has decided. It is clear from this why positive laws can be repealed by him who made them, 64 because, of course, no one has acquired such a right from them, as will give him the power to demand that those laws shall stand for ever. Now although many states have tried to prevent any changes in their laws by the exaction of an oath to that effect; nay, no matter if an article be affixed providing that any later decree inconsistent with the same be null and void, it may be changed none the less, provided that no man has secured a right by virtue of this clause. For it is preposterous that an earlier statute should claim to annul a later, since absolute power cannot restrain itself, nor can what is revocable by nature be made irrevocable. See Cicero, Letters to Atticus, Bk. III, ep. xxiii. Thucydides, Bk. II [xxiv], tells how the Athenians deposited a thousand talents in their citadel, and threatened death to any one who suggested or moved that such money should be used for any other purpose than when a hostile fleet threatened the city. And yet those very same men, as Thucydides tells us later, Bk. VIII [xv], terrified at the revolt of the inhabitants of Chios, annulled that law. And when princes in some of their constitutions expressly add, that, should they in some particular order give a command that is contrary to the constitution, that command is not to be observed by their magistrates or judges, this cannot be taken to mean that the princes themselves are unable to abrogate those constitutions, but what they really mean is that such subsequent orders are not serious, or else that they escape from them without due

But an accurate distinction should be drawn between the positive law itself, and that right the acquisition of which is occasioned by that law. The former may be annulled afterwards by the legislator, but the right still remains, which was acquired by virtue of that law,² so long as it was in force. For it would be the height of injustice to abolish along with a law all of its former effects. If, for example, it should be the law of a state, that, As the head of a house may have disposed of his property by testament, so let the right to it stand, certainly a legislator will be able to limit this freedom of testament, and to ordain that hereafter all inheritances³ shall be returned intestate. But it would be unjust to take away all the property received by inheritance from those who received legacies⁴ while the former law was still in force. Another instance is when Pope Boniface VIII, from hatred of Philip the Fair, King of France, annulled all the indulgences that had been granted up to that time to the people of France by his predecessors, an act which Henri Estienne (Stephanus), Apology for Herodotus, chap. xl, quite properly ridicules.

A distinction should be made also between laws and other acts of kings and princes, so that no one may believe that all their lawful donations, alienations, and agreements can be withdrawn by them or their successors, for by such acts others have secured a right which should not be taken from them without their consent. Hence⁵ it is clear that, when any one renounces his right, it will not be necessary to add expressly, that neither he nor his heirs will hereafter undertake anything opposed to such a renunciation, or that, if any attempt be made, the action is to be held null and void. For inasmuch as by such a renunciation a man fully relinquishes his right to a thing, and acknowledges that it has been transferred to some one else, even without that clause it was understood, that no effect will follow any disposition by him of that thing, in which he has no further right. It also follows that, because during the life of a testator no one has acquired any right by reason of his will, he can change his will, even though a clause may have been added to the effect that no second will shall be valid. For such a clause only leads to the presumption that any later expression of his mind is not to be taken seriously, but if the clause is recalled by a later will, the first will be null. And so it is the rule that, when a dispute arises over papers of conveyance and agreements regarding any matter, the later document will take precedence over the earlier.⁶

7. It can be gathered from what has been said, why a man cannot become obligated to himself, or enter into an agreement with himself, or promise himself something which concerns only himself. For whoever obtains a right by an obligation is at liberty to relinquish it, provided no injury is thereby done to a third party. In this instance the person obligating and the person obligated, that is, the one obtaining a right and the one giving it, are the same, and so, no matter how much a man may strive to obligate himself, it will all be in vain, since he can free himself at his own pleasure, without having carried out any obligation whatever; and the one that can do this is actually free. Note, further, that no advantage attaches to such an obligation, since when one gives or denies oneself something, he neither gains anything in the former case, nor loses anything in the latter. Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. V, chap. vii ff. 65

But when it is said, for example, that a man is under an obligation to preserve himself, what is meant is that the exercise of that obligation inherent in man has its end in the man himself. But, in fact, it goes back to God, the author of natural law, whose right it is to demand the exercise of that obligation and to punish its neglect. And so a man is required to preserve himself, in so far as he is a servant of God, and a part of human society, of which God commands him to be a useful member. On the same count a master can rightfully punish his slave, and a state its citizen, if they render themselves unfitted for the work and duty owed by them.

And the law that a man cannot obligate himself, applies not merely to individuals, but also to groups and organizations as a whole. The statement of some that a man may swear to himself, that, for example, he will avoid this or that thing to which he is led by a depraved appetite, can only mean that he has taken some sort of a vow, the exaction of which belongs to God. Cf. Felden on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiii, § 1.

8. Another reason why, since the will of man is capable of conforming to a rule, such a rule can be laid upon it, with the effect that his will is obligated to follow that rule, is because man is not free from the power of a superior. These two factors make a man capable of receiving an obligation that comes from an external principle. For when the powers of an agent are by their nature so bound to a uniform mode of action, that they cannot by its inward motion take a different course, not a moral but a physical action is produced, which, properly speaking, arises from necessity rather than from obligation. But when a man recognizes no superior, there is no external principle so strong, that it can check his personal liberty. And however consistently a man might follow one line of action, and avoid certain deeds, it is understood that he is so doing out of his own good pleasure, and not from any obligation. It follows, therefore, that a man is capable of an obligation, who can recognize a prescribed rule of action, and who has a will that is free and able to turn to different courses; this will, however, should recognize, when a rule has been given by its superior, the obligation not to depart from it. And man has clearly been endowed with such a nature.

9. An obligation is properly laid on the mind of man by a superior, that is, by one who has both the strength to threaten some evil against those who resist him, and just reasons why he can demand that the liberty of our will be limited at his pleasure. For when a person has such power, after he has once signified what reward awaits those who obey his will, and what evil consequences those who resist it, there must necessarily arise in the faculty of reason a fear mingled with reverence, a fear occasioned by such a person's power, and a reverence arising from 66 a consideration of the causes, which should be sufficient, even without the fear, to lead one to receive the command on grounds of good judgement alone. We are of the opinion, consequently, that the right to lay an obligation upon another, or, in other words, to command another and to prescribe laws, arises not merely from strength alone, or even from ὑπεροχή [superiority], or excellence of nature. Strength alone, of course, can so move me contrary to my inclination, that I should prefer to obey another's will for a while, rather than experience his power. But when that fear is once gone, nothing prevents me from following my own desire rather than his. And when a man can show no other reason but force, why I should order my ways according to his desire, I am in no way prevented, if it seems to me to suit my ends, from trying in every way to shake off his power and assert my liberty. Terence, Adelphi [69-71]: 'He who does his duty under the lash of punishment, has no dread except in the thought of detection; if he thinks he won't be found out, back he goes to his natural bent.' (S.)

10. At this point we should examine what Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xv, § 5, says: 'In the natural rule of God, His right to reign over and to punish those who break His laws, comes solely from irresistible power.' He undertakes to prove this statement, as follows: 'Every right over another arises either from nature or from agreement. A right is derived from nature by virtue of the fact that it has not been taken away by nature. Now since by nature all men had a right over all things, each man had a right, coeval with nature herself, of ruling over all others.' This right, however, was abolished among men because of the mutual fear arising from an equality of strength, which would have caused a war destructive to the human race. 'But if some one man had so far surpassed all others in power, that not even all of them together could have resisted him by their united strength, there would have been no reason at all why he should relinquish the right given him by nature. There would have remained, therefore, for him the right of rule over the rest, because of the excess of power by which he would have been able to defend both himself and them. There remains, therefore, to those whose power cannot be resisted, and consequently to Almighty God, a right to rule, derived from their very power.'

Certainly several points in the foregoing deserve criticism. For, in the first place, it is questionable whether there is not an inconsistency in the two statements, 'The right to rule by strength alone has been granted by nature', and this right is derived from nature 'because it has not been taken away by nature'. For in general it does not immediately follow, that what has not been taken away by me has been granted by me. And since 'not taken away' and 'granted' are not the same thing, that right may appear to have been granted by some other principle than by nature. And further, the statement that 'Nature has given to all a right over all things', must be carefully interpreted. By right is meant the liberty for one to use his natural faculties according to sound reason. Therefore, the real meaning of his principle will amount to this: By nature, that is, in a state where there is no law, each man may use his natural strength against whomsoever his reason says it should be used, and especially for self-preservation. But it does not follow that a man can, by his natural strength alone, properly lay an obligation, in the strict sense of the word, upon another. To force a person, and to obligate him, are very different things; the former can be done by natural strength alone, but not the latter. For even Hobbes feels that, in a natural state, just as one has the right to force others, so others have the right to resist. And obligation cannot square with the right to resist, for an obligation presupposes such causes, as intrinsically affect the conscience of a man, that he does not judge by the use of his own reason that he can rightly, and therefore justly, resist. And although it is unreasonable to strive in vain against the power of a superior, and so run the risk of meeting with a greater evil (Pindar, Pythian Odes, ii [173]: 'As ye know, it is a slippery course to kick against the goads' (S.)), one still has the right to try every recourse, in the hope that another's force may be shaken off even by force, or avoided by subterfuge. But this cannot be reconciled with an obligation, in the proper sense of the term, and as Grotius has used it in his 67 work, as opposed to 'extrinsic' obligation.

And so bare force does not remove the right to resist, but only the exercise of that right. This can be made clear by an example from the animal world, with which we men live in a state without law. Whatever animals we can overcome by our strength, we break and use in our service. But if any have in some way been able to resist our strength, no man complains that he has been wronged by one of them. And one cannot reply that animals are incapable of receiving an obligation, and so can be restrained only by force, for Hobbes himself acknowledges,

De Cive, chap. viii, § 2, that a prisoner of war, although undoubtedly capable of an obligation, is under no bonds of obligation, so long as he is restrained by natural bonds alone, before an agreement and pledge have been given, and so such person can take to flight, or even use force against his captor, whenever he finds a convenient opportunity. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xi: 'Thus has nature ordained that whatever becomes great by causing fear to others is not free from fear itself.' (S.)

I need not say that Hobbes' principle, 'Nature has given a right over all things,' is absurdity and nonsense when applied to God. For how was nature able to give anything to God, since nature is either God Himself or His work? And so for these reasons, and because it does not seem consonant with God's goodness, we hold that the right to command, that is, the power of God, in so far as it denotes the power of imprinting an obligation in the minds of men, should in no way be derived only from His bare omnipotence.

Furthermore, the examples which Hobbes draws from the Sacred Scriptures furnish no foundation for that thesis. When, in the case of the calamities sent upon Job, God appeals to his power in justification of them, this does not prove that God has no right over His creatures save from His bare power. Nay, Job himself, at the very first, properly recognized God's right to deprive him of his property and children. 'The Lord hath given', he says, 'and the Lord hath taken away'; that is, Why may He not take back at His pleasure that which is His own, when He only granted it to us on sufferance? Add Seneca, To Polybius, chap. xxix. But when Job was overcome by his grief, and led to expostulate with God, the latter very properly alleged his power to silence Job's contumacious complaint, after Job had neglected to recognize the other reasons for his divine sovereignty. And this is the way we commonly deal with other contumacious subjects; when they refuse to listen to reason, we show them our power, so that they may recognize not merely the evil of their way, but also their folly in daring to turn upon us. And in the same way, when some one complains that the righteous are cast down and the wicked prosper, if he refuses to recognize the real causes for this, he is in the last resort made to face the divine power; as if we should say, 'If you feel that you have been wronged, go to and give battle to God.'

On the same grounds it appears that Hobbes was wrong in concluding that men were under obligation to render obedience to God because of their weakness. For this can only make a man decide that it is folly not to avoid some greater evil by obedience; it does not destroy his right to be able to desire, and to try every way possible, to escape from another's power. Such a right, however, is altogether removed by a real obligation.

Nor is this other conclusion of his correct, even though the antecedent is accepted without question; namely, that neither one of two omnipotent beings can be obligated to the other; therefore, men are obligated to God only because they are not omnipotent. I shall not raise the point that the supposition of two omnipotent beings is self-contradictory. Neither did our Saviour intend to assert his right against Saul, by the argument that it was hard for him to kick against the pricks,¹ Acts, ix. 5, but he was only reproving Saul for his mad designs. Nor did Ananias call Paul to the standard of Christ for the sole reason that it was beyond his power to destroy that religion. 68

Such a doctrine as that of Hobbes must be attacked the more steadfastly, since bold men are able to abuse it to our great peril. In Thucydides, Bk. V [cv], an Athenian ambassador says: 'We follow the custom of all men that by a law of their nature wherever they can rule they will. This law was not made by us, and we are not the first who have acted upon it; we did but inherit it, and shall bequeath it to all time.' (J.) Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [v]: 'For by a universal and unalterable law of nature it is ordained that superiors shall govern their inferiors.' (S.) In Plutarch, Camillus [xvii], Brennus calls it 'a most ancient of all laws which gives to the stronger the goods of his weaker neighbours, the world over, beginning with God Himself and ending with the beasts that perish. For these too are so endowed by nature that the stronger seeks to have more than the weaker.' (P.) Livy, Bk. V, chap. xxxvi, gives the same thought more concisely: 'All things are the property of the brave.' (S.) Callicles, in Plato, Gorgias [p. 483 A ff.], advances two reasons for this position. He lays down as his premise the common opposition between nature and law. Thus, for example, by nature it is more base to receive an injury, 'for that is not the part of a man, but of a slave'; and yet in the eyes of the law it is more base to inflict an injury. Furthermore, lawgivers,² because they were weaker than the multitude, established such a principle and ordained honours and censures in such a way that the more powerful might not get the upper hand over them in any matter. '[. . .] Whereas nature herself intimates that it is just for the better to have more than the worse, the more powerful than the weaker.' And he says, that, when Xerxes led his hosts against the Greeks, and Darius against the Scythians, with no other reason than this, they did it 'according to the law of nature'. He regrets that the spirit of gifted young men is restrained by this teaching (about justice), maintaining that in him who breaks the bonds of laws 'the light of natural justice would shine forth'. On such grounds, he adds, Hercules drove off the oxen of Geryon, neither as a purchase nor as a gift, but 'according to the law of natural right, and that the oxen and other possessions of the weaker and inferior properly belong to the stronger and superior'. (J.)

² [The paraphrase is at this point somewhat inaccurate, yet not to the extent of seriously vitiating the argument.—Tr.]

'Without doubt Odysseus would wish this were so, and the sons of Atreus would pay high for such a privilege.'¹ But one is more inclined to take the opinion of Plutarch, Pelopidas [xxiv. 3]: 'For the first and paramount law, as it would seem, namely, that of nature, subjects him who desires to be saved to the command of the man who can save him.' (P.)

11. There are others who deduce the origin of command, or of the power to lay an obligation upon another person, from ὑπεροχή (superiority), or eminence of nature, the action of which is sufficient of itself to produce obligation. They find an argument for this contention in the nature of man, in whose mind, considered the most excellent part of the body, there is a directing power, τὸ ἡγεμονικόν. A passage from Cicero is used to prove this point, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. III [v]: 'So that nothing is better than what is usual in Latin, to say, that they who are run away with by their lust or anger, have quitted the command over themselves.' (Y.) Aristotle is also appealed to, where he says that if a man should be found who excels in all the virtues, he should be chosen king. Furthermore, the most eminent nature of God would merit veneration, even had He not created the world. Nay more, they wish to add to this superiority of nature ἀνυπευθυνία (a freedom 69 from accountability), and for this reason if a man treats the beasts, to whom, of course, he is superior, in any way other than is fitting, he is free from censure, and they cannot complain of their hard lot, for when a man contends with another on the basis of rights, he thereby compares himself with the other, and wishes to be measured by the same law. But this is not possible for natures which are so different in worth, that one can be said to have been made for the sake of the other; and God ordained for man a right over animals, because of the excellence of man's nature. For this reason, if a man be punished by a magistrate for misusing his cattle, this is not done in the interest of the animals, but of the other citizens, since it is always to their advantage that a man should not abuse any of his property. They add, as well, that the body cannot complain, if it is weakened by labours at the order of the mind, since, forsooth, the mind is superior to the body.

But for our part, we are not yet convinced that the right to lay an obligation on a person, who has in himself the ability to direct his actions, can spring from mere superiority of nature. For such superiority does not always imply the ability to direct another of inferior nature, nor do different degrees of perfection in natural substances, carry with them an immediate subordination and dependence of one upon another. For, since the man upon whom an obligation is to be laid, has in himself the ability to direct his action, which he can feel is enough for himself, there is no apparent reason why he should be held to be convicted without further ado by the dictate of his own conscience, if he orders his life at his own pleasure, rather than that of some other person whose natural endowment is greater. And so for all of the impiety of the doctrine of the Epicureans, that the gods enjoy their happiness in the greatest peace, and have removed themselves far from all concern with the affairs of men, being neither pleased at the good deeds of men, nor angered at their evil acts, still their conclusion from such presuppositions was quite correct, namely, that all service to the gods and fear of them was foolish. For why should a person worship another who cannot and will not help or hinder him? For contemplation of an essence so noble can, indeed, excite admiration, but it cannot create obligation. We Christians believe in spirits more noble than man's estate, but none of us admits that they have any control over men; Revelation, xxii. 9. Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VI, § 44: If the gods take counsel about nothing at all—an impious belief—in good sooth let us have no more of sacrifices and prayers and oaths, nor do any other of these things every one of which is a recognition of the gods, as if they were at our side and dwelling among us. (II.)

Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. I [ii]:

There have been those who have conceived that the gods take not the least cognizance of human affairs. But if their doctrine be true, of what avail is piety, sanctity, or religion? for these are feelings and marks of devotion which are offered to the gods by men with uprightness and holiness, on the ground that men are the objects of the attention of the gods, and that many benefits are conferred by the immortal gods on the human race. But if the gods have neither the power nor the inclination to help us; if they take no care of us, and pay no regard to our actions; and if there is no single advantage which can possibly accrue to the life of man; then what reason can we have to pay any adoration, or any honours, or to proffer any prayers to them; piety, like the other virtues, cannot have any connexion with vain show or dissimulation; and without piety, neither sanctity nor religion can be supported; the total subversion of which must be attended with great confusion and disturbance in life. (Y.)

Ibid., [xli]:

What piety is due to a being from whom you receive nothing? Or how can one be indebted to him who bestows no benefits? (Y.)

Ibid., II [xxv]:

Jupiter is called by our ancestors 'the most good, the most great', and 'the most good', that is, most beneficent, before 'the most great', as there is something more glorious in itself, and more agreeable to others, namely, to render aid, rather than to have great resources. (Y.)

Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. II, el. ix [23-4]: 'Will there be any reason for us to grant their usual honour to the gods, if one robs them of their will to help?' (W.)

The reference to animals has no bearing on the point, for they are restrained not by an obligation, but by pure force, or by the attraction of food. And they would certainly not be going contrary to nature, if they should try to throw off the yoke of men. It is a mere figure of speech to cite the command of the soul over the body, for command can only be understood as a relation between different and distinct 70 beings, while the body is subordinate to the soul by virtue of their physical connexion, and not because of any moral tie.

And finally, the statement that if a king were to be selected by free choice, the crown should be given to the noblest, is well borne out by Plutarch, Apophthegms [ii, p. 172 E]: 'Nobody ought to govern, unless he is better than those he governs.' And the words of Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. III, p. 489 [ix. 10 ff.], should be taken in the same sense. But the authority of a king who is chosen in this way will not come from any right based upon his mere excellency, but from the agreement of those who selected him.

12. From what has been said, one must surely agree that mere strength is not enough to lay an obligation on me at the desire of another, but that he should in addition have done me some special service, or that I should of my own accord consent to his direction. Pliny, Panegyric, chap. xxxviii [7]: 'The law of nature has not, among men, given power and authority to the stronger, as it has among beasts.' For no man can well avoid having respect for the one from whom he has received many favours, and so if it appears that the same person wishes me well, and can take better care for my future than can I, and he also claims at the same time a right to direct my acts, there is no apparent reason why I should wish to question his power. And this is all the more true if I am indebted to him for my very being. Acts, xvii. 24 ff. And why should not He, who gave man the power of free action, be able from His own right to limit some part of man's liberty? But when a man of his own accord consents to the rule of another, he acknowledges by his own act that he must follow what he himself has decided. Although, if a lawful command is to come from consent, it is necessary that the well-grounded right of a third party be not prejudiced by such a new relationship, and that it be allowable for the one party to have such a subject, and the other such a sovereign. From these two sources, we believe, flows the force of obligations, which, as generally understood, restrain as by an inner bond the liberty of our will. But because the natural liberty of the human will is not destroyed by any moral bond, and because also among the vast majority of mortals the inconstancy or wickedness is so great that they prevail over these reasons for command, something else is needed to control the wild passions of men, with a greater force than a feeling of shame and an appreciation of what is right. And this is all the more necessary because the wickedness of most men tends to injure others, for a man could be left to his devices more readily if his sin hurt no one but himself. Now we feel that nothing could have such an effect, but the fear of some evil to come, upon the breach of an obligation, from the hand of a stronger person, to whose interest it was that there should be no departure from that obligation. And so, in the final analysis, obligations get their stability from force, and from the consideration that the one who desires to procure their observance has so much power, either inherent in him or given him by others, that he can bring some grave evil upon the disobedient. Among evil folk, of course, a ruler who can be affronted with impunity, has but a precarious hold. But government is in a firm hand when the ruler bears a just title to his position, and has force ready to punish all rebels. Sophocles, Ajax [1073 f.]:

For in a state that hath no dread of law
The laws can never prosper and prevail,
Nor could an armed force be disciplined,
Lacking the guard of law and reverence. (S.)

Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xxix: 'No man is master of another man; his masters are only death and life, pleasure and pain. For, apart from them, you may bring me face to face with Caesar and you will see 71 what constancy I show.' (M.)

As a result of what has been said thus far, there should be some toning down of the statement which certain writers have expressed too crudely, namely, that right is the pleasure of the stronger. Laws, of course, can scarcely achieve their external end, unless they be girded with strength to prod up the unwilling. Thus Solon used himself to say that he accomplished his greatest reforms, 'combining both force and justice together.' (P.) Plutarch, Solon [xv]. And there is no argument more powerful in the affairs of men than the words of Scylla about Minos, in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VIII [59]: 'And he is strong both in his cause and in the arms that defend his cause.' (M.) For we piously recognize that the joy of conscience after the performance of our duty, no less than the torments and prickings of the mind that follow wrongdoing, all come from the power of Almighty God, for whom it is a light task to punish through their own selves all who disregard the power of other men. Juvenal, Satires, XIII [193 ff.]:

Yet, why should you deem those to have escaped scot-free whom their mind, laden with a sense of guilt, keeps in constant terror, and lashes with a viewless thong? Conscience, as their tormentor, brandishing a scourge unseen by human eyes! Nay! awful indeed is their punishment, and far more terrible even than those which the sanguinary Caeditius invents, or Rhadamanthus! in bearing night and day in one's own breast a witness against one's own self. (E.)

And certainly it is of the highest importance to all men for no one to question the existence of a divine judgement, inaccessible to corrupt influences, which must be undergone by those who have trusted in strength, cleverness, or collusion, and neglected their duty. The words of Plutarch, Against Colotes [xxx, p. 1125 E], apply here: 'I am of the opinion, that a city might sooner be built without any ground to fix it on, than a commonwealth be constituted altogether void of any religion and opinion of the gods, or being constituted, be preserved.' (G.*) Upon the foregoing principles, therefore, rests the power of all who are going to be successful in laying down laws for others.

13. Now for a law to be able to exert its directive force in the souls of men, the one for whom it is made must have a knowledge both of the legislator and of the law. For how can a man render obedience, if he does not know whom he should obey, and what is his duty? But it will be enough, if he has once known these two things, for although a man may forget what he once knew, he is by no means freed from any obligation, since he could have remembered perfectly, if he had given proper attention to his obedience. And certainly no one can easily avoid knowing the lawgiver, for any one that can use his reason will know that the author of natural laws is the same as He who made the universe. Much less can the maker of civil laws be unknown to any citizen, since he is constituted as such by the consent of the citizens, which is either express or tacit, in that they in some way subordinate themselves to him. It will be explained in another place how the law of nature is known from an observation of human affairs.

Civil laws are made known to subjects by a public and clear announcement. In this announcement two things should be made clear: first, that the laws proceed from him who has the greatest power in the state; second, that the meaning of the law¹ be made known to all. The first becomes clear when the man who bears the supreme power promulgates the law either by his own lips, or through the instrumentality of those who have been authorized by him. The question whether such men have the authority of the sovereign to announce the laws, cannot be raised, if it is recognized that they are commonly used by the sovereign to announce his will, if the laws are brought into use in the courts, and if they contain nothing that is derogatory to the full power of the sovereign. For it is hard to believe that any minister would publish something of his own making, as a permanent decree of his prince, or wantonly arrogate to himself any such function, since there would be no chance of his attempt remaining unknown, or of his bold venture escaping punishment.

72 If the meaning of the law is to be properly understood, the men who promulgate it must make it as clear as possible; quite differently from Caligula, who has his laws written in small letters and posted at some distance above the ground. Dio Cassius, Excerpta Peiresciana, Bk. LIX. If the laws contain any obscurity, the question should be referred to the legislator, or to those who have been publicly appointed to pronounce judgement according to them, for it is their task to apply the law by proper interpretation to particular cases, or, on the matter of particular facts, to show how the legislator disposed of them. See Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, §§ 11-13; Leviathan, chap. xxvi.

Mention should here be made that the statement of those who hold that, if laws are to obligate the conscience of subjects, they must have the consent of the same, is true neither of natural laws, nor of the civil laws of a monarch or aristocracies, unless, indeed, that has been agreed to between rulers and subjects, or unless this be based on implicit consent, whereby a man is understood to have agreed to all the acts of some authority, if he has once recognized it. And yet it would be a great advantage in inducing subjects voluntarily to obey laws, if these were passed with their consent and approval, especially such laws as are to become a part of their customs and manners. This is illustrated by the saying of Pericles in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. I [ii. 45]: 'I think that anything which any one forces another to do without persuasion, whether by enactment or not, is violence rather than law.' (D.) Cf. Sanderson, On the Obligation of Conscience, [= Prelection vii] §§ 22 ff.

14. Furthermore, just as he who is going to direct by laws the actions of another, must meet two requirements: first, that he himself know what should be¹ prescribed for another, and second, that he have the power to inflict some punishment, if that man does not conform to his command (assuming that the object of the law has the power and desire to disobey the orders); so every law has two parts. The first defines what must be done, or what must be avoided; the second states what punishment is proposed for him who fails to observe the positive command, or does what is forbidden. The latter part is usually called the sanction. The position of Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, Prolegomena, § 14; chap. v, § 40, leads us here to speak at some length on sanction, since, in opposition to all the Jurisconsults, he maintains that the sanction of laws is made not only by punishments but also by rewards, and, in fact, more fundamentally by the latter than by the former. His thesis is as follows: Touching the sanction of a law, it is impossible by any natural signs to persuade men more clearly and effectively [that they perform some task], or to show with authority that a particular duty is commanded by the Governor of the universe, than for Him to distinguish such acts by abiding and natural rewards. For, although in sanctioning laws, men usually employ negative terms and words expressing the like, yet, in the nature of things, that which leads them to action is a positive good, which they hope to acquire or retain by warding off whatever may not lead to it. Privations and negations do not weaken the will of man, and the only reason he avoids some evil is because he may thereby secure some good. Any power that penalties or natural evils may have to move men to avoid them, lies entirely in the attractiveness of those advantages of which they would be deprived by penalties or evils. All the things which men are supposed to do so as to avoid death or poverty, should more properly be laid to their love of life and wealth, and there can be no fear of death, unless there is a hope of life. The nature of things moves our desires more by the love of a present good, or the hope of a future one, than by the hatred of a present evil, or the fear of a future one; and property is sought not 73 because of its opposite, poverty, but because it is of itself agreeable with our nature. Civil laws owe their stability more to their end, which is the public good, a share in which belongs to every good citizen, than to their threats of penalties, which inspire with fear only a few, and these the dregs of society. Thus far Cumberland.

Our first observation to all this runs as follows: If we wish to include under the word sanction both the advantages and the rewards attendant upon observance of law, it is requisite that those advantages should come from observance of a law and be, as it were, purchased thereby. But it is clear that not all the good things we enjoy are given us because of our observance of laws, and these, therefore, cannot be counted as rewards. Thus we have life and being, along with the natural faculties which we possess, not as rewards for keeping a law, but God in His goodness freely conferred them upon us before we could even conceive of fulfilling a law, and the continuance of their enjoyment, proceeding as it does from the inward force of substance, is in no way derived from an observance of law, but is the kindness of the Creator, who 'maketh His sun to rise on the good and on the evil and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust'.¹ In the same way a man does not attribute what he has gotten by his labour and industry, directly and in its origin to any observance of law, but to the Creator who gave him his strength, and reckons it among his gifts. But so much the laws can do: What we have by the free gift of our Creator, or have secured by our industry, they may keep safe for us from the assault of other persons, who might injure or destroy them, and may allow us to increase them in many ways. So far as such things can be given by a legislator, they alone can be considered rewards; and if they are to have any influence in disposing the minds of men to obey the laws, the lawgiver should point out that such an effect will follow such a cause.

It should be further observed that, although the will can be moved to action by showing it the good which will follow that action, this will not at once lay upon it any necessity of performance, unless some threat is added of punishment awaiting non-performance. And so when a good effect comes as a natural consequence from some action, it is only a proof of the most generous goodness of the Creator, who wishes to give us that good of His free will, who in His kindness invites and even persuades us to embrace it. And yet this is not necessarily an argument that He commands us to secure that good by our action, for He may well be satisfied with having given us an opportunity to enjoy the fruits of his kindness. But there can be no question that an action is commanded, if some evil be threatened in case of omission.

We may add that the minds of men are more powerfully moved by the infliction of evil than by the possession of good. It is, indeed, true that there is a great attractiveness about securing some good, especially if it be fresh, or brings with it liberation from some present evil. But the feeling of pleasure disappears in the course of possession, and after the quickening of the mind, which was caused by the lack of the good or its recent acquisition and enjoyment, passes away, practically all that remains is a kind of sluggish acquiescence. Hence many only then begin to appreciate their fortune, when they have lost it, or see some prospect of losing it. But the grief, which follows in the end all evils and privations of good, is not a mere privation, but is something quite positive, and of such power that it can destroy the sense and appreciation of all advantages, and even lead one to look sometimes to death as its relief.

And so there is a sufficient reason, I feel, for civil legislators to sanction their laws by punishments instead of rewards. But the observance of the laws of men is sufficiently profitable, because it ensures our retaining and enjoying the pleasures which accompany an ordered social life, and if the exercise of ordinary virtues were always sanctioned by special rewards, no source would be bounteous enough for their supply.¹ For the sluggishness common to most men had to be shaken off by a threat of punishment, especially since a violation of laws is connected with harm for others, and some imaginary advantage for the violator. And so, it seems, the allurements of sin can be most easily repressed by a representation of the consequent remorse. For this reason civil laws always contain a punishment for their violators, either stipulating the amount of the fine or punishment, or leaving the fixing of the amount to the decision of the judge and the executors of the laws. The Roman Jurisconsults, indeed, call some laws imperfect, when they have no sanction of a penalty. Such was the law of Cincius, which had no other enforcing clause than this: 'Whoever does otherwise shall be held to have done wrong.' But I should judge that in this law either the disgrace took the place of the punishment, or else the censors were empowered to put some mark of reprobation on its violators. Yet one may infer from Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII, chap. xlii, that offenders against this law were not entirely free from punishment. Cicero, Laws, Bk. II [ix]: 'The divine punishment of perjury is destruction—the human penalty is infamy.' (Y.) But another example of an imperfect law is found in Livy, Bk. X, chap. ix:

The Valerian law, after forbidding a person, who had appealed, to be beaten with rods and beheaded, added, in case of any one acting contrary thereto, that it shall yet be only deemed a wicked act. This, I suppose, was judged of sufficient strength to enforce obedience to the law in those days; so powerful was then men's sense of shame; at present one would scarcely make use of such a threat seriously. (S.)

You may include here a law of Zaleucus, mentioned by Diodorus, Bk. XII, chap. xx:

Let no citizen attack a personal enemy with implacable hatred, but let him enter a quarrel in the spirit of one who expects soon to return to relations of good-will and friendship with his adversary. And if any one do otherwise, let him be considered to have an unkind and cruel disposition.

You may, however, here consider the infamy the penalty, as in these other laws of his given by the same author, Bk. XII, chap. xxi:

Let no free woman, except she be drunk, be attended by more than one servant. Let her not go outside the city by night, except to commit adultery. Let her not wear golden ornaments, or dress embroidered with gold, except she be a harlot. And let no man wear a gold ring, or a cloak of Milesian style, except he be engaged in fornication or adultery. And so, by means of these disgraceful exceptions to the penalties of his laws, he easily turned men aside from harmful luxury and wanton living, for no one cared to win the sneers of his fellow-citizens by acknowledging shameless and disreputable conduct.

Add Digest, XI. vii. 14, 14; XLVII. xii. 3, 4.

So there are two parts of a law, one defining the offence, and one setting the penalty or the penal sanction; two parts, I say, and not two kinds of laws. For it is idle to say, 'Do this', if nothing follows; and it is equally absurd to say, 'You will be punished', if the reason is not added, why punishment is deserved. It must, therefore, be borne in mind that the whole power of a law properly consists in its declaring what our superior wishes us to do or not to do, and what penalty awaits its violators. And from this it is clear how a law may have a power of obligating. For the power of obligating, that is, the faculty of laying an intrinsic necessity on persons to do something, properly lies in him who has authority or sovereignty. But a law is only the instrument of this authority, by which the will of the sovereign power is made known to a subject, who upon such knowledge receives an obligation by the power of such sovereignty. This makes it apparent, further, that the common division of the power of a law into directive and coercive 75 is incorrect, unless by coercive power is understood the penal clause, for the efficacy of a law in directing depends on how far it embodies the will of the sovereign, and threatens punishments to the subjects. But the coercive power, that is, the power to demand of subjects that they conform their actions to a rule prescribed for them, to threaten penalties, and to carry them out, properly belongs to the maker or executor of a law. Libanius, Orations, v [2, p. 51]: 'Surely the laws need judges to execute what the laws say. For laws have neither hands nor feet, nor will they hear if any man calls upon them, nor come to his aid; they help us only through the persons of those who render justice.'¹ Although it is a common thing for writers, in a figure of speech, to attribute to laws the effect which belongs to the ultimate authority. So, for instance, Apuleius, De Mundo [xxxv], says: 'What the law is in a city, the general in an army, that is God in the universe.' And, to the same effect, Livy, Bk. II, chap. i: 'The authority of laws is greater than that of men,' a principle which is true only of democracies, in that a magistrate may not depart from the written laws.

Now legislators as such are said to exercise moral compulsion, not because they can, by some use of actual violence, so constrain a man that he can in no way do other than as they command, but because, by threatening and pointing out a penalty to offenders, they make it difficult for any one to plan a deed of lawlessness, since it seems easier to him, in view of the impending punishment, to obey the law than to break it.

15. When the power to obligate is attributed to laws, it is at once understood that permissions are excluded from laws in their proper sense; although Modestinus, Digest, I. iii. 7, delivers the opinion: 'The virtue of a law consists in its power to command, forbid, permit, and punish.' For permission is properly not an action of the law, but an absence of action. What a law permits, it does not command or forbid; therefore it does nothing about it. For certainly, whatever is not forbidden or commanded, is understood to be left to any one's own pleasure, and so is permitted, even though the law has not mentioned it.

Certain authorities, however, maintain that there is some obligation in a permission, not affecting, indeed, the one to whom something has been permitted, but preventing a third party from binding the other in any way, if he wishes to do what the law permits him. But they would limit even this to what has been given a full and perfect permission, not to what has been allowed imperfectly, and by way of connivance. For example, civil laws allow a husband to kill a wife taken in adultery, and yet they do not forbid another from interfering with the infliction of death in such circumstances. And yet, if we wish to speak precisely, such an effect does not properly come from the permission of law, but from the proper use of one's liberty, for I enjoy liberty in all things in which the law does not oppose me, and the principal effect of this liberty is that no one can interfere in my harmless exercise of it. And so it would appear to be little short of idle for laws expressly to permit anything, the licence to do which is clearly to be inferred from the lack of any command to the contrary, and about which no kind of question can arise. It is, also, not always necessary that, when a law forbidding something is repealed, the act formerly forbidden should then, by an express decree, be declared licit, since upon the removal of the prohibition, it is understood that natural liberty of itself regains its full power.

¹ [The same idea, as Barbeyrac observed, was admirably expressed before that time by Demosthenes, Against Meidias, 224, as follows: 'And what is the power of the laws? If any of you is injured and cries out will they run up and assist him? No; they are but written words and cannot do this. In what then consists their strength? In your making them effectual always for the benefit of those who need you.' (K.)—Tr.]

In two special cases, however, civil lawmakers generally make express use of permission. These are either, first, when licence or impunity is allowed to some act only to a definite degree; or second, when that licence or impunity must be secured on some condition. As an example of the former case, some offer the permission, by the laws of most peoples, of usury only within definite limits; of the latter, the purchase by women of the right to prostitute themselves, into the 76 propriety of which I do not now enter. See Evagrius, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. III, chap. xxxix, for the tax on courtesans, called chrysargyros, which was removed by the Emperor Anastasius.

Now a division is usually made in legal permission, into plenary, which confers the full right to act and makes the act lawful, and less plenary, which confers either impunity from punishment, or liberty from impediment, or both. Some things enjoy impunity among men, either because human courts cannot handle such cases, as, for example, the faults of kings, or because the law of man has reached no open decision on a matter, or else because it has declared the matter legal, or, finally, because civil laws wished to leave many things to a man's modesty and integrity. Add Digest, L. xxii. 144, and the comments thereon of Jacques Godefroy.

Some observe more accurately that permission of a law or of a civil court is given, either by action of the law or tacitly. In the former class they place the passing over of a thing, not, indeed, by mere chance, but in the formula and design of a law, which is so drawn up, for example, that the legislator shows that he intended to enumerate fully every particular. For in such a case, whatever he did not list among the prohibitions, he is understood to have permitted, provided it does not offend common decency. Those things are understood to be permitted tacitly, which the civil power passes over in tolerance, connivance, or dissimulation, either for the present or for an indefinite period, so that they grow into custom. But the permission of civil law cannot prevent an act from being contrary to divine law, or place it beyond the fear of a penalty from God.

is said to be permitted, which has not been definitely forbidden or commanded in a civil law, the wording of the law should not be made a subject for cavil, but its spirit should be examined. For there are many points to be gathered from the sense¹ of laws, and to be understood in the laws, as a necessary consequence, or upon analogy. And one must especially keep in mind natural law or decency, which is regarded as a constant supplement of civil law. Nor can the things which are allowed for the time being or from necessity, be judged on the basis of a true right. But all these observations are to be understood in connexion with an absolutely perfect permission. Cf. Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 9.

16. The matter of laws in general is whatever can be done by those for whom they are passed, at least at the time when the laws are promulgated. For if a man should later, through his own fault, lose his ability to fulfil a law, its force does not thereupon expire, but the right is given the lawgiver to inflict a punishment, since the man in question is no longer able to meet his laws. But when a subject cannot fulfil a law, or has lost his power to do so, through no fault of his, the passage of such a law is not only a vain, but also a most unjust thing. However, we shall speak in another place on what concerns in a special way the various kinds of laws.

17. Who can be obligated by a law may readily be gathered from the right of the legislator: It is he, of course, who is subject to the command of the legislator. And it is sufficiently clear from the law itself, whom the legislator wished to obligate. For all laws designate those who are to be obligated by them, either through an express determination in an all-inclusive phrase, or through a restriction to certain individuals, or through a condition or reason of some nature, whereby the subject knows he is obligated by that law, when he finds that it applies to himself. And so a law obligates all the subjects of a legislator with whom the reason of the law squares, and to whom the matter of the law can be applied, for, if this were not the case, riot and turmoil would arise among citizens, the very things which laws were especially designed to avoid. And so no man will be exempt from all law, unless he can prove that he possesses some special privilege; and yet it frequently happens that one may be freed from the letter of a law after its passage, and this is called dispensation. For if a legislator can entirely abrogate a law, he can surely suspend its effect on some 77 certain person.

Now dispensation differs from equity (for the two are sometimes confused), in that the granting of the former lies only in the power of a legislator, while the latter may and should be exercised by even a minor judge; and should he follow the mere letter of the law, in a case which demanded equity, it must be concluded that he acted contrary to the purpose of the legislator. And so dispensation depends upon the free grace of the legislator, but equity depends upon the duty of the judge. And yet in granting a dispensation great foresight should be exercised, so that the power and the authority of the law be not weakened by promiscuous concessions; and also so that when it is denied without the most urgent reason to others of a like condition, this fact may not be a cause of envy and anger, since equals have not been considered worthy of equal consideration.

An example of a wise dispensation is found in Plutarch, Apophthegmata Laconica [lxxiii]; Agésilas [xxx. 4], when Agésilas suspended the laws for one day, using the expression, 'Let the laws sleep to-day' (as the words are given by Appian of Alexandria [Bell.] Libycum [cxii]), so that the soldiers who had fled from a field of battle would not incur disgrace. And in the same author, Demetrius [p. 900], when Demetrius wished to be initiated at one time into all the mysteries, and up to this time it had been customary to hold the lesser mysteries in the month Anthesterion, and the greater in Boedromion, Stratocles published a decree that the month Munichion in which Demetrius arrived in Athens should be called and held to be, first Anthesterion, and then Boedromion. Add Idem, Alexander, pp. 672 D, 679 A.

More plausible is what he tells in his Demosthenes [xxvii]: When Demosthenes was recalled from exile he was still under a fine, which, by a law, could not be remitted gratis, and so they 'tricked the law' in this way. They had a custom by which they paid a sum of money to the man who prepared the altar in the sacrifice to Zeus Saviour. This task and service they assigned to Demosthenes for fifty talents, the amount of his fine. A similar example is found in Diodorus, Bk. XIII, chap. c, and Plutarch, Lysander [vii. 2]. Since the law of the Lacedaemonians forbade that a man should hold the same office twice, the command of a fleet was given to Aracus,¹ but Lysander was sent along as his lieutenant, with the order 'that the commander should not fail to follow his advice'.² Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VI, chap. v, § 3 ext. Perhaps the custom of the Spaniards, told by Gabriel Naudeus, Coups d'État, chap. iii, p. 193, should be included among subtle dispensations. When they think that a man has been guilty of treason, they appoint a secret court to try him, hold a secret trial and condemn him, putting the sentence into execution afterwards in any way possible, so that they may not seem to have put him to death without clear cause.

18. Law is very conveniently divided, as to its origin, into divine and human, the former having God as its author, the latter men. But if law is considered from the point of view of the necessary agreement that it has with its subjects, it is on that score divided into natural and positive. The former so harmonizes with the natural and social nature of man that the human race can have no wholesome and peaceful social organization without it; in other words, it has a natural benefit and utility from its own continued efficacy for the human race in general. A further reason for such a division is that the former can be discovered and understood from the mental endowment peculiar to man, and a consideration of human nature in general.

Positive law is that which is by no means derived from the general condition of human nature, but proceeds entirely from the pleasure of a legislator, although it should not lack reason and usefulness, at least for the particular society of men for which it is passed.

Some writers call positive law voluntary, not because natural law 78 also does not come from the will of God, but because no positive law had such an agreement with human nature, that it was necessary in general to preserve it, or that it could be known without express and special announcement. Hence the reasons for it are not sought in the universal condition of mankind, but in the special and sometimes temporary advantage of distinct social groups. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [vi]: 'Men's manners should fit themselves to circumstances.' (R.) And so they are defined at the pleasure of superiors, after men have gathered into social groups. Help in understanding the nature of positive law may be derived from the words of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x: 'Such rules of justice as depend on convention and convenience may be compared to standard measures; for the measures of wine and corn are not everywhere equal, but are larger where people buy, and smaller where they sell.' (W.)

Now divine law is sometimes natural and sometimes positive; but human law, properly speaking, is always positive. Each of these divisions will be considered more fully in its proper place.

OUR next task is to examine the qualities of moral actions. Now according to their qualities, actions are called necessary or unnecessary, lawful or unlawful, good or evil, just or unjust. And so the moral qualities of moral acts will be necessity, licence, and their opposites, for which there are no proper words, goodness and evil, justice and injustice.

2. An action is necessary, which the one, for whom a law or a command of his superior has been given, is by virtue of that law or command bound to perform; for this necessity of moral actions consists in the fact that they should not be omitted nor done in any other way than ordered, provided it is within one's natural power to omit them, or do them another way. And yet the Roman Jurisconsults very often say that the things which lack such a necessity cannot be done. Digest, XXVIII. vii. 15.

Opposed to a necessary action is both a forbidden action, the performance of which is forbidden by laws or the interdict of a superior, and a lawful action, which the laws neither prescribe nor forbid, but which a man may undertake or avoid at his will. Cicero, For Balbus 79 [iii, at end]: 'For there are things which are not expedient, even if they be lawful. But whatever is not lawful is most certainly not expedient.' (Y.) Libanius, Declamations, xvi [xxiii. 20]: 'What¹ a man has not been ordered to do, this he has not been prevented from doing.' But in the usage of common speech, not only are those things said to be lawful which are forbidden by no human or divine law, and which can, therefore, be undertaken without any sin or criticism, but those things as well, which are not forbidden by natural laws, and are permitted by civil law, in so far as it imposes no penalty for them in a court of law, committing them merely to each man's sense of right. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. V [xix]: 'It is unlawful for anyone to do wicked actions, but we slip into an inaccuracy of speech, for we call whatever a man is allowed to do, lawful.' (Y.) This is illustrated by the opinion of the emperor Severus in Lampridius, Alexander Severus [xxiv]:

He had in mind to prohibit catamites altogether [. . .] but he feared that such a prohibition would merely convert an evil recognized by the state into a vice practised in private—for men when driven on by passion are more apt to demand a vice which is prohibited. (M.)

We can call the former actions perfectly lawful, the latter imperfectly lawful. But some things are even called lawful, which all agree are most base, provided the one who is going to do them has such strength that he does not fear the restraint of men. Seneca, On Clemency, Bk. I, chap. xviii: 'Though the laws allow a slave to be ill-treated to any extent, there are nevertheless some things which the common laws of life forbid us to do to a human being; because he has the same nature as your own.'¹ (S.) Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. iv, § 2; chap. x, § 2.

3. We call an action good morally, or in moral estimation, which agrees with law; that action evil, which does not agree with it. (For natural and material goodness, by which a thing or an action is understood to tend to a man's convenience or improvement, is discussed in another place; although it is connected with the above-mentioned moral good, in those things which are enjoined by natural law, and usually by civil law as well, and gives it some reasonable basis among rational creatures.)

The formal reason for the goodness and evil of actions lies in their bearing, or determinative relation, to a directing rule, which we call a law (and this, we understand, to necessitate and not merely to permit, and, if it be of men, is not to be opposed to divine law). For in so far as it accords with the terms of the rule, and is carried out in accordance with it, an action so based on a previous choice as to conform to this same rule is called good. In so far as it is undertaken against the terms of the rule, or departs from that, it is called evil, and is expressed in the one word sin. Now any directing rule, as, for instance, a mariner's compass, is called the cause of straight sailing and arrival at the harbour, not so much because the ship takes the course that follows its direction, as because the pilot follows its direction in his navigation. In the same way a law is called the cause for right action, not because an action, no matter what the intention, squares with it, but primarily because it is undertaken at the command of the law, and from dependence upon it, that is, with the intention of rendering obedience to it. Therefore if a man by chance, or with no thought of obeying the law, does what the law commands, he can be said to have acted rightly (in a negative sense and not positive, that is, not evilly), but not to have acted well in a moral sense; just as a man who has brought down a bird by the random discharge of a gun, can scarcely be said to have shot with any art or skill.

4. Since, further, the law determines either the quality, that is, the disposition of the agent, or the object, or the end, or, finally, the peculiar circumstances of an action, it follows that an action is morally good or evil, either because the agent is or is not disposed, as the law requires, or because an action is or is not directed towards an object, with such purpose, and under such circumstances, as are set forth in the law. It should be observed in this connexion that an action to be 80 good must agree with the law in all material requisites, and in respect to its formality it should be performed not in ignorance, nor for any other cause than that of offering the law its required obedience. And so an action may be good in its material aspect, but be imputed to its agent as evil, because of his evil purpose. Thus the man deserves no reward, who, in intending to do some harm, confers some advantage, like the man in Valerius Maximus, Bk. I, chap. viii, § 6 ext., who in attempting to kill Jason opened an abscess. And so the person sins, who uses his legitimate power for an evil end, as, for example, a judge who exercises his power to inflict punishment on criminals, to the satisfaction of his private grudges. Consequently, among the Carthaginians, 'their generals were crucified, if they had conducted their campaigns with success, but with bad counsel.' Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xlviii; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 1 ext.

On the other hand, an action which may be evil in its material aspect cannot be good because of the good intention of the agent. It is clear, therefore, that no man can use his own sins as means to secure some good end, and that evil should not be done that good may come of it. For it is enough to make an action evil that it fails to accord with the law in even a single material or formal requisite; and so an action is without further ado evil, if the quality of the agent, or the object, or the end, or any of the circumstances, or the intention differs from those prescribed by the law. So it is idle to say, as do some, that an action can be good as to the substance of its operation, although the agent had not a lawful end in view, for the end is one of the most important parts in the essence of an action, because it is bound up with the intention, which is a principle most seriously affecting the quality of an action. And so it is a sin to direct an action not merely to an evil end, but also to an end different from that prescribed by the laws. Matthew, vi. 5. Juvenal, Satires, VII [215-16]: 'It is the motive cause that gives the quality to the act.' (E.) Nay, not only an accomplished evil act, which has attained its end, but even an evil act scarcely commenced, is reckoned a crime, which civil laws sometimes punish¹ as severely, or almost as severely, as a completed one, according as they think it expedient to repress an offence at its beginning. Seneca, On the Steadfastness of the Wise Man, chap. vii: 'All crimes, as far as concerns their criminality, are completed before the actual deed is accomplished.' (S.)

5. Since the goodness or evil of an action consists formally, as we have said, in its agreement or disagreement with a moral rule, the action depends for its effect upon him by whom that action, prescribed or forbidden by law, is performed. His determination, therefore, so constitutes it in the class of moral entities, that it can be imputed to him alone and to no other man. And so they entertain an idle fear who have placed the formal reason of an evil action² in the absence of agreement with law, so that they may not seem to make God, the creator of all things, also the author of evil. Of course, the positing of any form necessarily implies the privation or absence of the opposite form; yet how mistaken is the man who seeks the essence of a thing in this absence! He has not made much progress who has discovered that straightness is the absence of crookedness, and crookedness the absence of straightness. But such inventions or fears have come from an ignorance of moral affairs. For although God is the creator of all physical entities, He should not be held to be the author of all moral or intellectual entities, or those of man's invention. They who think it a splendid achievement of their intellect to have, in some way or other, implicated God in the causes of sin, must, indeed, be affected with some utterly depraved itching of mind, for whoever has any understanding of things moral will feel that nothing is more absurd than to inquire as to whether that person be the cause of an action who forbids it by law, and punishes it when performed contrary to his commands. The fact that God has some share in the physical part of an action, can 81 no more be a reason for His being called the cause of sin than, for instance, can a man, who gave some article to be fashioned by a workman, be called the cause of some blemish in the latter's careless work. For you to give the word cause a meaning so improper, and so different from its common use, is to show a lack of reverence for God, combined with a desire for vain display. Philo Judaeus, De Profugis [xvi]: 'What accusation can be more disgraceful than to say that the origin of evil is not in us but in God?' (Y.) Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, III [xiii, 9 a and b]:

These names (doom, fate, fury) seem but to be the euphemistic excuses of human wickedness, charging responsibility for the same upon the divine power, the fates, and the furies. But a fury and doom, and the divine powers, and all the other designations of a guilty heart, have been fashioned in the mind within us, &c.

Idem, Dissertations, XXV [xli. 5 a]: 'The fault is his who chose the evil; God is not responsible.'¹

6. Let us now discuss justice, regarding which it should be noted, first of all, that the meaning, in which it is attributed to persons, is very different from that whereby it signifies an attribute of actions. For when we use it in describing persons, to be just means that one delights in acting justly, that he applies himself to justice, or that he tries in every thing to do what is just. And to be unjust means to neglect justice, or feel that it should be measured not by a man's obligation, but by his convenience. And for this reason many actions of a just man can be unjust, and of an unjust man just. A man should, therefore, be called just, who does just things in obedience to law, and unjust things only because of his weakness; he should be called unjust who does just things because of the penalty attached to the law, and unjust things because of his evil nature, or in order to secure glory or some other advantage. Hobbes, De Cive,² chap. iii, § 5. The words of Pliny, Panegyric [lvi], are based on such a definition: 'Even bad men do many praiseworthy things; only the best of men deserves praise in his own person.' Compare the statement of Philemon in Stobaeus [Anthology, III] ix [21]:

He is a just man, not the one who does no wrong, but he who, when he may do wrong, is unwilling to do so; not the one who refrains from taking little things, but he who is strong to refuse to take the great things, although he might seize and possess them without risk of harm; no, not even the one who observes all these requirements, but he who has a sincere and genuine character and wishes to be, and not to seem, just.

Archytas³ [in Stobaeus, Anthology, III. i. 114]:

Just as a man who has been guilty in some particular circumstances of a lack of self-restraint, or of injustice, or cowardice, is not to be classified among wicked men; no more is he to be classified among good men, on the basis of a single successful performance. [. . .] But the correct judgement is that drawn not from a single occasion but from a man's entire life.

Another illustration is the censure passed by Agathias, Bk. V [v], on the inhabitants of Byzantium, who were terrified by a severe earthquake and vied with one another in good deeds:

All this was done for a limited time, so long as their fear was fresh and strong. As soon, however, as the evil began to abate and come to an end, most of them made haste to return to their former habits. Now such a sudden impulse of the mind cannot properly be called justice, nor substantial and effective piety, such as is commonly formed in men by right opinion and constant application, but rather a reckless contrivance and cheating bargain-82 counter device, instituted to escape and avoid a momentary danger. Good deeds that come of necessity we experience only so long as the fear lasts.

It is clear from this that the definition of justice commonly used by the Roman Jurisconsults, namely, that it was a 'constant and abiding desire to give every one his due', applies only to the justice of persons, and not of actions. This circumstance, I feel, is very unsatisfactory, since jurisprudence is chiefly concerned with justice of action, and takes cognizance of justice of persons only in passing, and in a few particulars.

² [For vive read cive—Tr.]

7. Now justice of actions differs from goodness of actions mainly in this, that goodness denotes simply an agreement with law, while justice includes further a relation to those towards whom the action is performed. Consequently, in our opinion, an action is called just which is applied from previous choice to the person to whom it is owed, and therefore, on this definition, justice will be the right application of actions to a person. It is our decision to make a division of it primarily on the ground of the matter which is owed, or which is applied to another as from an obligation.

We note, by way of introduction, that some actions can be called pure and some mixed. The former are performed, on the motion of some power which is applied to an object for a definite reason; such are an exhibition of honour, acts of respect, affection, aversion, consolation, praise, reproach, &c., the effect of all such being that the object is affected, or is thought to be affected, by the action in a certain way, leading either to satisfaction or dissatisfaction. But the latter are connected with the transfer of some advantage or disadvantage for the person towards whom they are said to be exercised, and so their effect consists mainly of some operation, whereby the person or property of some man is actually bettered or injured. Again, there are actions which are concerned with business, and are valued at a certain rate; while upon certain others men usually set no value. The distinction between these two kinds of actions will be discussed at length below.

It should be observed, in conclusion, that some things are due us by a perfect, others by an imperfect right. When what is due us on the former score is not voluntarily given, it is the right of those in enjoyment of natural liberty to resort to violence and war in forcing another to furnish it, or, if we live within the same state, an action against him at law is allowed; but what is due on the latter score cannot be claimed by war or extorted by a threat of the law. Writers frequently designate a perfect right by the additional words, 'his own,' as they say, for example, a man demands this by his own [suo] right. But the reason why some things are due us perfectly and others imperfectly, is because among those who live in a state of mutual natural law there is a diversity in the rules of this law, some of which conduce to the mere existence of society, others to an improved existence. And since it is less necessary that the latter be observed towards another than the former, it is, therefore, reasonable that the former can be exacted more rigorously than the latter, for it is foolish to prescribe a medicine far more troublesome and dangerous than the disease. There is, furthermore, in the case of the former usually an agreement, but not in the latter, and so, since the latter are left to a man's sense of decency and conscience, it would be inconsistent to extort them from another by force, unless a grave necessity happens to arise. In civil states this distinction arises from their civil laws, which either allow or deny an action, although in most instances states have followed in the footsteps of natural law, except where their own reasons persuaded them to take another course.

83 8. When, therefore, actions or things are extended to another, which are due him only by an imperfect right, or when actions are performed for another which have no relation to business, it is usually said that universal justice is observed; as when one comes to the aid of a man with counsel, goods, or personal assistance, and performs a service of piety, respect, gratitude, kindness, or generosity, for those to whom he was obligated to perform the same. The only concern of this kind of justice is that one should furnish what is due another, without observing whether the service furnished is equal to, or less than, that which was the reason for the obligation. Thus an office of gratitude is fulfilled if as much is shown as one's faculties permit, although the kindness done may have far surpassed that measure. But when acts which concern business relations are performed for another, or acts by which something is transferred to another to which he had a perfect right, that is called particular justice.

9. Now¹ this perfect right arises either for individuals from an agreement, tacit or expressed, made with some society to the end that they may become members of it; or for a society from the same agreement with individuals, that it will join them to it as members; or it arises from any kind of an agreement with any number of individuals about things and actions which concern business enterprises. When those things are fulfilled, which are due for the reasons given just above, from the agreement of a society with a member, or of a member with a society, it is called distributive justice. For whenever a person is received into a society an express or tacit agreement is entered into between the society and the member to be received, by which the society undertakes to give him a pro rata share of the goods which belong to the society as such, and the member, on his part, promises to undertake to bear his just share of the burdens which make for the preservation of the society as such. The determination of the proportionate share of the goods to go to the member is made on an estimate of his labour, or of the amount of his expense in the service of the society as such, in proportion to the labours or expenses of the other members of the society. On the other hand, the determination of the proportionate share of the duties falling to the member is made on an estimate of the advantages which he receives from the society, in proportion to the advantages received by the rest of the members of the society. And so, since one member usually contributes more to the preservation of a society than another, and one usually derives more advantage from it than another, the reason is clear, why, in a society of many members, and where an inequality exists among them, a comparative equality must be observed in distributive justice. And this consists in maintaining a clear ratio between the worth or merit of one, compared with the worth of another, and his reward, as compared with the reward of the other. For, as Philo Judaeus says, On Monarchy [ii. 13]: 'For it is an unequal measure to give equal honour to persons who are unequal in rank.' (Y.) Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. xvii: 'It is a law of nature for the better to have the advantage of the worse in that in which he is better.' (M.) So, for example, if six rewards are to be distributed between Gaius, Seius, and Titius, if the desert of Titius is threefold that of Gaius, and twofold that of Seius, Titius should have three, Seius two, and Gaius one. Nor does this equality require that a person's reward shall exactly equal his desert, but it is enough if the proportion of the worth of one member to the worth of another should be observed in the portion he shall have of the common good, compared with the portion of the other. And the same rule should be applied in imposing tasks.

But what Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 6, says, in order to overthrow this respective equality¹ which is observed in this kind of justice, namely, that I can distribute of my own more to him who deserves less, and give less to him who deserves more, provided I give what I have agreed upon, while he offers as proof the words of our Saviour, in Matthew, xx. 13, certainly has nothing to do with the case. For in the passage which he cites, it is shown that a man does not sin against commutative justice (which governs a contract of hiring, leasing), if, in his generosity, he gives some a higher wage than is due them, or if, in a spirit of liberality, which is allowable in universal justice, he adds somewhat to the wage which is due by virtue of commutative justice; provided, of course, he does not fail to give the rest the wage which they had agreed to. But what has that to do with our distributive justice, which demands that a fair share shall be apportioned of a thing to which several have a right, that is perfect, but unequal, in regard to quantity? And the word distributive, used in the passage cited, by no means indicates that the instance was concerned with distributive justice, but merely that there were many workmen to each of whom a wage had to be given by commutative justice.

Now with regard to the difficulty which Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 8, raises, we should observe that his expletive [expletrix] justice does by no means exactly agree with commutative, nor his attributive with distributive; and that his division is not on the same basis as ours. For our division is taken primarily from the matter which is due, and from the origin of the obligation, but his from the manner and the degree to which something is owed. And so it is clear why the distribution of the profits in the contract of a society belongs, in his opinion, to expletive justice, in mine to distributive. When geometrical proportion is observed in the contract of a society it is only from accident, since it is not necessary that members should have contributed unequal shares, but that they were able to contribute equal shares, and so there will be a simple equality in the division of the profit.

As for the example of Grotius: 'If only one person can be found who is fitted for a public position, the award will be made to him on the basis of a simple proportion only,' (K.), we must inquire further, whether¹ he has a perfect or an imperfect right to that position. If it is the latter, the case will be one for universal justice, if the former, we agree with what he says about proportion, that usually, but not always, a geometrical proportion is employed in distributive justice. But we have not taken our distinction between the two kinds of justice from the use of a different proportion. And so also the assigning of legacies belongs not to distributive but to universal justice; and when a state pays from its treasury the amount that some citizens have expended for a public undertaking, this is an exercise of commutative and not distributive justice, because the reason for the obligation does not come from an agreement by which the state received the citizen into its fold, but from a special and very different contract.

10. But whatever be done that is owed by virtue of a mutual agreement, in cases concerning things and arts connected with business, that is called commutative justice. Since such agreements have as their object that, in return for my contribution or act in the business transaction, I shall receive from another an equivalent contribution or act, or one that at least seems so to me, the reason is plain why this form of justice requires a simple equality which is commonly called an arithmetical proportion, yet scarcely such in the eyes of mathematicians, although Plutarch, On the Love of Brothers [xii], uses the term arithmetical proportion in this popular sense. Therefore, the thing or act concerned with business should correspond exactly, so far as its moral worth is concerned, with the other which is given or furnished in consideration of it. For a little later I shall discuss at length the objection of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 6: 'If we sell our merchandise for as much as we can get, no injustice is done the buyer, since he wanted and asked for it.'

Vindictive justice, which in our opinion forms a distinct class, will be more conveniently discussed in another place.

11. It will also be worth while to present the views of Grotius on justice, for he disregards the difference between universal and particular justice, and divides it into expletive and attributive, this distinction being based on the difference of right, which one man has to receive something from another, such right being either perfect or imperfect, and being also called aptitude. Hence, according to him, an act belongs to expletive justice, when something is rendered another, which was owed him by virtue of a perfect right, and which he could demand on his own right; but it belongs to attributive right when that is performed which was owed him only by virtue of an imperfect right. The reason for such a nomenclature seems to be as follows: What is owed me by a perfect right is in a sense conceived to be already my own, and hence, so long as it is not furnished me, I may be said to be lacking something of my own. And so even titles are assigned to my possessions, and can be passed on to another by way of payment. If, therefore, I receive something due me by virtue of a perfect right, I get nothing new, but only a thing is supplied which was lacking, and whose place was being filled in the meantime by an action. For example, a man who has borrowed a book from my library does not add to my library when he returns it, but only fills a place that was empty. But I cannot consider those things as mine, and count them among my possessions, which I have only an imperfect right to receive, for the securing of them depends on the honour of some one else, who cannot be forced by any violent means to furnish them. Hence it would be ridiculous if a beggar should try to make over to a cobbler, in payment for a pair of boots, some alms which he hopes to receive from a man of means. Therefore, when one man gives another something on the basis of an imperfect right, he actually gives him that which he was unable before that time to consider his own. And for that reason Grotius calls this justice the companion of those virtues which are of advantage to other men, such as generosity, sympathy, kindness, and the like, for men enjoy only an imperfect right to have such things. But when Grotius assigns to this justice that also of state-providence [providentia rectrix], I feel that this belongs more to the distribution of those rewards to which citizens have only an imperfect right. These can, indeed, be distributed with greater liberty than can those which are owed on a contract, but it would be very wise in dealing with such rewards to take strict account of each man's merits, so as to prevent complaints and rivalry. A passage of Isocrates, Areopagiticus [21 f.], illustrates this, where he speaks of the former leaders of the Athenian state:

And what chiefly assisted them in managing the state aright was this: Of the two recognized principles of equality, the one assigning the same to all, the other their due to individuals, they were not ignorant which was the more useful, but rejected as unjust that which considered that good and bad had equal claims, and preferred that which honoured and punished each man according to his deserts. (F.)

Grotius gives the following reasons for not using the nomenclature of Aristotle. The word συναλλακτική does not exactly suit commutative (therefore, expletive) justice, because that the holder of my property should return it to me is not due to a συνάλλαγμα [commutative contract], and yet it belongs to expletive justice. That is, although I have a perfect right to claim my property from any holder of it, still my action is not based on a synallagma, or express contract, into which I entered with him to restore my property, but I must needs only prove that the ownership belongs to me. An act of expletive justice which is not concerned with a synallagma is, therefore, possible. And the word διανεμητική 86 (distributive) does not correspond to attributive justice at every point, because the term implies several people among whom there must be some distribution, while attributive justice is exercised even when only one person is furnished a thing for which he alone was worthy.

12. The real position of Aristotle on the kinds of justice, so far as I can follow him, is as follows: Universal justice, which is, in his words, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. v, 'the exercise of complete virtue in relation to others,' is the virtue which belongs to all men. There are three kinds of particular justice. The first is distributive, διανεμητική, which is seen 'in the distribution of honour or wealth or any other things which can be divided among the members of the same community'. The second is corrective, διορθωτική, which concerns the righting of private transactions, συναλλάγματα, and this again according to him, is either voluntary or involuntary. The voluntary transactions are based upon free consent, such as buying, selling, leasing, hiring, lending without interest, depositing money, lending at interest, giving security. The involuntary transactions are seen in crimes, where what is properly an involuntary transaction takes place, because, for example, in a case of robbery my property has passed to a thief against my will, and so an inequality has arisen, in that he has more than he should, and I have less. This is corrected by taking from him what he has in excess of his due, and giving it to me. Suppose, for example, that some one, through the deception of the merchant, pays nine units of value for something that is worth six. Now the purchaser has three units of value, but the merchant has nine, while the just price of the article was six. Between these numbers, three, six, and nine, there is an arithmetical proportion, because the difference between the third and the second number in the series [and that between the second and the first]¹ is the same. This is the reason, I presume, why that correction of his is taken to be based on arithmetical proportion, in the strict sense of the term. See Joh. von Felden on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 8. And these two kinds of justice properly or especially concern those who exercise command in states. For upon them lies the duty, and not upon private citizens, to distribute the public goods among the individual citizens, to correct the inequalities that appear in the contracts or arise from misdemeanours, and to make them just. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. vii: 'Injustice then in this sense is unfair or unequal, and the endeavour of the judge is to equalize it.' (W.)

The third kind of justice is retaliation, τὸ ἀντιπεπονηθός, which regulates the manner in which men exchange things among themselves, whereby things which are different and unequal are compared and finally made equal, on laws of a geometrical proportion. For instance, when a horse and a pair of shoes are to be exchanged, it must first be decided how many pairs of shoes the horse is worth, and, if it is set at twelve, the 'retaliation', τὸ ἀντιπεπονηθός, would be observed if one took twelve pairs of shoes for one horse. See Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. viii, and the remarks of Michael of Ephesus, ad loc. And the exercise of this kind of justice falls as much upon private citizens as upon officials. But our statement, that according to Aristotle one kind of justice applies to all men, while the other applies only or largely to magistrates and judges, will be easily recognized by any who have gone deeply into his works on morality, and observed how he always has before his eyes some one of his own Greek states, when he discusses virtues. And since in these not all citizens had the same functions, it is not strange that he has recounted some virtues which belong only to a particular class of citizens.

13. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 6; Leviathan, chap. xv, appears to recognize but a single uniform justice, which is nothing else but the keeping of faith and carrying out of agreements, a view borrowed from Epicurus in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. X [50-1]. Hobbes says, that consideration is taken of commutative justice, in contracts of exchange, purchase, renting, hiring, making, and paying back loans, &c. But distributive justice, although there is properly no such a thing, is exercised by an arbiter, when he gives to each one of a number who had 87 deposited something with him, his own proper share. Nor is there any other equality to be observed than the following: Since we are all equal by nature, one should not claim for himself more right than he allows another, unless he has obtained the right for himself by agreements. And since, in his opinion, an injury, whether due to a positive action, or to an unjust omission, is the same thing as the violation of an agreement, he concludes that an injury can be done only to the person with whom some one has made an agreement. He seeks the reason for this position from his well-known theory, that a right to all things has been given by nature; but he has stretched this right beyond its proper limits, in maintaining that without an agreement, whereby a man takes from his own right and transfers some of it to another, a man has the right to do whatever he pleases to another, and does him no injury, provided he observes only his own right. Cf. Gassendi, Syntagma Philosophiae Epicuri, Pt. III, chap. xxvi-xxvii. But we shall show further on in detail, that this 'right to all things' can be extended only to mean, that nature allows a man to use all means, which sound judgement decides will tend to his firm and lasting preservation; and this use of reason Hobbes himself, chap. i, § 7, posits in his definition of right.

Now sound reason will never dictate that, out of pure wantonness, one should so affront another, that the latter cannot help being incited to have recourse to war, and to desire to return the injury. Furthermore, it certainly implies a contradiction to say that among a number of men with equal rights each has a right over everything and to everybody, since the right of one man over everything cannot avoid absorbing the rights of the rest, if it is to have any effect; and it is no less absurd to imagine a right which in turn has no effect against others. For in questions of morals, 'not to be', and 'to have no effect', are much the same thing. But what kind of a right is that which another has an equal right to resist? Who would say that I have a right to command a man, if he can, with an equal right, disregard my commands? or that I have a right to lay stripes upon another, if they can be returned upon me by an equal right, and that with interest? It is certain, therefore, that there is by no means any right for a man to do such things to another, and that he who does so, since he does it without right, does an injury. And, on the other hand, the second party has a right that such things shall not be done him by another; and when they have been, he has been injured. And so that right, the violation of which constitutes an injury, has not been acquired by a mere agreement with others, but has been bestowed by nature herself, without any interference of man. The statement is, therefore, untrue, that an injury can be done no one unless some agreement has been made with him, or something has been given him by way of a gift. We shall show in another place that Hobbes is also mistaken in asserting, Leviathan, loc. cit., that justice, as well as ownership, owes its origin in the final analysis to commonwealths. Indeed, the statement that all justice can be resolved into performance of agreements, is so far from true, that, on the contrary, before it can be known whether an agreement should be carried out, one ought to make sure that the agreement was entered into at the command, or at least with the permission, of natural laws. Add Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. viii, § 6.

From what we have said it is understood that, although injury and damage are very different, and although it is possible that by the same action injury may be done one man and damage another, it can by no means be admitted, as Hobbes, in the passage just cited, wishes to infer, that only damage and not injury is done a man who has suffered some loss or damage by one with whom he had no agreement.

Nor are the examples conclusive with which he would prove his contention. He says: 'If a master commands a servant who is under an agreement to obey him, to pay some money to a third party, or to do him some service, should the servant not obey him, the servant does damage, indeed, to the third party, but an injury only to his master.' 88 And yet if the servant has not paid the money when ordered to do so, the creditor will not suffer damage, since he still can bring suit against the master, and no more has he suffered damage, if his servant has not done him the benefit, when so ordered, although the servant is guilty of theft or some other crime, if he has seized and appropriated what he was supposed to give others on his master's account. For beyond the fact that the third party does not, strictly speaking, suffer damage by a failure to receive a service which was not owed (see Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 2), he will still be able to complain of the knavery of the servant to his master, and the latter will certainly not allow him to do such things with impunity. And even if the servant was far from doing the third party an injury, he still had no right to do what he did, since he supplies the third party with sufficient cause to make a complaint against him.

A second illustration, in his Leviathan, runs as follows: 'Private citizens may repay the debts they owe each other but not the robberies, murders, and other acts of violence by which they have been injured, since the failure to pay a debt injures only the parties concerned, but the crimes named above injure also him who represents the person of the state, namely, the legislator.' This we agree to, provided the conclusion is not drawn, that crimes do not work an injury on him who is hurt. But in the way this is proposed in his De Cive, loc. cit., it can by no means be allowed. He says: 'If a man in a state hurts another with whom he had no agreement, he does damage to the one he has hurt, but he does an injury only to him who holds the power of the entire state.' And can it be that the citizen who wrongs me injures not me but only my sovereign? And even if we should fully concede that those who live in a state of natural liberty have a right over everything, can such a right be possible among citizens of the same state, who recognize a common ruler? He adds: 'If he who has received a damage should complain that he had been injured, one could reply: "What business is it of yours that I should follow your wish rather than my own, since I do not prevent you from following your own pleasure and not mine?"' It is certainly untrue that 'such a reply is quite proper, provided there have been no special agreements between them'; nay, men would judge that a person had lost all common sense, if he thought he could turn aside another's complaints with such a reply.

But Hobbes, loc. cit., observes quite properly: 'The word justice implies a relation to law, the word injury both to law and to an individual.' For when something unjust has been done, all men can call it unjust, that is, it is unjust to all, but an injury may have been done not to me, or to him, but to a third person, and sometimes to no individual, but only to the state, as, for instance, by a death when one has been challenged in a duel, for not even the victim can complain because of such an injury, since he was willing to encounter the risk of a contest which is forbidden by law. But the lawgiver assuredly will have the right to vindicate his law which has been violated.

14. Now that the character of justice has been established, it is easy to define injustice and its various kinds. An action is, therefore, unjust, which is performed with evil intent upon a person to whom a different action was due, or which denies a person something which was due him. It is, indeed, injustice to do a man some evil which we had no right to do, or to deny, or take from a man some good thing which was due him, for the nature of good is such that it can be done for someone without cause, provided a third party suffers no injury thereby; of evil such that we can without injury avoid punishing a man as he merits, provided others suffer no damage thereby. Hence an unjust act either does to a man what should not have been done, or takes from him what should not have been taken, or denies to him what should have been given him, for even the denial or omission of an obligated action is considered in moral matters an action.

15. Now an unjust act, which is done from choice, and infringes 89 upon the perfect¹ right of another is commonly designated by the one word, injury. That this term may be clear, it should be borne in mind that an injury may be done to a man in three ways: first, by denying to him what by right he should have (M. Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 5: 'There is often an injustice of omission as well as of commission.' (H.)); second, by taking from him that which he already possesses; and third, by doing him some evil, which one had no right to do. Regarding the first kind of injury it should be observed that something is owed a man, either by the mere law of nature, such as deeds of humanity, beneficence, and gratitude, to which, however, he has no perfect right; or by a covenant, which is, in turn, either particular, or such as is expressed in our obligation to civil laws, which binds us to do for others what the laws require. When things of the latter kind are denied a man, it is properly called an injury, but not so in the other case, although they constitute an offence against the law of nature. Nor can the law of nature compel a man to observe its obligations, especially when no supreme power lies in it, unless a strict necessity happens to arise, since, indeed, the character of nature's offices requires that they be rendered without compulsion or fear of punishment. And to this extent, therefore, the statement of Hobbes is true, that: 'An injury can be done only to the person with whom there is a covenant.' But when some evil is wrought upon a man who has given neither consent nor cause, by taking from him something which he already had, or by inflicting some positive injury, it is certainly always an injury, whether there be a covenant or not, for nature gives every man the right that he be done no harm by another unless he has already been in the wrong, and no man unprovoked may hurt another, further than the due exercise of government shall require. We add the word 'unprovoked', because the condition, τὸ πρότερον, namely, that it be first, is required in order to make an action an injury. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. xv: 'A man who retaliates because of wrong done to him, and retaliates on the same scale, is not regarded as acting unjustly.' (W.)

16. A further requirement for a real injury is, that it proceed from previous choice and determination to hurt or injure another. The mishaps, therefore, which occur by mere chance, through an ignorant and unwilling agent, do not come under the head of injuries; as, for instance, when a soldier, while practising with a javelin in his regular grounds, happens to hit a passer-by, or when a man trimming his trees on his own property, unexpectedly lets fall a branch on a person who had no right to be there. Antiphon, Orations, VII [3 B], employs the following defence for a man who hit a boy with his javelin:

He was not doing anything that was forbidden, but he was following instructions; he was hurling the javelin not among persons who were taking exercise, but he was in his proper place among the javelin-throwers; neither did he miss the mark and shoot among persons who were some distance away. And yet, although he was doing correctly just what he intended to, he was not the agent of an involuntary act, but the victim, in that he was prevented from succeeding in achieving his purpose.

The same point is covered by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x: 'The definition of an act of justice or injustice depends upon its voluntary or involuntary character.' And further: 'When the hurt is done contrary to expectation, it is a mishap; but when, although it is not contrary to expectation, it does not imply malice, it is a mistake.' (W.) Michael of Ephesus makes the following comments on this passage [On the Nicomachean Ethics, Commentaria in Aristotelem, vol. XXIII c, p. 53, 8 ff.]:

Of hurts some arise from ignorance and are involuntary, others with our knowledge and are voluntary. Of those which arise from ignorance some are unforeseen and surprising, others are involuntary, indeed, but not unforeseen and surprising. Now after saying that hurts arising from ignorance fall under the general designation of errors, Aristotle goes on to make a subdivision, and asserts that those which come about unforeseen we ought to call misfortunes, and those which do not come about unforeseen ought to be called errors, using the same name for them as for the whole class. Those which come about unforeseen, would be the rare and unexpected; for example, if some one should open the door suddenly, and his father who was standing nearby be hit, or if some one were shooting with bow and arrow in a spot which no one ordinarily traversed, and suddenly a person who was passing through by some accident, was hit by the missile. For such events are unforeseen and unexpected. [. . .] But actions which are not, indeed, unforeseen, but where the agent is ignorant, ought to be called errors. For the man who casts a javelin along a road, or in a spot where it is perfectly possible that people may be, and strikes somebody, has committed an error, and such hurts are called errors. For, says Aristotle, a man commits an error when the moving cause of the fault rests with him; and it rests with him in this instance, in so far as he was casting his javelin into a place which people habitually passed through.

A trespass, ἀμάρτημα, of this kind is properly called by the Jurisconsults a fault [culpa] which they define as something committed through carelessness and awkwardness, when a man neglects and fails to know, what he should and could have known and observed. They give it three degrees, according as we can conceive of three degrees in proper care, the failure to observe which is fault. There is, first, the care common to all men, not sharpened by a keen mind or attentiveness, but arising, as it were, from common sense. Then there is the care¹ of a more educated man, beyond common care, exercised by any one in his personal affairs, which nature requires of each man according to his wit and capacity. And there is, finally, a most exact care, which is observed by only the most careful householder in his affairs. To the last is commonly² opposed what is called a very light [levissima] fault, to the second a light [levis], and to the first a serious [lata] fault. Regarding serious fault, they observe that it is equivalent to deceit in contracts and similar affairs, and when the case concerns the reparation of damage, but not in crimes, although in such it only lessens, but does not remove the offence. The effect of light and very light fault they show in general, when they discuss engagements in contracts.

Now when a man, through violent passion and an only partial intent, is driven to hurt another, such a hurt cannot escape the brand of injury, although the man may not at once be called unjust, because of inflicting it. Aristotle concludes, therefore, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x:

When a person acts with knowledge, but without deliberation, it is an act of injustice, as in all human actions which arise from anger and other necessary or natural emotions; for in doing such hurt, and making such mistakes, we are unjust, and they are acts of injustice, but it does not follow that we are at once unjust or vicious, as the hurt is not the consequence of vice. But when the action is the result of deliberate purpose, the agent is unjust and wicked. Hence it is rightly held that such actions as arise from anger are not done of malice prepense; for it is not he who acts in anger, but he who provoked the anger, that begins the quarrel. (W.)

17. Finally, an action to be called an injury must be done to one against his will, for it is a well-worn dictum that an injury cannot be done a man who wills it [volenti non fieri iniuriam]. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. xi: 'Thus a person may be hurt, and may 91 suffer what is unjust, voluntarily, but he cannot be the voluntary victim of injustice.' (W.) The reason for this is, because the good of which I deprive another at his wish, or the obligation which I do not fulfil at his wish, is considered a present from him to me. Who will say that I have committed an injury, when I have only accepted what is given me? Nor can what a man wishes to have brought upon himself be held an evil, since, indeed, an evil necessarily involves an abhorrence on the part of the will, it being understood, of course, that the man enjoys the full use of his reason, and has not been completely carried away by some violent passion. Add Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. iii, § 2-3. The definition of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 7, suffers from the difficulty that, under his theory, an injury can only arise from the violation of an agreement. And Aristotle draws the conclusion, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. xv, that the man who has been so angered as to commit suicide, has wrought an injury not upon himself, but upon the state, which he has deprived of the services of a general, soldier, workman, or some servant of this nature. And so a state which has been injured by such a man used to punish him by attaching some disgrace to his corpse or his memory. Add Michael of Ephesus, on Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. xv. Although the statement of Aristotle, loc. cit., that 'the law does not allow κελεύει [suicide], and whatever it does not allow it forbids', is false, unless the verb κελεύειν (command) be taken in the sense of 'permit'.

CHAPTER VIII

ON THE QUANTITY OF MORAL ACTIONS

|---|--|--|
| 1. The absolute quantity of moral actions.
2. The intention required by God.
3. The intention sufficient for courts of law. | | 4. The nature of a perfect or complete action.
5. The relative quantity of actions. |

IT is now our purpose, in connexion with the quantity of moral actions, to note in a few words how they are estimated and given, as it were, a quantitative rating. Now we find¹ that the voluntary actions of men can be estimated, either absolutely, in themselves, or relatively, towards one another. As regards an absolute estimation a very great distinction is drawn between a good action and a bad one. For if we consider a good action formally and precisely, we observe nothing that shows a characteristic of quantity, since the goodness itself consists in its coinciding or agreeing with law, which is understood to be incapable of measurement. And so one good action, formally and precisely considered, is no better than another, even if, judged by their matter and their object, as well as by the degree of obligation, one is more excellent and noble than another. But since an evil action departs from the letter of the law, its departure can be conceived to be greater or less, and on this account a sin, considered formally and in itself, can be estimated as greater or less, just as one curve departs more than another from a straight line. For the course of argument used by Zeno in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VII [120], amounts to nothing:

They lay down the position that all offences are equal. [...] For if one thing that is true is not more true than another thing that is true, neither is one thing that is false more false than another thing that is false; so too, one deceit is not greater than another, nor one sin than another. For the man who is a hundred stades from Canopus, and the man who is only one, are both equally not in Canopus; and so too, he who commits a greater sin and he who commits a less, are both equally not in the right track. (Y.)

Now if one wishes to compare with other kinds of quantity this deviation of a sin from the law, it seems to be like an angle, the sides of which are straight lines and the size of which can be measured by the arc, cut by the two sides of a circle described with its centre at the intersection of the line. And so, when in my youth I was studying the elements of this science, I used to explain the quantities of sin somewhat on the basis of a circle. But I now prefer to present them in a plain way, since such kinds of exposition are generally considered more appropriate to youth than to maturer years.

2. But since an action to be good must not only do what the law commands, but must also do it with a purpose that conforms with that law, it is clear, first of all, that if any action is held entirely good, what the law requires must be fulfilled in all its parts, and secondly, that the only thing moving the mind of the agent be the desire to show ready obedience to the lawgiver. And so, since we are commanded by the law of God to love Him with all our heart, with all our soul, and with all our strength, and our neighbour as ourselves, it is obvious that no action can be approved of God as entirely good, unless it is undertaken with the most perfect purpose, and unless the agent has no other goal in his mind than to satisfy the desire of the most Good and Great Creator. And this must be observed all the more carefully, since the least wandering or vacillation of our heart cannot escape that καρδιογνώστης [Knower of Hearts]. He who recognizes this truth will be loath to boast in the sight of God of his own perfection.

3. But in a court of law so exact a care need not be observed, for, inasmuch as legislators have, as the end of their laws, the benefit of the state, which for the most part depends on the external incidents of an action, whatever may be the intent of the agent, they usually are satisfied, if merely the form of an act follows the letter of the law. Especially since they cannot penetrate the depths of men's minds, nor apprehend the intent of the agent, other than by surmises and by signs apparent to the senses, which by no means give men a certain apprehension of what had been going on in the mind. Therefore, they measure the quantity of actions only with the senses, or in so far as the powers of man's wit and the usage of civil life allow, and so they bother themselves very little as to how perfect and sincere may have been the intent of the agent, provided the bare deed deserves approbation.

But men take greater cognizance of intent in the case of evil acts and, indeed, when no intent can be shown, as is the case with things which are undertaken from ignorance or by mistake, the act will be held to be involuntary, and since such an act is not usually imputed to the agent, so also it is understood to be void of moral quantity. But in general any moral act, undertaken of free choice, is considered so much the worse as the intention of the agent was more steadfast and complete. This intention judges have usually weighed by various conjectures and indications, since they cannot penetrate the innermost secrets of the heart, a point which is set forth more fully in another connexion.

4. Now as concerns the matter of moral actions, a good action is considered perfect in its kind which has reached, as it were, its full completion, and which is lacking in no expected part. Of actions which fall short of this perfection, one is considered inferior, as it departs from such perfection, whether one part was lacking from the whole, or whether it was merely undertaken and not completed. But, on the other hand, an evil action, which fully succeeds in its proposed purpose, is considered the worst in its kind, and each is less evil the farther it falls short of full completion.

But it must be noted concerning the objects of actions, as they are stated in laws, that they fall into a twofold division. For some admit of distinctions and others do not; that is, some are of such a nature that 93 an action must entirely attain them, or entirely fall short of them, or accomplish just the opposite; but in some objects a part of them may be attained and the rest missed, or the opposite be partly secured.

Again, a second distinction is observable among objects of actions, for some of them, as constituted in laws, embrace like species, as it were, the things into which they can be divided. Thus the positive law of the fifth¹ commandment in the Decalogue, as promulgated of God by Moses, gives the command to aid your neighbour in whatever bodily needs he has. And this goes on to include within it, like species, preservation of life, body, health, prevention of sorrow, and the giving of food in time of famine. And the opposing law, which forbids you to injure the body of your neighbour, includes within it, death, mutilation, wounds, stripes, and threats. See Digest, XLVII. x. 15, 1. Also the affirmative law of the sixth² commandment, enjoining chastity, contains purity of thoughts, modesty of speech and movement, abstinence from illicit intercourse; and the opposing law forbidding unchastity includes adultery, fornication, obscene movements and speech, and impure thoughts. Now, to illustrate this, unchaste words have, properly speaking, no relation to adultery in degree³ or part, but because the divine lawgiver desired for brevity's sake to include many acts under one special law, the man who has committed fornication has as surely and completely sinned against the sixth [seventh] commandment, as he who has committed adultery. Therefore, in the case of such objects, if what the law prescribes is not done, it must be either omitted entirely or else its opposite must be performed.

But some objects of actions, determined by laws, are so divisible that they contain the particulars, into which they can be divided, like integral parts, where the whole need not be fulfilled or avoided, or even the contrary done, but only a part of it can be accomplished and the rest omitted. If, for instance, the law commands that a labourer be paid all his wages, part of it can be paid and part be held back. But when I not merely hold back from a man what I owed him, but also take something from him, or do him some wrong, the action belongs at once to another species, and does not touch the example just cited.

² [The seventh as we generally count it.—Tr.]

5. Since, furthermore, one action may concern some more worthy object, another a baser one, and more good or evil may result from one than from another, it follows that for this reason among good actions one may be far nobler than another, and, vice versa, among evil actions, one may be considered far worse than another. This is illustrated by Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. iii [115-17]: 'Reason will never prove to us that the offence is one and the same, to cut a tempting cabbage in a neighbour's garden and to rob a temple in the night-time.' (W.) Add Cicero in his For Murena [xxix-xxxi], where he wittily attacks the famous dictum of the Stoics, that all sins are equal. And yet the saying of Horace is not to be regarded beside the point, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. xv [I. xvi. 55-6]: 'When you filch only one bushel of beans from a thousand, that makes my loss less serious, not your offence.' (W.) This belongs, however, to the relative measurement of actions, which is treated fully below, Bk. VIII, chap. iii.

ON THE IMPUTATION OF MORAL ACTIONS

WE have already said enough above, to point out what is required for an action to be imputed to a man, or, in other words, to be considered as belonging to him. It remains for us to see on what ground it may be imputed to him in act, to such an extent that it produces a moral effect in the agent himself or in another. Now, in the first place, the actions which are determined by law must be distinguished from those that are left to every man's choice. The former kind of actions is said to be imputed to an agent, when the legislator, who determined them by his law, distinctly says that the agent is their author, and at the same time gives notice that their effects belong to him in act, or reside in him. The latter kind of actions is said to be imputed, when the man who performed them for another's benefit, without pain of necessity, or hope of reward, states that he undertook the action for the other's sake, and wished thereby to put him under obligation to himself. The latter use of the word 'impute' is more common among Latin authors, the former is extremely common among theologians and writers on moral science. But there is a clear distinction between these two kinds of imputation, since the former passes from the author or custodian of the law to the agent, while the latter is laid by the agent upon the person for whose sake and benefit the action was undertaken.

2. The first kind of imputation is commonly subdivided into imputation arising from favour, and imputation arising from debt. The former is when a man out of kindness confers upon another the effects of an action performed by a third party, which effects the second party otherwise had no right to claim for himself, or when he of his own pleasure causes another's action to yield him larger effects than the action would otherwise have produced in itself. This last imputation, however, is possible only in things favourable, but not in things distasteful. For just as it is the nature of benefits that they can be given one gratis and without cause, so, if any one is unwilling to do some good thing for another under the name of a simple kindness, he can do it under the head of an imputed action, which did not otherwise belong to him, or was not able of itself to give him the right to demand such. But reason does not permit me, on the same ground, to lay upon another the effects of an evil action, which have no connexion with him, since those effects would otherwise not attend upon his natural condition. And so it is improper, that, for what was clearly another's fault, a man should be robbed of what nature has given every man as such, or that he should be loaded with things which nature in her generosity to all men alike has intended that he should not endure without cause. So, for example, a ruler may impute the merits of the father upon a son, who is still undistinguished by any personal graces, and because of them grant him honours not otherwise deserved. And yet it is unreasonable to punish the innocent son for the sin of his father. But it may happen that the sin of the father will be the reason why some advantages are not conferred on the son, or why he is deprived of things which would have passed to him, or would have remained in his possession, only under certain conditions. Still he can by no means, because of this fact, be visited with such an evil as his status would otherwise naturally repudiate. For in such a case nature did not guarantee the children that they would secure all their father's estate, or be admitted to special honours. These things were in store for the children only on the condition that the parents handed them down unencumbered, or did not impair their own freedom by some kind of crime. Nor is that man given a worse chance than the lot of mankind allows, who receives no estate from his parents, and must, therefore, be the builder of his own fortune.

But innocent children may, because of grave offences on the part of their parents, be so far proceeded against, that they may be forced to leave the state, for no man has a right from nature to spend his entire 95 life in this or that state, such a right being acquired from some deed of his own, or the deed of another. The retention of this right is based upon a condition, and the right is lost when some crime has been committed by a man's parents. It is not unreasonable, indeed, that the possession of a certain right should depend for its cause upon some condition, although, of course, no one can deny that the laws of some states are unjustifiably severe upon this point.

3. It is an imputation from debt, when those, to whose interest it is that an action take place or not take place, avow that an action belongs to the agent, and that the effects which have been assigned that action, shall properly be his. Consequently, if a law has specified a particular reward for a good action, it is obvious that the reward may be rightfully claimed by the man, who, in the acknowledgement of the enforcer of the law, has performed that action. But when a man has merely been ordered to do something on the authority of his commander, and without any promise of reward, he should be satisfied with the bare approval of his superior, and regard it a sufficient reward to have avoided the latter's displeasure, which would surely have awaited his failure to comply. On the other hand, when an illegal action has been performed, the man who has been recognized as its author has every reason to fear the penalty defined in the law. But if others, who have no part in the custody and execution of laws, approve a good deed or condemn a bad one, that affects the agent in no way other than in his mere reputation. This is illustrated by the well-known saying of Diodorus Siculus, Excerpta Peiresciana [X, frag. 12]: 'Now praise is a reward of virtue, even though it costs nothing, and censure is a punishment of worthlessness, even though it inflicts no blows.'

It should be noted further, that, when it is to the interest of several persons that an action take place or not take place, if one of their number does not impute the action to its agent, he does in no way diminish the right of the others, since it does not depend on his example. I can, for instance, forgive him who has injured me contrary to law, so far as it concerns me, but my example takes nothing from whatever claim the officers of the state may have. In the same way the mercy which God shows sinners does not destroy the right of a court of law. But if all who are concerned make no accusation, the deed is held to be null so far as concerns its moral effects. Now the performance or non-performance of a deed concerns those who constitute the object or the directors of the deed, that is, those against whom a deed is undertaken, and who will receive some benefit or damage from it, or who have the power to guide the action. Therefore, if he who has been damaged, the magistrates and God also, pardon a wrong, it will be considered morally as not having been done.

4. There is a great difference between the kind of imputation just described, and one by which an agent is said to impute an action, which he could have avoided, to the one for whose benefit it was undertaken. A man who has exactly performed the commands of his superior can expect approval of his deed from others, and especially from him who gave the order, but he can by no means lay claim to any reward other than was expressed in the law. See Luke, xvii. 9-10. For the same reason a man cannot claim that, because he refrained from an evil act which was forbidden both by law and by his superior, a right should be imputed him to produce something; but he will be content with his superior's approval of his obedience. For had he done otherwise than the law commanded, a severe penalty would have rightfully befallen him, and his avoidance of this will be his reward. And so in Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. vii, the man who, on being caught in adultery by a tyrant, drew his sword and killed him, and then asked a reward for his having assassinated the tyrant, is met with this reply: 'He is trying to put us under obligation to him, because, when he was caught in adultery, he was not willing himself to die.' And Cicero, Philippics, II [iii], very properly denies that he is under any obligation to Antony, because he was not killed by him: 'But what sort of kindness is it, to have abstained from nefarious wickedness?' (Y.) Others give as a reason for this position that the failures to perform moral actions are merely non-entities which have no positive qualities. But the reply may perhaps be made that they can be considered also as moral entities, in so far as they are regarded as restrictions and coercions of a natural faculty.

But when I do something for another man's sake, which I could rightly and conveniently have avoided, and avoid what I could conveniently have done, there is good reason why I should impute it to him, that is, demand as my right that he recognize the deed in question as coming from me, and that he be under obligation to me in proportion to the advantage which he receives from it. But for such an imputation to be justified, it is necessary that the agent have deliberately planned some benefit for another from his deed, and that a desire on the part of the recipient was expressed or implied, since a favour that was done against one's will cannot rightly be imputed. And it would be an act of effrontery for one to impute to me what he did without any thought of my interests, or even with the intent to injure me, just as he would be a fool to claim a reward from the man whom he had restored to health by lancing an abscess, otherwise incurable, when he made an attempt upon his life. Although Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I [lxxi], says that: 'Marius Celsus, with unshaken constancy, confessed the crime of adhering faithfully to Galba, and challenged his gratitude for the example he had set.' (O.) Add Genesis, xlv. 5; l.¹ 20. And after Eudoxia had married the Emperor Theodosius, she sent for her brothers who had driven her from her home, and, so far from being angered at them, actually thanked them for being the cause of her high position: 'For had she not been driven out by them she would never have come to Constantinople,' Zonaras, Bk. III, on Theodosius the Younger.

But when those who are concerned by common consent define the rate at which a thing should be imputed, an agreement now arises in which the imputation reaches, as it were, its limit, and beyond which it can find no way to go in the matter at hand. Cf. Matthew, xx, 13-14. Hobbes' remark, Leviathan, chap. x, bears on this: 'Merit presupposes a right arising from the thing promised.'

5. From all this it is a light task to apprehend the nature of merit, and of meritorious acts, the efficacy of which, as some would claim, will be found to avail even against God. Now the source of merit lies in one's doing a service which is not owed, and which another had no right to acquire of us, for, when a man does what he was absolutely obliged to do, he merely fulfils his obligation, and has no further claim from which any merit can arise. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. I, cont. viii [I. vi]: 'Allow me to bestow some favour upon my country; all my service hitherto has been merely in obedience to the law.' Julius Capitolinus, in his life of Antoninus Pius [ii], after giving as the reason for the emperor's surname, the fact that he gave his arm to his aged father-in-law in a meeting of the Senate, adds: 'Which act, indeed, is not sufficient token of great dutifulness, since a man were rather undutiful who did not perform this service than dutiful if he did.' (M.) Nor is it right to give a man credit for doing something that he did not owe to a person, against the latter's will, especially if the other received no advantage from it. Therefore, it is clear that no mortal can secure any merit before God, even if he could fulfil to the letter the divine law, and that, accordingly, God cannot be in any way a debtor of men, except through a free promise which His goodness would not allow Him to break, it being understood that no right, in the proper sense, could accrue to mortal man from such a promise. So also no actions, enjoined by a superior, can of themselves produce any merit which stands towards him who enjoined them. And although both God and men, by virtue of their power to command, often confer certain rewards on those who obey their commands, so as to incite them to prompt¹ obedience, they maintain that they are held to the payment of these rewards, only by their promise, and not by the merit of the agent, or, as it were, by a contract. And so these benefactions usually pass under 97 the name of a free reward, and not of payment. Euripides, Rhesus [162-3]:

Each deed that hath reward
 Assigned it, is with double pleasure done. (W.)

But if the legislators, nevertheless, state that some reward can be claimed from them for the performance of a specially designated action, there can be no question of the agent's claiming it lawfully and on his own right. And yet the mere omission of acts that are forbidden by law can in no way lead to merit, or furnish any reason for praise or self-satisfaction. The words of Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VI, chap. xi [VI. xxi], bear this out:

Justice is something more than not being unjust, [. . .] for good sense is something more than not entertaining nonsense, just as courage is something more than not running away from the ranks; and so temperance is something more than the avoidance of adultery, and no one reserves his praise for a man who has simply shown himself to be not bad. For because a thing, no matter what, is equidistant between praise and punishment, it is not on that account to be reckoned off-hand to be virtue. (C.*)

Add Luke, xviii. 11. Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXX, chap. xi: 'For not to seize what is another's merits no praise.'

The only actions now remaining, therefore, by which merit towards other men can be acquired, are those which are not owed them, at least by a perfect obligation, whether no obligation binds one to their performance, or whether native reason, indeed, commands or advises them, while their application to distinct persons is left to our judgement, or whether they are merely not enjoined by civil laws. For a man has so complete a right to the things which I owed him by virtue of a full obligation, that, when they are done for him, I have lost nothing which I had a right for the time to keep, or to use at my discretion; and, indeed, had such duties been denied or held in abeyance, the man would have suffered injury and damage. Since, therefore, these things already, after a fashion, belong to the man, and I cannot dispose of them at my own pleasure, they will be of no aid in producing further merit. But if I do something for a man without being perfectly obligated thereto, inasmuch as this involves a loss for me and a gain for him, it leaves me with a perfect or an imperfect right to receive from him some equivalent. And precisely this is merit. Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chap. xxi-xxii.

When we determine by an express agreement the exact amount necessary to balance this merit, it is properly called wages. But when the fixing of the amount as to kind, time of payment, and quantity, is left to the judgement and fair dealing of some one else, it is called reward. This takes a corporeal form, such as money and land; or incorporeal, such as the concession of privileges and immunities; or moral, such as honours and orders; or emblematic, such as statues, tablets, wreaths, and the like. Add Michel Montaigne, Essays, Bk. II, chap. vii.

And so merit comes only from actions that are not owed others, primarily as they are of advantage to them. And in the same way base actions, and especially those by which loss or injury is done another, give rise to demerit, by reason of which one is compelled to make good to another that loss. But in general evil actions cause guilt, which is understood to make a man liable to punishment, a topic which will be treated more specifically in another place [VIII. iii].

6. Now just as an imputation from act gives use to effects of moral actions, so its cessation, and, as it were, recall remove them; and this seems to be equally true both of good and evil actions. Mere imputation must necessarily attend both good and evil actions, so long as they are such, or so long as they are enjoined or forbidden¹ by law. But when a law has been annulled, the corresponding imputation for the action concerned ceases to be possible. He alone can remit the imputation of an action not due, to whose interest it is that the effects of the action should in fact take place. And so, if the performer of a task remits the imputation, wages can no longer be asked, although such a remission is not within the power of the person for whom the task was performed. The creditor may mark off a debt, but not the debtor. In the same way, to remove the efficacy of the imputation of an evil action lies within the power of those persons to whose interest it is that those same effects should become a reality, that is, in the power of him who was hurt, of the legislator, and of the guardians of the law, but not in the power of him who did the wrong.

The writers on civil rights list five ways by which a crime is made null in a court of law. The first is when the punishment prescribed by the laws has been undergone, for no one is punished twice for the same offence, especially when the penalty was adequate. Although, indeed, many penalties leave after them a stigma. See Suetonius, Claudius, chap. xvi. And often, even after the penalty has been exacted, the moral punishment or disgrace and marks of shame abide. Second, when the judges have cleared a man, he is held innocent in a civil court. The third is when the accused has died; although, in instances of the worst crimes, now and then, severities are inflicted upon the bodies of the dead, and upon their property and memory, in order to instil fear in others. The fourth is when, in the course of time, crimes are wiped out, to the extent that the guilty party may no longer be haled into court on their account. Seneca, Oedipus [826]:

What long hath lain concealed
I bid thee suffer to remain in doubt. (M.)

Although Lysias, Orations, XII, denies that a crime can be blotted out by the lapse of time. The last way is when pardon for a crime has been granted by him in whose hands is vested the supreme power in the state. These five ways are treated in full by Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XIX. i on Digest XLVII.

Now just as the effects of an evil action lie, as it were, dormant, so long as it is unknown, or generally disguised, or pardoned in advance, as it were, so, when once those effects have become a matter of public notice, their moral effects can, indeed, be blotted out, but not so their physical ones, if there be such. For what has once been done in a physical way cannot be undone, although action can be taken, whereby it will have no further moral effects in civil life. Thus, if a man has been scourged for some crime, he still carries the stripes which his back received, but the disgrace can be removed by a decree of the rulers of the commonwealth. However, if all imputation has been fully removed, the act is held morally as not to have been done. On these grounds we are to explain the passage of Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. I, el. i [62 ff.]: 'It is a smaller thing to suffer the punishment than to have deserved it. . . . The punishment can be removed, the fault will remain for ever.

Death at least by his coming will put¹ an end to my exile, my sin even death will not remove.' (W.)

It should be observed, in passing, that those persons labour under a great delusion who maintain that, to destroy the guilt of an evil action, there is needed besides non-imputation or forgiveness, the infusion of some contrary quality, or of a display of justice; very much as we destroy the spots on a wall by covering them with a coat, or dissipate a foul odour by burning incense. They have been brought to this misconception by their ignorance of things moral, and because they thought that moral qualities can be produced or destroyed by the same means as are physical qualities. The absurdity of this position could easily have been seen from what has just been said.

ON THE LAW OF NATURE AND NATIONS

BOOK II

CHAPTER I

IT DOES NOT SUIT THE NATURE OF MAN TO LIVE WITHOUT LAWS

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. The question is raised whether law is appropriate to man. | 5. The nobility of man prevents his having such a liberty. |
| 2. The general character of liberty. | 6. Depravity of liberty. |
| 3. The character of liberty as it appears in God. | 7. The varieties of mental equipment. |
| 4. The character of the liberty of animals. | 8. Its weakness and natural rudeness. |

Now that in the first book things moral in general, and the terms in most frequent usage have been explained, a task which, if scattered¹ throughout our work, would have destroyed the continuity of our study, we must now approach more closely our real subject, and inquire,² first of all, whether it would accord with man to pass his life without any law. From the answer to this question it will be clear why the most Good and Great Creator did not grant man a liberty to do everything entirely as he pleased, or according to his changing mood, without any restraint of right, rule, or necessity. For since God has endowed man with a will, that is, a faculty to direct himself by an internal impulse to the things which seem to suit him, and to turn away from what he does not like, and, indeed, in such a way that this same will is wholly free from any compulsion,³ one may well raise the question, whether it did not become His goodness to allow man a full and unembarrassed use of a will characterized by such flexibility. For why did God give him a flexible will, if it immediately had to follow set rules? As chains and bonds prevent the free movement of our limbs, so the freedom of the will seems to be entirely done away with, if we can will to do many things which must of necessity be avoided, and be unwilling to do many things which must of necessity be undertaken.

2. Now to go back some distance in examining this matter, it seems best to show, first of all, that an unlimited liberty would be disadvantageous and prejudicial to the nature of man, and that, therefore, it is conducive to his welfare for him to be, as he is, constrained by laws. And at the same time it will also be clear how far he should be free from the curb of all restraint. It must be understood that liberty in general is regarded as an internal faculty to do or to avoid whatever any one wishes. By the term faculty, we mean that he who enjoys liberty has not only the power to do something, and the force to move himself, but also to cause movement in other things, or in some way to affect them. By the term internal it is understood that the movement and power comes from an internal force, and not from a violent external compulsion, as when a piece of wood is moved by an impulse from without. The clause whatever any one wishes, suggests that the motion is not undertaken rashly and on a blind impulse, but that it is understood that the agent, to some extent at least, has become acquainted with the object, and has determined upon the act, after 100 some deliberation, and therefore the immediate reason for his action was because he conceived the matter in a certain way. But it is understood, at the same time, that other obstacles which might stand in the way of the motion, or turn it in another direction, ought to be absent if free play is to be given liberty.

3. From these remarks it follows that if one observes closely this universal order of things, he will find many which enjoy no liberty at all, such as all inanimate objects, and those which have life without sensation. Others enjoy liberty, but in different degrees. A liberty unfettered and free from every encumbrance and restriction belongs to the most Good and Great God alone, and is conceived as the most noble attribute of the perfection of His being, admitting no circumscription, and indissolubly bound up with His omnipotence. And so when God does not do certain things, or does not always do everything, the reason is not to be found in any deficiency in His liberty, but in His own good pleasure. Psalms, cxv. 3; Ephesians, i. 11. And when it is said that He cannot do some things, this is not due to any external impediment, either natural or moral, but to His own pleasure, which we mortals conceive as appropriate to His greatness and excellence. And in such a sense we must take the common maxim, 'God is a law unto himself.'

Likewise, when justice is attributed to God, it must not be understood as inferring any obligation or right residing in another, as the nature of human justice implies. But since He has shown both in His creation and in the revelation of Himself, that such a manner of acting is proper to His most perfect nature, we mortals apply that word to Him, which we use to describe such things as are lawfully performed by us towards others. And so when we say that the promises of God do not fail, this is true, not because His liberty has been limited by an obligation due to a promise, but because it pleases His divine excellence that no man shall expect in vain what he was bidden by Him to expect, or because the failure of a promise implies some imperfection, a thing that is utterly incompatible with the nature of God. And for this reason we mortals do not claim the divine promises as by any right of ours, but we reverently accept them as gratuities proceeding from His most free pleasure. For it is not with Him as with the promises of men. In the command, 'Pay what thou owest,' the promise becomes an obligation, and what was at first an act of liberty changes to one of necessity; but the promises of God, as well as what He vouchsafes without a promise, retain the perfect nature of gifts.

In some such stammering way as this are we men able to conceive the liberty which belongs to God, although the only certain thing is that such divine liberty surpasses by indefinite degrees the condition of man. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. vii, § 6.

4. We observe that brute beasts, which are below our condition of life, also enjoy liberty to some degree. But with them it is only of a low kind, since their strength and the dullness of their senses is confined within narrow limits, while their appetite is so base that it concerns itself with but few objects and with them in a very cursory manner, and is stirred only by the crude and everywhere obvious things which serve the belly. They have, furthermore, no customs, or law, or right which they are obligated to observe, either among themselves or towards men. Among a few there are some rudiments of marriage, but it is found only in the mere act of bodily conjunction, and some show¹ of affection, but not in any bond of fidelity. As for the most of them no vestige remains of affection, once their desire has been satisfied, nor any care for shame or kinship. Many of them have a strong love for 101 their offspring, which, however, lasts only until it can shift for itself; after this the parents take no further thought for their offspring, their love is entirely forgotten, nor do the offspring make any return to their parents, as if from a feeling of obligation, or bother themselves to render them any assistance. The beasts which live on flesh, tear and devour without scruple whatever pleases their appetite, and many of them in their savagery are brought to mutual destruction. Since they know no laws of ownership, on the gnawings of hunger they often fight fiercely for what is common to all, and no sense of propriety prevents their seizing what others had stored up for their own use. There is, indeed, no regard among them, no honour, no rule, no prerogative other than that acquired by mere superiority in strength.

Among some animals, indeed, likeness of kind often begets a form of friendship and society, and many, therefore, are accustomed to live in herds, while some, more ferocious than others, give vent to their savagery on other species rather than on their own. So Juvenal, Satires, XV [159 ff.], says:

The wild beast of similar genus spares his kindred spots. When did ever lion, though stronger, deprive his fellow-lion of life? In what woods did ever boar perish by the tusks of a boar larger than himself? The tigress of India maintains unbroken harmony with each tigress that ravens. Bears, savage to others, are yet at peace among themselves. (E.)

But aside from the fact that the above sentiment is expressed with considerable poetic licence, this relationship is scarcely a strong bond of lasting peace, since, forsooth, it is broken the instant a consideration of the belly interposes. Puppies play happily together, but throw a piece of meat among them, and at once you will see them fighting with one another. When some animals seem to show obedience, love, faithfulness, or gratitude towards me, it is due to mere habit, or the enticement of food. Remove these, and when their strength is sufficient, or there be something about a man to excite their appetite, they will not spare him. The conclusion is that no internal and moral restraint curtails the liberty of animals, but, on the other hand, their external movements are very often controlled by man through the use of force.

If, now, one asks why animals enjoy a liberty unrestrained by law, the simplest reply is, because God did not endow them with a mind that can comprehend law. For there seemed no need of great care in fostering and guarding the security of animals, which are not only produced by nature, in such great numbers, with high fecundity and little effort, but which also are without an immortal soul, their life coming only from a minute disposition and motion of particles of matter. And the Creator is pleased to manifest His power in producing and destroying them. Nor was there any great need of restraining the brute creation by laws, since their appetites are aroused only by hunger, thirst, and sexual passion, and can be slaked by the ready and copious provisions of nature; while man has strength and wit enough to prevent their licence, as it were, from doing him too great harm. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv, n. 11.

5. Now why the Creator was unwilling to endow man with a lawless liberty of this kind, and why such a liberty would be utterly inappropriate to him is clear for many reasons drawn from the natural or acquired condition of human nature. The dignity of man's nature, and that excellence of his in which he surpasses other creatures, required that his actions should be made to conform to a definite rule, without which there can be no recognition of order, seemliness, or beauty. And so man has that supreme dignity, the possession of an immortal soul, furnished with the light of intellect and the faculty of judgement and choice, and most highly endowed for many an art. For this reason he is called 'a creature above all others precious and endowed with lofty reason, fitted to rule over the lower animals'.¹ Solinus, chap. iii [i. 53], calls man an animal 'which the nature of things 102 has set over all other animals by virtue of his passing judgement upon sense perceptions and his capacity for reason'.

Now that the soul was destined for a far more noble end than merely to serve as the salt for this trivial body, is gathered from the fact that it is especially distinguished by such faculties as seem to be of little or no value in preserving the body, since it could be maintained by a much less elaborate provision. For the power of the human soul is chiefly concerned with such things as relate to the service of God, and to social and civil life. This end the soul attains chiefly by its power to proceed from known principles to unknown, and to decide what is suitable for it and what is not, to form universal ideas through induction, to devise signs by which the ideas of the mind can be imparted to others, to understand numbers, weights, and measures, and compare them, to understand and observe their order and its meaning, to excite, repress, or allay affections, to remember a multitude of things, and to call them back, as it were, for the eye to gaze upon, to turn its sight upon itself and to recollect its own dictates and compare them with its actions, from which recollection and comparison the force of conscience comes. There would be little or no use of all¹ such faculties in a life lawless, brutal, and unsociable. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturæ, chap. ii, § 4, who also farther on, § 33, adds some excellent considerations from the structure of the human body. Now the more splendid the gifts which the Creator has bestowed upon man, and the greater the intellectual qualities with which He has endowed him, the more base it would be for such qualities to waste away in disuse, to be expended at random, and to be squandered without order and without seemliness. And surely it was not for nothing that God gave man a mind which could recognize a seemingly order, and the power to harmonize his actions therewith, but it was of a surety intended that man should use those God-given faculties, for the greater glory of God and his own richer felicity. You may find an illustration of this in the words of Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. II [105-8]: 'How, beholding this, should one hesitate to link man with heaven? Nature has given to him forethought and speech and apt intelligence and swiftness of spirit. Into him alone has God descended and dwells in him, and seeks Himself in man's seeking of Him.'

6. Another reason why it was not felt that man should be allowed so great a licence as the beasts was his greater proneness to evil. No one will be surprised at this when he has probed to the depths the nature and pursuits of mortals. Beasts are excited by their appetite and lust, the latter of which stirs them only at certain seasons, and is indulged in not for superfluous pleasure, but only for the procreation of their kind. When this end is obtained their passion is quieted, and, as it were, lulled to sleep. Oppian, The Chase, Bk. III [151 f.]: 'It is not the work of beasts, when the belly is full, to go to couch and do the deed of love.'

But man's desire is by no means enflamed only at certain seasons; it stirs him much more often than seems necessary for the preservation of his species. So also the hunger of animals is most easily satisfied by the food which nature has strewn before them on every hand, and which needs no further preparation and no garnish, and when this hunger is satisfied no further cares disturb them. Nor do beasts break out into strife and reckless injury of one another, unless driven to it by hunger and simple lust, while the appetite of man longs to be whetted and not merely satisfied. Nature has given the beasts no need for covering themselves, while man has made the tenderness of his body an occasion to parade his vanity and pride. Furthermore, man is filled through and through with a great conglomeration of affections and desires unknown to beasts. A craving for luxuries, ambition, honours, and the desire to surpass others, envy, jealousy, rivalries of wit, superstition, anxiety about the future, curiosity, all these continually trouble his 103 mind, none of which touch the senses of brutes. Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. IV [4 ff.]:

Why should we still tread on the unfinished round
Grown gray in care, pursue the senseless strife,
And seeking how to live, consume a life?
The more we have, the meaner is our store;
The unenjoying craving wretch is poor.
But heaven is kind; with bounteous hand it grants
A fit supply for nature's sober wants.
She asks not much, yet men press blindly on,
And heap up more to be the more undone.
By luxury they rapine's force maintain;
What that scrapes up flows out in luxury again.
And to be squandered or to raise debate
Is the great only use of an estate. (C.)

Libanius, Declamations, IX [345-6]:

Is not man a gentle animal, as far as words go; but in actual fact, wild and fierce? For when did lions take the field against other lions? What war is there between beasts of the same species, or perjury, or violation of agreements, or such monstrous perfidy and avarice, what gold or love of wealth? what gorging and drunken sprees do they know, and what adulteries?

If, therefore, one will but consider the nature of the contentions and wars that are waged continually among men, he will appreciate that most of them are undertaken because of wants which are unknown to beasts. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxiv, n. 12, and chap. xxxix, n. 11.

With affections of such ferocity and variety what would have been the future of man had no right been established to compose them? You would see a pack of wolves, lions, or dogs fighting among one another to the death. Every man, indeed, would have been a lion, a wolf, or a dog to his neighbour, and something even worse than these, for there is no animal that can and does more injure man than man himself. And since men cause so many injuries to each other even now, when law and punishment hang over them, what would the future hold, if there were no control over anything, if no direction from within curbed the desires of man? Add Aristotle, Problems, § xxix, qu. 7; Pliny, Natural History,

Bk. XVIII, beginning. Iamblichus, Protrepticon, chap. xx [p. 123 A]: 'That men should live together and at the same time contrary to law, would be utterly impossible. For in that case they would suffer more than if each man lived altogether by himself. Now for these necessary reasons law and justice rule among men, and may never leave or be removed from them.' Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. II, p. 47, ed. Boecler, v. 13 ff. [592 ff.].

7. Man has, furthermore, a nature far more diverse and varied than any of the animals. The different kinds of animals have in general similar inclinations, and are moved by emotion and appetite, if you know one you know them all.¹ But among men there are as many minds as there are heads, and to each one his own way seems best. Horace, Satires, Bk. II, sat. i [27-8]: 'For every thousand persons there are a thousand tastes.' Philemon in Stobaeus, Anthology [chap.] ii [III. 26]: 'Now even if one bring together thirty thousand foxes, one will find but a single nature and character² among them one and all. But with us men there are as many different characters as is the number of our several bodies.' Pliny, Panegyric [lxxvi. 4]: 'Nothing displeases us more than what takes place as though it pleased everybody.'

Nor are all men moved by a simple or uniform desire, but by such as are manifold and confused. Nay, the same man is often different from himself, and intensely loathes at one moment what he greatly desired at another. 'He is driven too and fro by a strong tide of troubles, and turns his rapid mind now here, now there, and hurries it to various objects, and ponders all again, and yet again.'³ (B.) Add Charron,⁴ De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxviii. There is, furthermore, no less a variety in their interests, institutions, and inclinations to employ their vigour of mind, as may be observed in the almost infinite manners of men's lives. Quintus Calaber [Smyrnaeus], Bk. I [464 f.]:

Yea, of one blood be all the race of men,
Yet unto diverse labours still they turn. (W.)

104 Now the more voices there are, the more dreadful and unpleasant the sound in the ear, unless they unite in harmony. In the same way the greatest confusion would have prevailed among men, were not their dissimilarity of customs and appetites reduced to a seemly order through laws. And yet this variety in another way yields man a remarkable grace and reward, since out of it, if properly guided, a marvellous orderliness and beauty may arise, which could not possibly have come from complete uniformity. And besides, there were likely to be fewer clashes in so great a number of men, if their inclinations and desires turned to different interests. In the same way nature was wisely provident in designing such a remarkable difference in the features of men. For since different duties have to be performed by different people, and since we must act in a different way towards different people, the greatest confusion would arise if all men looked exactly alike, and one could not be distinguished from another except by certain marks of identification which would give abundant opportunity for all kinds of frauds, since they would depend upon human convention. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 28. And another secret, as it were, lies in this diversity of appearance, since one appearance may suit one man better, another some one else, and so each man may find a guise which seems the fairest to himself, and suits his fancy best.

8. And finally, the weakness of man made it necessary that he should not live without law. It is only a few days until an animal is developed enough to be able to look out for its own maintenance, and it is not dependent on the aid of other animals to find it. But weakness attends a human being for a long period after his birth. Quintilian, Declamations, cccvi: 'We human beings are but a feeble animal at this first. For the young of wild beasts and cattle are immediately on their feet and rush to the teats; but we have to pick up an infant and guard it against the cold. And even then it often expires between the hands of its parents and the bosom of its nurse.' Theocritus, Idylls, xxvi [xxv. 50]: 'For in all men the Gods implant this need of their brother men.' (W.) Add Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, Introd. How many years are necessary, how diligently must knowledge be acquired, to make a man able to secure food and clothing by his own powers! Imagine, if you will, a man who has been reared by another so that he is without the power of making his wants known, and can merely move himself where he pleases, without any information and training of the mind, whose knowledge is limited to what has come from his own natural endowment. Imagine such a man left in the open, away from any assistance or company of his fellows. What a miserable animal you will behold! A dumb and ignoble creature, with no power other than to dig up plants and roots, to slake his thirst at any spring, river, or pool he may happen upon, to crawl into caves so as to avoid the inclemency of the weather, to cover his body with moss or grass, to pass his time in an intolerable inactivity, to tremble at every sound or at the passing of another animal, and finally to perish of hunger and cold or to be torn to pieces by some wild beast. And so man owes it to his intercourse and relations with other men that he does not pass an existence more miserable than that of any other living being. The saying: 'It is not good for man to be alone'¹ is applicable not only to the state of matrimony but also to the association with other men in general. But a society of men cannot be constituted nor maintained in a peaceful and firm state without law. And so if man was to be prevented from being the most degraded and miserable of all creatures, it was not fitting that he should live without law. Plutarch also shows how a perfect liberty is not best for man, On Listening to Lectures [i, p. 37 D]:

105 [. . .] Reason under whose subjection alone men are properly said to live in freedom. For they only live at their own will who have learned to will as they ought; and that freedom of will which appears in unconstrained appetites and unreasonable actions is mean and narrow, and accompanied with much repentance. (G.)

From all this it is apparent that the term 'the natural liberty of man', such as in fact agrees with him, and is not conceived merely as an abstract idea, should under all circumstances be understood as something conditioned by a certain restraint of sound reason and natural law.

ON THE NATURAL STATE OF MAN

The use of reason should not be denied the natural state. 10. Mere barbarous customs do not make up a natural state. 11. Natural peace has no need of agreements. 12. Natural peace is little to be relied upon. |

By the natural state of man we do not understand that condition which nature intended should be most perfect and for his greatest good, but that condition for which man is understood to be constituted, by the mere fact of his birth, all inventions and institutions, either of man or suggested to him from above, being disregarded, since they give a very different aspect to the life of man. By them we understand not only the different forms and general culture of the life of man, but especially civil societies, at the formation of which a suitable order was introduced into mankind's existence. To get a more distinct idea of this state we will consider it in itself, especially as to what advantages and rights accompany it; that is, what would have been the condition of individual men had mankind discovered no civilization and introduced no arts or commonwealths; and secondly, in relation to other men, whether it bears a resemblance to peace or to war; that is, whether men who live in a state of mutual natural liberty, wherein no man is subject to another, and they have no common master, should be considered foes or friends. This last state is either full, that is absolute, in that it concerns all men absolutely alike, or limited and restricted, concerning only a certain part of mankind. The human race, indeed, can be considered in one of two ways, either as all men and individual men enjoy a natural liberty, or as they are understood to have gathered together with some persons into a civil society, but bound to other men by nothing but the bond of a common³ humanity.

2. Now in order that we may form some conception of this natural state, as it would have been without any aid or invention coming from the hand of man or given by God, we must imagine man as dropped from somewhere into this world and left entirely to his own resources, with no help from his fellows after birth, and, furthermore, endowed with no more gifts of body and mind than are now generally discovered

106 in men without previous culture, nor aided by any special attention from God. Such a condition must be regarded as most miserable, whether you imagine man to have come from the beyond as a babe, or as a man already endowed with his full stature and strength. As an infant he must certainly have perished, unless by some miracle an animal had given the poor babe nourishment from its own body, but this association with brutes would certainly have given their foster-child much of their own savagery. Were he a full-grown man, we would have to imagine him naked, able to make only inarticulate sounds, devoid of all knowledge and customs of men, in constant fear, 'amazed at the changing light of this earth,' as Manilius describes him, Bk. I [68]. At the gnawing of hunger he would seize anything he chanced upon and try it as nourishment, the first water he found would quench his thirst, caves or dense forests would be his only shelter from the storms. If, furthermore, we imagine many such men left entirely to their own resources on this still virgin earth, what a miserable and animal-like existence would they lead, until by their own experience and ingenuity, or, as the opportunity arose, by observing the cunning of some animals they slowly advanced to a kind of ordered life, and 'by taking thought fashioned different arts'.¹ Any one will recognize the truth of this if he is willing to note all the things which we now use in life and consider how difficult it would have been for any one to discover them all by his own powers, had not the guidance and labour of other men preceded him; nay, most of them would never have occurred to the vast majority of men. And so it is not strange that pagan writers, who were unacquainted with the divine account of the true origin of the human race, give so wretched a picture of the primitive state of man.

Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. iii [99 ff.], describes it in the following words:

When living beings first crawled on earth's surface, dumb brute beasts, they fought for their acorns and their lair with nails and fists, then with clubs, and so from stage to stage with the weapons which² need thereafter fashioned for them, until they discovered verbs and nouns by which to make sounds express feelings. From that moment they began to give up war, to build cities, and to frame laws that none should thief or rob or commit adultery. (W.)

And Lucretius says, Bk. V [925 ff.]:

But the race of men was much harder then in the fields, as was seemly for a race born of the hard earth. What sun and rains had brought to birth, what earth had created unasked, such gift was enough to appease their hearts. Among oaks laden with acorns they would refresh their bodies for the most part. But to slake their thirst streams and spring summoned them. Nor³ as yet did they know how to serve their purposes with fire, nor to use skins and clothe their body in the spoils of wild beasts, but dwelt in woods and the caves on mountains and forests, when constrained to shun the shock of winds and the rain-showers. Nor could they look to the commonweal, nor had they knowledge to make mutual use of any customs or laws. Whatever booty chance had offered to each, he bore it off; for each was taught at his own will to live and thrive for himself alone. And Venus would unite lovers in the woods; for each woman was wooed either by mutual passion, or by the man's fierce force and reckless lust. . . . But much greater was another care, inasmuch as the tribes of wild beasts often made rest dangerous for wretched men. . . .

Then after they got themselves huts and skins and fire, and woman yoked with man retired to a single [home], and the chaste delights of single love were known, and they saw children sprung from them, then first the race of man began to soften. For fire brought it about that their chilly limbs could not now so well bear cold under the roof of heaven, and Venus lessened their strength, and children, by their winning ways, easily broke down the haughty will of their parents. Then, too, neighbours began eagerly to form friendship one with another, not to hurt or to harm,¹ and they commended to mercy children and the race of women, when with cries and gestures they taught by broken words that 'tis right for all men to have pity on the weak. Yet not in all ways could unity be begotten, nor could breeding have prolonged the generations till now.² . . . But the diverse sounds of the tongue nature constrained men to utter, and use shaped the names of things, &c. (B.*)

A similar account is found in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. viii:

Men at first led a rude and brutish life, wandered up and down in the fields, and fed upon the most agreeable herbs, and the natural fruits of the trees. And since they were attacked by wild beasts, they were taught by their own advantage to help one another, and as they came together out of fear, they began to recognize little by little one another's forms. 107

And a little further on:

But forasmuch as what was useful for man's life, was not at the beginning found out, this first race of mankind lived a laborious and troublesome life, as being as yet naked, not inured to houses, nor acquainted with the use of fire, and altogether destitute of delicacies for their food. For not knowing as yet how to house and lay up their food, they had no barns or granaries where to deposit the fruits of the earth; and therefore many, through hunger and cold, perished in the winter. But being at length taught by experience, they fled into caves in the winter, and laid up such fruits as were fit to keep; and coming by degrees to the knowledge of the usefulness of fire and of other conveniences, they began to invent many arts and other things beneficial for man's life. (B.*)

Add I, xliii.

Cicero tells us, For Publius Sestius [xlii]:

Who of you is ignorant that the nature of things has been such, that at one time men, before there was any natural or civil law fully laid down, wandered in a straggling and disorderly manner over the country, and had just that property which they could either seize or keep by their own personal strength and vigour, by means of wounds and bloodshed. And there is no point in which there is so much difference between this manner of life, polished by civilization, and that savage one, as the fact of law being the ruling principle of the one, and violence of the other. (Y.)

He speaks to the same effect in On Invention, Bk. I [ii]. Euripides, *Suppliants*³ [202 ff.]:

Praise to the God who shaped in order's mould
Our lives redeemed from chaos and the brute,⁴

First, by implanting reason, giving then

 And water her green bosom; therewithal¹

The poets usually give the gods the credit for the discovery of the things most useful to man. See Oppian, On Fishing, Bk. II, lines 16 ff.

Fanciful as such descriptions are, yet these authors in a way were not mistaken, because, if one presupposes such an origin for the human race as they describe, the face of nature must have been much as they picture it. And this is the reason why, in their ignorance of the state of Paradise, they imagined that a certain temperateness of air and a spontaneous fertility of the soil prevailed at the beginning of the world, for they believed that man, so late an arrival, would not have been preserved, had the seasons been as inclement then as now, and had man been compelled to secure his sustenance with all the labour that is now required. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. I, line 107; Vergil, Georgics, Bk. II, line 336. Lucretius, Bk. VI [816-17]: 'But the youth of the world called not into being hard frosts nor exceeding heat nor winds of mighty violence.' (B.)

For although we know that primitive man by the aid of God learned very early the most necessary arts (see Genesis, iii. 21, 23; iv. 2, 17, 22), to which the sagacity of men added a considerable number of others; still his condition would have been wretched and base, if no states had been formed, if every one had governed his household at his own pleasure, and had allowed his sons at manhood to go forth into a state of natural liberty. In such a case the characterization could have been applied to all mankind that Euripides applied to the Cyclopes in his Cyclops [120]: 'Shepherds—and not for nobody they don't care.' (W.)

Hobbes has vividly described the inconveniences of such a state, De Cive, chap. x, § 1:

Outside a state we are protected only by our own strength, but inside a state by the strength of all. Outside a state no man can be certain of the fruit of his labours, inside a state all can. To sum up, outside a state there is only the rule of passions, war, fear, want, squalor, loneliness, barbarity, ignorance, ferocity; inside a state the sway of reason, peace, security, wealth, comforts, companionship, refinement, knowledge, and benevolence.

Cf. Polybius, Bk. IV, chap. xlv, where he recounts the miserable 108 state of the Byzantines caused by an interminable war with the Thracians. I myself believe that the complaint of the masses about the burdens and drawbacks of civil states could be met in no better way than by picturing to their eyes the drawbacks of a state of nature.

These are properly understood by those who have accepted as a proverb the saying: 'Were there no courts of justice every man would devour his neighbour.'

3. Now the rights attendant on this natural state of man can be easily gathered, in the first place, from the desire common to all animals, whereby they cannot but use every means to preserve their body and life, and to avert everything that would destroy them, and, in the second place, from the fact that those who enjoy¹ this state are subject to no man's orders. For it follows from the first consideration that men, constituted in a natural state, may use and enjoy everything that is open to them, and may secure and do everything that will lead to their preservation, in so far as no injury is done to the right of others. And from the second, that they may use their own judgement and decision, provided, of course, that it is framed on this natural law, just as they use their own strength, to secure their own defence and preservation. And in this respect also the state of nature has come to be described as a natural liberty, since every man, antecedent to any act of man, is understood to be under his own right and power, and to be subject to the power of no other man. And so every man is considered equal to every other man, since neither is the subject of the other.

A remark of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 7, must be understood and corrected in the light of what has just been said. He writes: 'The first principle of natural law is that every man preserves to the limit of his strength his own life and body, and bends every energy² to defend and preserve his body and members from death and pain.' The conclusion from this is that 'since a right to some end is useless, if it cannot employ the means necessary to the end, every man has the right to use all means and prosecute every act without which he cannot preserve himself'. But since no man in a state of nature has another as his superior, to whose desire he submits his will and judgement, it follows that 'every man is by natural right a judge', that is, every man decides at his own pleasure, 'as to whether the means which he shall use, and the action which he shall take, are necessary or not to the preservation of his life and his members.' For even though one man may decide to advise another, the latter can use his own judgement to decide whether such advice is agreeable to him or not, since he has not subjected his will and judgements to the former. And therefore he will do what the former advises, not as if the counsel had been dictated by the former, but only because it seems best to him; consequently he will act on the decision of his own judgement. From all this Hobbes concludes: 'Nature has given every man a right to all things, that is, in a pure state of nature, and before men had mutually bound themselves by any agreements, every man had the right to do to all others whatever he pleased, and to hold, as well as to enjoy, whatever he would and could. And so from this it is clear that in a state of nature utility is the measure of right.

However paradoxical all this may seem at first glance, one can by no means conclude that a man has any licence to do whatever he pleases to any one he pleases, if one bears in mind that the man described by Hobbes in such a state is still subject to the rule of natural laws and right reason. But since such a licence is a vain thing, and could not be considered by any sane man a sufficient means for his continued preservation, it must be concluded that nature never has granted it. And if any man should presume to use it, he would find it fraught with great peril to himself. Consequently, the real meaning of what Hobbes has said is this: Nature put within the reach of all men the things which 109 make for his preservation, before men divided them among themselves by agreements; and he who has no superior can of his own will, and at the dictate of sound reason, do whatever will work for his continued preservation. If, however, the real position of Hobbes is as harsh as his words appear at first blush to be, and will not allow this favourable interpretation of ours, let him see to it himself how he can avoid a just criticism.

It is certain, however, that the author of the Theologico-Political Treatise, whom Samuel Maresius calls the ex-Jew Spinoza, has described that right to all things, which accompanies a state of nature, in most repellant language; and it will not be inappropriate to consider his position at this point. 'The right and institution of nature', as he understands it, 'are nothing other than the rules of nature of each individual thing, according to which we hold that everything is determined by nature to a certain way of living and working; for example, fishes are determined by nature to swim, the large ones to live off the smaller; therefore fishes are using this greatest natural right when they possess the water, and the large ones live off the smaller.' We should observe that in this passage the word 'right' does not mean a law, according to which a man must act, but the faculty of acting, and what a person can do without injury, and therefore it cannot be properly inferred that a person ought necessarily to do everything he has the right [in this particular sense] to do. Furthermore, just as it is an improper use of the term 'natural law' to describe thereby whatever is done in a fixed and determined manner, so also it is improper to apply the word 'right' to the power and manner of acting to be observed in animals that are not endowed with reason. For he alone can be properly said to have a right to act, who acts on the basis of previous reason.

Spinoza continues: 'Nature, considered absolutely, has the greatest possible right to all things, that is, the right of nature extends so far as its power extends, for the power of nature is the very power of God who has the supreme right over all things.' Now, if by the phrase 'nature considered absolutely' is understood God along with all created things, we accept his statement, and are willing to attribute to God the supreme right, such, however, as is suited to the perfection of His being. But if by the term 'nature' is meant the sum of created things, as distinct from God, then we deny that the power of nature is the same as and co-extensive with the power of God. For the power of nature is, indeed, produced by God, yet not in such a way as to exhaust the power of God, for it was limited by the bounds which He has set.

Spinoza's inference from his principle is: 'Since the entire power of nature is nothing other than the sum of the powers of all its individuals, it follows that each individual has the greatest possible right to all things, that is, the right of each individual extends as far as his determined power.' But I do not think that there is a logical sequence in an argument like this: 'The power of all nature is only the power¹ of all its individuals; therefore, any individual has supreme right to all things.' Is it not rather true that each individual has a certain definite bit of right, and therefore single individuals can by no means claim for themselves a right which belongs to each man from the whole of nature?

He continues: 'And because it is the supreme law of nature that each thing shall endeavour to the limit of its ability to continue in its own state, and without regard for anything other than itself, it follows that each individual has the supreme right to this, that is, to existence and freedom of action, as has been determined by nature.' In addition to an improper use of the phrase 'law of nature', it is certainly untrue of men that their nature is so determined that they endeavour to preserve themselves without regard for anything other than themselves. But, properly speaking, in contradistinction from free agents, those things are said to be determined by nature which are bound to a uniform manner of acting, and therefore men in regard to actions, which can be 110 controlled by them, are not limited by nature, but by law to something definite; consequently, men do not forthwith have a right to do whatever is within their natural power. But the idleness of all such arguments will be clear if circumlocutions are dispensed with, and they are set forth as follows: 'God has supreme right over all things; the power of nature is the power of God; therefore, nature has a right over all things: But the power of nature is the united power of all individuals; therefore, each individual² has a right over all things.' I leave it to any competent person to decide whether there is a proper sequence in this argument.

Spinoza is also wrong in saying: 'No difference should be recognized on this point between men and other individuals of nature' (here the point should have been raised only about the right of men), 'neither between persons endowed with reason, and those who do not exercise reason, nor between the simple and insane, and the sane.' Now although some may be quicker and others slower in the use of their reason, still, any one possessed of the slightest use of reason can at least understand that he has no need for an unlimited right to everything, merely in order to preserve himself, and that such a right could not properly belong to him. It is idle to discuss the right of those who have no use of reason, and it will not be possible to draw any conclusions on the natural condition of man from examples of men mentally diseased; nay, such persons can be saved by some method other than the possession of a right over all things. The reason advanced by Spinoza for this view is also vain: 'For whatever anything does by the laws of its nature, it has the highest right to do, since, indeed, it can act in no other way than as it is determined by nature.' But we deny that a man, through doing anything by the laws of his nature, assumes a right over all things, or that he has been determined by nature to exercise such a right.

Therefore, Spinoza's conclusion is wrong: 'So long as men are supposed to live by the rule of reason alone, those of them who have not yet learned its use, or who have as yet no habit of virtue, and live by the laws of appetite alone, live by supreme right as much as he who directs his life according to the laws of his own reason. That is, just as a wise man has supreme right over all things which reason suggests, or of living by the laws of reason, so an ignorant and senseless man has supreme right over all things which his appetite suggests, or of living by the laws of appetite.' But a state of nature and its rule presupposes a reason in man, and a wise man is not expected to live under one kind of laws and a dull man under another, while those who are ruled only by their appetite are subject to no right or law. No living by right or law is possible for a man whose appetite departs from law, but his every act is a violation of laws.

The conclusions based upon his premises are just as faulty: 'The natural right of each man is determined not only by his sound reason, but by his desire and strength. For not all men are determined by nature to act according to the rules and laws of reason; rather all men are born ignorant of everything, and before they can work out a sound manner of life and acquire a habit of virtue, a large part of their life, even though they have received an education, is already past; but nevertheless they must live in the meanwhile, and preserve themselves to the best of their ability, and that only on the impulse of their appetites, since nature has given them nothing else, and has denied them the real power to live by sound reason. Consequently, all men are no more bound to live by the laws of sound reason than are cats by the laws nature has given lions.' Now in order that one may be expected to live according to reason, it is not necessary that he shall be determined by nature to act according to the laws of reason, that is, so that he cannot do otherwise; but it is sufficient if he has enough natural power to enable him to protect himself from injury and hurt, and that is easy enough. Also the manner of preserving himself is not so difficult that 111 man must needs have a right over all things. And there cannot be expected of one, who, because of his childhood, is still ignorant of all things, a more careful direction of his actions than befits his mental capacity, and the slight development of his reason. But nature has taken care that the acts of such a person shall be capable of doing as little harm as possible to others, by giving him but little strength, and by entrusting to others the direction of the acts of such children.

And finally, the following conclusion is false: 'Consequently, whatever any one, considered to be under the control of nature alone, thinks is useful for himself from the guidance of sound reason, or the command of his passions, that he has a supreme right to seek and secure by any device which is best suited, whether it be by force, or fraud, or supplication, or any means whatsoever, and he may hold as his enemy the man who tries to prevent him from satisfying his desire.' And again: 'It follows from this that the right and the institution of nature, under which all men are born, and for the most part pass their lives, is averse to nothing except what every man does not desire, and is unable to prevent, not even averse to strife, hatred, anger, or anything that the appetite desires.' This assertion is absolutely untrue as regards men, and, if it be applied to all kinds of animals, in the sense that there is no way of living, or of preserving oneself, which is not exercised by every animal on the instinct of its own nature, then it is beside the point, since the question to be decided is whether men have a right to do anything to other men. And yet the following words show that Spinoza has the latter idea before his eyes: 'And it is not strange, for nature is not summed up in the laws of man's comprehension, which have as their object only the real advantage and preservation of men, but her laws look to the eternal ordering of an infinite number of things, which belong to the sum of nature and of which man is but a little part.' And yet he confesses a little later on that it is more profitable for men to live according to laws and certain dictates of our reason, which aim at the real benefit of man. But what was the point of creating a right for man, the use of which he had of necessity to disavow if he wished to live in safety? Other animals which live under a right to all things do not have to renounce it in order to secure their own safety, and neither would man, did such a right really belong to him by nature.

4. But we maintain that the race of man never did live at one and the same time in a simple state of nature, and never could have, since we believe on the authority of Holy Writ, that the origin of all men came from the marriage of a single pair. Now Eve was subject to Adam by the right of the husband, Genesis, iii. 16, and their offspring were, immediately after birth, under the father's power and the control of the family. But the entire human race might have been in that state, if what has been said by certain heathen writers were believed, and in the beginning they had come forth from the earth like frogs, or had sprung like the brothers, in the tale of Cadmus, from scattered seed. I fancy the latter account may portray the state of nature and the war of all against all, as it is depicted by Hobbes, when 'the same dire madness raged in them all, and in mutual strife by mutual wounds these brothers of an hour perished,' (M.), Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. III [122-23].

Therefore, a state of nature never actually existed, except in some altered form, or only in part, as when, indeed, some men gathered together with others into a civil state, or some such body, but retained a natural liberty against the rest of mankind; although the more groups there were in this division of the human race, and the smaller their membership, the nearer it must have approached a pure state of nature. So when at the first mankind separated into different family groups, 12 and now have divided into states, such groups live in a mutual state of nature, in so far as no one group obeys another, and all the members have no common master. In this way, in early times, when brothers left their father's house and set up each for himself an independent family, they began mutually to live in liberty and a state of nature. And so it was not the first men but their descendants who began in fact to live in a state of nature. Now this state, limited in the way just specified, lacks those inconveniences¹ which are attendant upon a pure state of nature, this applying especially to such as have formed themselves into states; furthermore, it is felt that the height of mortal achievement has been attained, when security rests upon the strength of the entire state, and where one recognizes no man on earth² to be his superior. And so commonwealths and their officials may properly claim for themselves the distinction of being in a state of natural liberty, when they are girded with the powers which allow them its secure enjoyment, while it is a thing of little joy or use for those who enjoy individually a pure state of nature to have no superior, since the weakness of their own resources makes their safety hang by a thread.

They are mistaken who maintain that such a natural liberty does not exist, or at least is not properly called natural, using the following reasoning: 'Since nature has for its end an ordered society, and since order is not possible without government, as there is also no society without government, so government should properly be called the natural thing.' To prove their argument Cicero is quoted, On Laws, Bk. III [i]:

Nothing is so conformable to justice and to the condition of nature[. . .] as sovereign power; without which, neither house, nor commonwealth, nor nation, nor mankind itself, nor the entire nature of things, nor the universe itself, could exist. For this universe is obedient to God, and land and sea are submissive to the universe; and human life depends on the just administration of the laws of order. (Y.)

And so Hobbes is criticized, because he called such a state truly natural, which, according to his picture, was not worthy of man or true to his life, being more suitable to the life of beasts, to the nature of which both reason and speech are foreign. Surely there is no reason, they point out, no nature, capable of right and sound judgement, that will say all men can do, attempt, and possess all things. Such desires may belong to a depraved nature, but cannot be the dictates of a right reason, which, in striving for society, necessarily strives for an ordered society, which allows no licence for such disorderly movements. For what order can there be which does not look toward some first principle? And this first principle is all-important, and designed to control all things, that is, it is government, or the highest power in society, and unless this is present, no society is sought by any being which makes use of reason and discourse. Nature has advanced to the point where it proves that government is a natural thing in every society, but liberty, scorning every government, is at constant odds with nature. See Bocler, On Grotius, Prolegomena.

It is easy from what has gone before to frame a reply to such remarks. By a purely natural state is meant the condition of man when it is separated from all things which have been added to it by human institution, with the understanding that nature never intended man to spend his days in that state. For example, complete ignorance may be said to be natural or congenital with man, although his acquisition of extensive knowledge is not contrary to nature. Furthermore, we attribute to man no such natural liberty as is free from the obligations of natural law and divine rule. But a liberty which scorns all control by man can no more be said to be at odds with nature than it can be said to allow an infinite increase. Government, indeed, is a natural thing, and it was nature's intention that men should set up governments among themselves. But it was no less the purpose of nature that he who holds supreme authority over other men should be free from any interference on their part, and should thereby enjoy natural liberty; unless, indeed, we choose to admit into the same order something superior even to what is supreme. And for this reason it is in accordance with nature that the man who has no master should govern himself and his actions by the dictates of his own reason. 113

5. It is a question of greater importance whether a natural state, as it concerns other men, bears the character of war or peace; or, what amounts to the same thing, whether those who live in a natural state, that is, who have no common master, and neither obey nor command one another, should be considered as mutual enemies, or, indeed, as peaceable people and friends. In this connexion Hobbes' opinion should be considered, where he calls a purely natural state one of war, not a single war, but one of all men against all other men, and so he maintains that those who have united to form one commonwealth, drop that hostile state toward one another, but all other men remain their enemies. De Cive, chap. ix, § 3: 'Each man is an enemy to that other, whom he neither obeys nor commands.' He should have added, 'and with whom he has no common master.' Ibid., chap. xiii, § 7:

For the state of commonwealths considered in themselves is natural, that is to say, hostile. Neither if they cease from fighting, is it therefore to be called peace; but rather a breathing spell, in which one enemy, observing the motion and countenance of the other, values his security not according to the pacts, but the forces and counsels of his adversary (and, he should have added, 'according to his own resources').

This is very much like the state of fishes as described by Oppian, On Fishing, Bk. II [44 ff.]: 'For they all swim about hostile and savage to one another: for the stronger ever feeds upon the weaker; each darts at the other, intent upon his death. One furnishes food for another.' And again: 'The others live in a state of mutual hostility. Therefore, you will never see fish asleep; rather are their eyes and senses always alert and wakeful,¹ since they always fear the approach of a stronger, and set upon the weaker.' Add Polybius, Bk. XV, chap. xx. Hobbes adds, Leviathan, chap. xiii [7]:

War consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting, but in a tract of time, wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known. [. . .] For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together, so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto [. . .]

And, indeed, Hobbes is not the first to say this, for the same sentiment is already to be found in Plato, Laws, Bk. I [p. 625 E F], where Clinias the Cretan explains why the Cretan lawgiver introduced so many military institutions, and adds: 'He seems to have thought the world foolish, in not understanding that war is always going on among all men and cities [. . .], for what men in general term peace is a name; in reality, every city is in a natural state of war with every other, not, indeed, proclaimed by heralds, but everlasting.' (J.*)

At this place it is to be noted, in passing, that several writers have not been as precise as they should have been in discussing this point, when they allege that by a natural state is meant one in which we are understood to live to ourselves, or are constituted without any society, 114 and that this is a state of war, that is, of intent to take what another has, and to drive the owner away from it. And so they mean that if men lived without union they would be constantly embroiled in quarrels, that is, if men did not live a social life, they would live in a state of constant discord. But it is not proper to oppose a state of nature to a social life, since even those who live in a state of nature can, and should, and frequently do, lead a mutually social life. But since almost all the questions which the directors of states are expected to raise, and actually do raise, in their relations with neighbouring states, lead back to this one point, I feel it will be worth while for us to examine in a somewhat more detailed fashion the arguments which can be raised on both sides.

6. Now Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i; Leviathan, chap. xiii, endeavours to show in the following way, that a natural state is a state of war. The reason why man naturally fears man, and so is in a state of war with him, is because men have both the ability and the desire to harm one another. He proves their ability to do harm by the fact that men of mature years have very much the same strength, for although one man very often has a stronger body than another, it is still possible for the weaker, by craft or the help of others, to overcome the stronger, since his vital parts are just as exposed to death as are those of the weakest man. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. iii: 'No man is so low in station that he cannot hope to inflict punishment even upon the greatest of men'; we are all strong to do harm. Nor can the natural cunning, which is commonly to be seen in one man more than another, keep a man safe from such danger, if he has no means of defence other than his own strength. Furthermore, since death, which is the greatest evil that men are able to inflict on each other, can be inflicted just as well on the strong by the weak, as on the weak by the strong, it follows that those who can do each other the greatest harm possible must in effect be equal in strength. But the desire to work harm exists in some men from necessity, in others from their evil cravings, for inasmuch as some would have everything permissible for themselves, claim a position above all others, and set upon others for no good reason, the rest, no matter how retiring they are, or willing to share with others whatever they themselves enjoy, are led to the necessity of defending themselves against such aggression. There are, indeed, many persons, of whom Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. V [495 ff.], says:

They make no difference between war and peace.
 Their friends and enemies alike they awe,
 They everything to wild contention draw,
 Their will their ruler and their sword their law.

Bk. V [120 f.]:

Whose births delight in tumults, hate soft peace¹,
Seditions seek, and live averse to ease. (C.)

The desire to work harm, continues Hobbes, arises also from a clash of minds, since every man thinks he is wiser than any other, and is extremely restive when a similar claim is made by his neighbour. As a result, hatred is caused not merely by opposition to a person, but even by failure to agree with him, for since two contradictory statements cannot be true at the same time, when a man does not agree with another, he accuses him of mistaken judgement, and if he disagrees with the other on many points, he obviously regards as a blockhead the man who is not able to understand such a plain statement of fact, as each one feels his own opinion to be. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xxvi]: 'To be imposed upon, to mistake, to falter, and to be deceived, is as ungraceful as to rave or be insane.' (E.) Pertinent also is Horace, Epistles, Bk. I [II. i. 83 ff.]: 'Either they think nothing can be right but what has pleased themselves, or else they think it shame to be led by their youngers, and to confess in their old age that what they learned before their beard grew is poor stuff.' (W.) And Juvenal, Satires, XV [35 ff.]: 'Each place hates its neighbour's gods, since it believes those only ought to be held deities which itself worships.' (E.)

Since now, all pleasure of a man's mind consists in his ability to advance himself above others, there needs must come times when 115 manifestation of one's contempt for others must be seen, whereby the feelings of men are aroused as in no other way. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [viii]: 'Where the object of ambition is of such a nature as that several cannot obtain pre-eminence, the contest for it is generally so violent that nothing can be more difficult than to preserve the sacred ties of society.' (E.) Nor is it only 'in the levity of the Greeks that there is such perversity, that mankind attacks those men with evil speaking with whom they disagree as to the truth of a proposition'. (Y.*) Idem, On Ends, Bk. II [xxv]. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xl, n. 6-8.

The last and most frequent reason why men desire to harm one another is because several set their desires at the same time on one and the same thing, which they either cannot or will not share in common, or divide. This, of course, must go to the strongest, but who is strongest must be decided by fighting. So Xenophon represents Socrates as saying; Memorabilia, Bk. II [vi. 21]:

Man is made up of contrarities. Inclined to friendship from the want he finds in himself of friends, he compassionates the sufferer; he relieves the necessitous; and finds complacency and satisfaction, whether his turn is to receive or confer an obligation. But as one and the same thing may be an object of desire to many, strife, enmity, and ill-will become thereby unavoidable; benevolence is extinguished by avarice and ambition; and envy fills the heart, which till then was all affection! (F.)

Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III, chap. xxxiv: 'The desire of the same thing, which should be a bond of affection, is the cause of strife and hatred. For since what you desire is small, and cannot be given to one without being taken from another, it gives rise to struggles and quarrels among those who desire it.' Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 8.

For these reasons, therefore, he says, mankind cannot avoid being for ever in mutual fear and suspicion. And since one's natural feeling, as well as one's reason, assures every man that his safety is his supreme good, and allows him, for the purpose of securing it, to use every means, the propriety of which is left to each man's judgement, because he has no superior, therefore every man must necessarily desire to overcome others rather than expose himself to their attacks. And the result of this is finally a kind of state of limitless warfare, conducted by all men against all others, which has as its corollary that each man is allowed to do to another, either secretly or openly, anything which he thinks will be for his own advantage. And although in this warfare reason may now and then fail him, he would still be doing another no real injury, since, of course, justice and injustice are terms which concern only those who have united to form states; although a man may sin against reason in using ineffective means to secure his preservation.

7. Such ideas as these may seem tolerable in a way, if they are thrown out as a kind of hypothesis. And one might infer from De Cive, chap. viii, § 1, that they were used in this sense by Hobbes, where he says: 'Let us return again to the state of nature, and consider men as if but now sprung out of the earth, and suddenly, like mushrooms, come to full maturity, without all kind of engagement to each other, &c.' And yet, in another place, chap. xiii, § 7, and passim, without any suggestion of hypothesis, but in all seriousness, he calls the status of commonwealths natural, or, as he explains it, hostile. These statements may be reconciled thus: It is, indeed, a hypothesis that all men at one and the same time ever lived together in a state of nature, such as would be the case if, at some future time, a great host of men should suddenly spring from the ground; but as a matter of fact such a state of nature does exist between some men who are, indeed, not subject to one another, and have no common master, as is now the case with all nations. And he says this in so many words in his Leviathan, chap. xiii: 'But though there had never been any time, wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times, kings, and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies, &c.'

But the main argument for the opposite opinion is the origin of the human race, as the infallible authority of the Sacred Scriptures teaches it to us, for they show that the natural state of men was one of peace rather than war, and that men were more like friends to one another than enemies. To the first man, made by the hand of God from clay, there was united a mate whose substance was drawn from 116 man himself, so that he might cherish her forthwith in a tender love, since she was of his own flesh and bone. And God joined her to him by a further and most holy bond. Since from this pair all mankind is descended, the human race is related by no mere general tie of friendship, such as may come from similarity of appearance, and is spoken of in Digest, I. i. 3, but by the tie which comes from common ancestry and blood, and which is marked by a kindly affection for one's own. A memory of this relationship has practically vanished among those who are far removed from the parent stock, and yet, when a man disregards it, and adopts an attitude of hostility towards others, it is proper to feel that he has departed from his primitive and natural state.

There will be no point in objecting that, even from such a creation, it follows that the natural state of man was one of war, on the ground that if societies were necessarily coexistent with the creation of men, so as to enable them to live at peace, it must follow that, without a society, men would not have lived at peace, and societies had to arise at the same time with men, so that they might not live in a state of war.¹ Our reply to this is that we are concerned here with a state of nature, not as may be conceived in the abstract, but as it actually is. Furthermore, since the first men lived in a state which was by no means one of hostility, but was charged with pure friendship, and since the rest of men have sprung from such a state, it is clear that, if men really want to bear in mind their first beginning, they should be regarded not as enemies but as friends. In fact, societies were at the beginning introduced among mankind, not with the purpose of avoiding a natural state, but because the human race could not be increased and preserved without them. And a natural state grew out of this condition, because as men multiplied they could no longer be embraced in one society. And so there is no point in asserting that, had there been no social state, men in the beginning of things would have lived at enmity with one another, unless you wish to imagine that, in the beginning, a multitude of men, in no way related to one another, suddenly sprang into being. Aristotle's words bear on this matter, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. xi [25]: 'Then since that which is according to nature is pleasant, and kindred things are natural to each other, all things akin to one and like one are pleasant to one, as a rule—as man to man.' (J.) Cicero, On Ends, Bk. III [xix]: 'There is such a recommendation by nature of one man to another, that one man ought never to appear unfriendly to another, for the simple reason that he is a man.' (Y.) Note also what he says in his On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. I [xxvii]: 'But do not you see what a soothing flatterer, what a sort of procuress nature is to herself? Do you think there is any creature on the land or in the sea that is not highly delighted with its own form? If nature, therefore, has instructed us in the same manner, that nothing is more beautiful than man, what wonder is it that we, for that reason, should imagine the Gods are of the human form?' (Y.) Quintilian, Declamations, V: 'There is a general kinship of all mankind, since they are derived from one parent, even nature.' Add Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 9, where he presents at length the argument that the similarity of our natures works toward a mutual harmony. Furthermore, Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 18. The statement of Belisarius, given by Procopius, History, Bk. II [xv. 22], must be taken as applying only to a particular instance of love or hate: 'Men are, by nature, neither drawn to their fellows nor made hostile to them. Their individual deeds, according as they draw us to them by their agreeableness or repel us by their differences, make some men objects of our love, others of our hatred.'

8. But neither are we at a loss for answer to Hobbes' arguments. Any men who are separated by some space cannot directly harm one another, for if a person at some distance harms me, he does it through some one near at hand, nor can my possessions be damaged except by some one near by. Therefore, since those who are widely separated cannot do mutual harm, so long as they do not come in contact with one another, there seems to be no good reason why such persons should not be reckoned as friends rather than enemies. If any one feels that they would be better called neutrals, he should recognize that absence of the will and power to do harm may be regarded as friendship. Furthermore, that equality of strength, which Hobbes proposes, is more likely to restrain the will to do harm than to urge it on. Surely no man in his senses wants to fight with a person as strong as he is, unless he is under some necessity, or in circumstances which look favourable for his success, since only fools or rash persons will unnecessarily enter a conflict where their blows are certain to be returned with equal force, and where the equal strength of both parties¹ makes the outcome uncertain. For certainly, when a person enters a conflict with a man who is a match for him, where the lives of both are put in hazard, neither gains as much from victory as the one loses who is killed, and the advantage resulting from killing one's opponent is not as great as the risk run of losing one's own life; besides, the peril which my life runs is a greater disadvantage than any advantage I may gain from the fact that the life of my foe was in equal peril, while his security is not increased by reason of mine

having been endangered, but each side is the loser, and yet the loss of one is not to the advantage of the other. Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 29. So the Scythians in Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. viii [27], say: 'The firmest friendship is that between equals; and these appear to be equals who have not to their peril tested each other's strength.' Also Caesar, Civil War, Bk. III [x.7], advises Pompey, 'This was the one time for treating of peace, when each had confidence in himself and both seemed on an equality.' (P.) Florus, Bk. IV, chap. x: 'After the Parthians and Romans had made trial of one another, and Crassus and Pacorus had given proof of their mutual strength, their former friendship was renewed with expressions of equal regard on either side.' (W.) In Thucydides, Bk. III [xi], mutual fear is said to form the most secure basis for an alliance: 'For he that would transgress is deterred by the feeling that he has no superiority wherewith to make an attack.' (S.)

But the reasons adduced by Hobbes for the desire of men to do harm to one another are only particular ones, such as arouse individuals against individuals, and are by no means important enough to make a universal war of all men against all others unavoidable. Nor is it always true that inoffensive men live in the midst of aggressive and wicked ones, or that the latter are always eager to harass the former. A clash of minds, furthermore, is rarely seen among any others than some few superior men; such a failing does not affect the larger part of mankind, or if so but lightly. Nor, in conclusion, has the Creator been so niggardly in his provision for the necessities of mortals that many must always struggle in order to secure the same thing. Indeed the general perversity of men is sufficient to explain why a man should be guarded in his trust of another, and in baring his flank to him, as it were, especially if he is not well acquainted with him, as Plautus says in his Asinaria [495]: 'Man is no man, but a wolf, to a stranger.' (N.) But no reasoning man will admit that this suspicion and mistrust will cause a person to attack and oppress another, unless the latter has shown an intention to harm him. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vii], is quite right in defining injuries as often 'proceeding from fear; as, for instance, when a man who is contriving to injure another is afraid, unless he executes what he is meditating, that he may himself sustain some disadvantage'. (E.)

Furthermore, the position of Hobbes is untenable, since he maintains that this natural state of his is only destroyed by subjection to the power of another, or by coming together into the same commonwealth. But it is contrary to the judgement of all nations to maintain that even those states which are joined by treaties and friendship are in a mutual state of war. Nor should we say that a peace, which is not in every way trustworthy, is not peace at all, any more than that no man can enjoy the favour of another, because the affections and will of men are variable.

9. This further point should be carefully observed, namely, that we are not discussing the state of some animal, which is directed only by the forces and tendencies of the senses, but of one whose chief adorn- 118 ment and master of the other faculties is reason. Now this reason in a state of nature has a common, and, furthermore, an abiding, and uniform standard of judgement, namely, the nature of things, which offers a free and distinct service in pointing out general rules for living, and the law of nature; and if any man would adequately define a state of nature, he should by no means exclude the proper use of that reason, but should have it accompany the operation of his other faculties.

Now since man can heed not merely the craving of his passions, but also the call of a reason which does not measure itself simply by its own advantage, he is dissuaded from such a war as is described by the phrase 'of all men against all others', into which his base passions drive him, by his reason adducing an excellent twofold argument: It shows him, namely, that to undertake a war without provocation, is both improper and unprofitable. For a man can surely appreciate the fact that he did not come into being by his own powers, but he was made by another, who is his superior, and so has power over him. Now when he feels himself moved by a twofold principle, of which one side is wholly concerned with present considerations, while the other centers upon future and not present concerns, when by the craving of the former he sees himself driven into dangers, perplexities, and disgrace, but led by the latter to safety and respect, surely it is not difficult for him to conclude that his Creator's wish is for him to accept the guidance of the latter and not the former. And when there is added to this consideration the obvious advantages of that peace to which his reason urges him, man cannot avoid inclining naturally to peace; especially so, since, if he neglected reason and followed his passions, he will realize afterwards from the progress of events, that he followed the worse course, and will wish that what he has done contrary to reason could be undone.

We conclude from all this that the natural state of men, even when considered apart from commonwealths, is not one of war, but of peace; a peace founded on the following laws: A man shall not harm one who is not injuring him; he shall allow every one to enjoy his own possessions; he shall faithfully perform whatever has been agreed upon; and he shall willingly advance the interests of others, so far as he is not bound by more pressing obligations. For since a natural state presupposes the use of reason, any obligation which reason points out cannot, and must not, be separated from it; and since every man is able of himself to appreciate that it is for his advantage to conduct himself in such a way as to profit from the friendly attitude of men rather than incur their anger, he can easily judge, from the similarity of nature, that other men feel the same way. And so it is quite wrong for a person in his description of this state to suppose that the majority of men, at least, neglect the guidance of reason, which nature has set up as the final director of men's actions; and equally wrong is it to designate as natural a state which is in the main produced by the neglect and misuse of a natural principle. All these points are proved at length by Richard Cumberland in his De Legibus Naturae, to which I would refer those who are not entirely convinced by what I have written.

10. Nor is it to the point for one in reply to us to harp upon the barbarity that prevailed among most of the ancient peoples, 'whose delight it ever is booty to amass and live on plunder,'¹ and among whom an accepted way to secure property and make a living was by brigandage. Thus Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. v [viii], includes among the occupations of herdsman, farmer, fisher, and hunter, also the βλος ληστροικός, that of a brigand. And continues:

And so, in one point of view, the art of war is a natural art of acquisition, for it includes hunting, an art which we ought to practise against wild beasts, and against men who, though intended by nature to be governed, will not submit; for war of such a kind is naturally just. (J.)

119 Many ancient writers bear testimony to the same effect. See Homer, Odyssey, Bk. III, line 73, and Bk. IX, line 252, where Didymus says: 'It was not dishonourable among the ancients to play the pirate, but honourable.' Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. xlix: 'The Libyans observe no law of any kind or the terms of any pact in their relations with strangers.' Caesar says of the Germans, Gallie War, Bk. VI, chap. xxiii [6 and 1]: 'They attach no disgrace to robberies which take place beyond the bounds of their own states, and claim that they serve to exercise their young men and to reduce their sluggishness.' And again: 'They hold it most worthy of their states to have the largest regions about them which have been laid waste by their devastations. They regard it a sign of their valour for their neighbours to withdraw defeated from their fields, and for no one to dare to dwell near them.' Mela, Bk. III, chap. iii, has much the same to say about the Germans: 'Right they place in might, to such a degree that they are not ashamed even of brigandage, only they are good to guests.' But Tacitus, Germany [xlvi], only mentions the Venedi as 'overrunning in their predatory excursions all the woody and mountainous tracts between the Peucini and Fenni'. (O.) Plutarch, Marius [vi. 1], says of the Spaniards that at the time of Marius brigandage was one of their most highly regarded occupations. Thucydides, Bk. I [v], has the same to say of the ancient Greeks. Some writers adduce Digest, XLVII. xxii. 4, where agreements of those 'who form an association for robbery' are held valid, although Salmasius, De Usuris, Bk. I, chap. xii, feels that the reading should be ἢ εἰς καπηλείαν, 'or for petty trade.' So also Polybius, Bk. III, chap. xxiv, records that a clause in the treaty between the Romans and Carthaginians provided that 'The Romans shall not maraud, nor traffic east of the Fair Promontory, Mastia, and Tarscium' (S.), as if both these occupations were at that time equally lawful. Justin, Bk. XLIII, chap. v, says that the Phocians supported themselves by robbery at sea, 'which was considered a glorious thing in those times.' Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhoneiae Hypotyposes, Bk. III, chap. xxiv [214]: 'Freebooting among many barbarians is not regarded as anything unusual; and they say that the Cilicians thought it so highly reputable, as to judge worthy of special honour those who met their death thereby.' And Nestor, as the poet tells us, after entertaining Telemachus and his friends, says: 'Or at adventure do ye rove, even as sea-robbers?' [Homer, Odyssey, III. 74] 'Yet had piracy been something out of the way, he would not have entertained them in such a fashion, because of his suspicion that they might be men of that sort.' Evidence to the same effect comes from Digest, XLIX. xv. 2: 'If there be a nation with whom we have neither friendship, nor hospitality, nor treaty entered into for the sake of friendship, its members are not our enemies without more ado.' (Cf. Digest, L. xvi. 118.) 'But any possession of ours that falls into their hands belongs to them, as does a freeman of our nation, who has been captured by them, belong to them.' Dio Cassius, Bk. LIV [xxii], has the following to say of the Rhaetians:

They often overran a good part of the adjacent territory of Gaul, and carried plunder even out of Italy. Such of the Romans or their allies as used roads going through their country met with depredations. These actions of theirs were of course more or less like those of any nation which has not accepted terms of peace. (F.)

Isocrates, in his Panathenaicus [§ 227], says of the Triballians:

They are more of one mind among themselves than are any other men, yet destroy not merely their neighbours and those who live in bordering lands, but even every one else upon whom they can lay their hands.

Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xv, § 5, where the further observation should be made, that such a mutual hostility between ancient nations seems to have been due, in no little degree, to the belief commonly held in antiquity that each people had its own special gods. Add Juvenal, Satires, xv.

A sufficient reply to these statements may be found in the fact that, amongst most of the nations of antiquity, the dictates of sound reason had been lost through depraved habits and customs. Yet it does not follow that there was no man among those peoples humane enough to realize that by such robberies he was violating the laws of nature, or that a state of this kind, into which fierce men had thrown themselves while neglecting the noblest part of their being, should be considered 120 natural. For promiscuous thievery and robbery does not follow from a natural state, just as it is obviously not true of the relations of commonwealths, although they are natural. Nor must we allow Hobbes' assertion, De Cive, chap. v, § 2: 'Under such conditions ληστική [robbery] is not contrary to the law of nature.' For if some men without provocation, but led by their evil natures, had tried to take some of our property, we would have had the right, by the law of war, to prey upon them, indeed, but not upon a third party who had done us no previous harm. Surely, if others impudently violate a law of nature, we may not without further ado imitate their wickedness. Nor can we allow the further point which he makes, namely, that 'such a kind of existence was not without some sort of glory for those who conducted themselves with bravery but not cruelty'. Since in some instances 'it was customary for those who were stealing everything else to take no lives, and to abstain from oxen fit for the plough and all implements used in agriculture'. Yet he would say they were not led to do this by the law of nature, but because in this way they had an eye to their own glory, and to the avoidance of the charge of cowardice because of unnecessary cruelty. As if there were any glory in committing but half a crime upon recognizing the disadvantage of carrying it through to the end!

11. Now by our assertion that the maintenance of peace toward all men as such is a natural state of man, we mean that it has been instituted and sanctioned by nature herself without any human intervention, and that it rests, therefore, upon that obligation of natural law, by which all men are bound, in so far as they are endowed with reason, and which does not owe its original introduction to any convention of men. It follows from this, furthermore, that it is of no advantage to fortify this universal peace by agreements or treaties; for by a treaty of this nature no addition is made to the obligation of the natural law, that is, the convention does not add anything to which men were not already bound by the very law of nature, nor does it make the obligation more binding. For we suppose that both parties remain so fully in their natural equality that they are obligated to keep their agreement by no further bond than their reverence for God, and their fear of the evil which might come to each man from a violation of his agreement; although for one not to observe what he has expressly promised seems to add something to his improbity and baseness. The same freedom of action is allowed the injured party against a violator of a law of nature, whether an agreement had been entered into or not. And so civilized men have avoided entering into an agreement, the articles and conditions of which have no content other than the promise not directly to violate something which had already been expressly stipulated by nature. Such an action implies little reverence for God, as if His command did not lay upon us a strict enough necessity, and so we must needs agree to it of ourselves, or as if His obligation depended upon our choice.

Every pact, therefore, must concern something which a man was otherwise unable to require of me by the mere law of nature, or which I was under no perfect obligation beforehand to render to him by the same law, but which I was now fully obligated to perform after my declaration and consent had been secured by him. Thus, when a man has offered his services to another in some form or other, he does not expressly and directly state, as articles of his agreement, that he will not act in bad faith toward him, or that he will not despoil him by thievery. And it would, on the same ground, be a shameful agreement where a man would bind himself for another's sake only to the promise that he would not violate the universal peace against him, that is, that he would not observe in his dealings with him the rights which are habitually exercised toward mere beasts. But if such barbarous depredations were the custom among some nations, a universal agreement, whereby all would agree to maintain the law of nature, would be necessary to restore peace. This is the case when two peoples, who have hitherto been at war, 121 lay down their arms: if they have not agreed on certain special guaranties, nothing is restored but this common peace. But there are even examples of states having been brought to such a pass that they were forced to purchase, not merely by covenants, but even with tribute, this universal peace and freedom from injuries from those who openly lived by plunder. Claudian, *On the Consulship of Manlius*¹ [Stilicho, I. 210-11]: 'Those dread tribes whose wont it was ever to set their price on peace and let us purchase repose by shameful tribute.' (P.)

But if nations which heretofore have had no relations with each other by way of assistance or injury, whether in peace or war, enter into treaties wherein there is no agreement upon particular objects, such treaties are said to be entered into for the sake of sanctioning friendship, which, indeed, is supposed to knit a firmer bond than does the above-mentioned natural peace; although they may be only a kind of solemn promise to observe in the future their mutual duty. They are, therefore, like relatives, who at their first recognition of kinship or first meeting, customarily go to great lengths in expressing their mutual affection.

12. But it must be confessed that this natural peace is but a weak and untrustworthy thing, and therefore that it is, without other safeguards, but a poor custodian of man's safety. So true is this that Ovid's verse well applies here, Tristia, Bk. V, el. ii [71]: 'Yet peace there is at times, confidence in peace never.' (W.) The reason for that is the evil genius of men, their unbridled lust to increase their power, and their cupidity which menaces what belongs to others. Thus Sallust tells us, in his Jugurtha [vi]: Micipsa 'dreaded the natural disposition of mankind, which is greedy for power and eager to gratify its heart's desire, as well as that opportunity, which through the hope of gain leads astray even men of moderate ambition'. (R.)

The powerful forces of these passions have so enslaved the minds of men that not even the most gentle teaching of Christ, ever inculcating peace, humanity, gentleness, kindness, willingness to forgive injuries, humility, and scorn of wealth and earthly power, is able among Christians to do away with the most wicked treacheries, wars, and oppression of others. And so the words of Plutarch, Pyrrhus [xii], apply also to some Christian rulers:

[. . .] To whose rapacities neither sea nor mountain nor endless desert set a limit, nor do the boundaries which separate Europe and Asia put a stop to them. It is impossible to say how they can remain content with what they have and do one another no wrong when they are in close touch. Nay, they are perpetually at war because plots and jealousies are parts of their nature, and they treat the two words, war and peace, like current coins, using whichever happens to be for their advantage, and not as reason dictates. (P.)

And the description of Velleius Paterculus, Bk. I, chap. xii, is true not merely of Romans and Carthaginians: 'There subsisted between these two nations, either war, or preparations for war, or unsettled peace.' (W.) And so, as it is the duty of an honest man to be content with his own, and not to injure others or seek to secure their possessions, so it is the part of a cautious man, and one who cherishes his safety, to such a degree only to believe all men are his friends as to realize that they may nevertheless at any moment become his enemies, and to maintain peace with them on the understanding that it may soon break out into war. Cf. Sophocles, Ajax, 688 ff. And so one should think long on the words of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VI [lxxxvii]: 'For as long as ill men had the power they would never want the will.' (S.) Therefore Euripides says, Helena [1617-18]:

Nought is of more avail
For mortals' need than wise mistrustfulness. (W.)

And a wise man should be 'neither like a lamb in gentleness, nor in violence like a wild beast'.¹ Add Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiii, §§ 7-8. The praise granted by Tacitus, Germany [xxxv], to the Chaucians merits emulation:

122 A people the noblest of the Germans, who choose to maintain their greatness by justice rather than violence. Without ambition, without ungoverned desires, quiet and retired, they provoke no wars, they are guilty of no rapine or plunder; and it is a principal proof of their power and bravery that the superiority they possess has not been acquired by unjust means. Yet all have arms in readiness; and, if necessary, an army is soon raised: for they abound in men and horses, and maintain their military reputation even in inaction. (O.)

On the other hand, the same author says of the Cheruskans [xxxvi]:

They, for want of an enemy, long cherished a too lasting and enfeebling peace: a state more flattering than secure, since the repose enjoyed amidst ambitious and powerful neighbours is treacherous; and when an appeal is made to the sword, moderation and probity are terms appropriated by the victors. Thus the Cherusci, who formerly bore the titles of just and upright, are now charged with cowardice and folly. (O.)

That is to say, as in Dio Chrysostom, Orations, i [27]: 'Those who are best prepared for war are most likely to have peace.' (M.)

Now that we have seen that the condition of man does not permit him to live without law, and to direct his actions by uncertain impulse and without respect to any rule, our next task is to inquire into the common standard of human action, according to which every man, as a rational animal, should order his conduct. It has become the custom to designate this standard as the rule [ius] or law of nature, which may also be called universal, inasmuch as all mankind is bound to observe it, and perpetual, inasmuch as it is not, like positive laws, subject to change. We must observe with care what this law is, how it may be known, what is its chief characteristic, what should be referred to it, and what to positive law; for unless this substructure is firmly laid, everything that is based upon it must certainly fall of its own weight. See the excellent remarks of Plato, Cratylus [p. 436 D]: 'This is the reason why every man should expend his chief thought and attention on the consideration of his first principles: Are they or are they not rightly laid down? and when he has sifted them all the rest will follow.' (J.) This we must observe most carefully in the present discussion, the more truth there is in the words of Lactantius [Divine Institutes], Bk. III, chap. vii:

123 Since it is more dangerous to commit a fault in arranging the condition of life, and in forming the character, greater diligence must be used, that we may know how we ought to live. [. . .] But in this subject there is no room for difference of opinion, none for error. All must entertain the same sentiments, and philosophy itself must give instructions, as it were with one mouth; because if any error shall be committed, life is altogether overthrown.

No less admirable are the words of Diogenes of Apollonia, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. IX [sect. 57]: 'It appears to me that he who begins any treatise ought to lay down principles about which there can be no dispute, and that his exposition of them ought to be simple and dignified.' (Y.)

2. The Roman Jurisconsults used to define the law of nature as 'what nature taught all animals', not, therefore, what is peculiar to man alone, but 'what other animals as well are supposed to know'. And so, on this hypothesis, whatever brutes and men are understood to be attracted to in common, or in common to avoid, belongs to the law of nature, and consequently a law is postulated which is common both to men and brutes. This opinion probably arose from that theory, proclaimed by certain ancients, regarding the soul of the universe, of which soul all others are but ἀποσπασμάτια, or particles, which are in themselves of the same nature, but operate differently, according as they take their lodging in different bodies, and are assigned different organs through which to function. A theory related to this was that of μετεμψύχωσις [metempsychosis], according to which men and brutes differ only in bodily forms, but have similar souls, which pass from one animal to another. See Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. VI, lines 724 ff.; Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. XV, lines 75 ff. But learned men in general reject the idea that such a law is common to man and beasts, since, indeed, it cannot be thought that a being which has no power of reason, should have any right. Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. I [276 ff.]: 'For the son of Cronos has ordained this law for men, that fishes and beasts and winged fowls should devour one another, for right is not in them; but to mankind he gave right.' (E.-W.)

Now although many actions of men and beasts are very much alike, by the performance of which a man is said to have satisfied the law, as a matter of fact there is a great difference between them, since among beasts they come from the simple inclination of their nature, while man performs them from a sense, as it were, of obligation, a sense which brutes do not have. So writers must be supposed to be using figures of speech, when they attribute to some brutes, mere animate creatures, justice, bravery, pity, gratitude, or chastity, because something resembling these virtues can be seen in certain actions of brutes. See Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. v. For things which appear on their face similar are by no means the same, if they proceed from a different internal principle. Now Grotius, Prolegomena, On the Law of War and Peace, Bk. I [On the Truth of the Christian Religion, § 7], maintains that some acts of lower animals, such as ants and bees, are in a special way ordered by measure of reason, or some internal intelligent principle, and that some of them show a real regard for their proper interests in the case of their offspring and kind.

But this can be allowed only in the sense that their nature has been adapted to certain actions by God their Creator, not that any external principle guides them, as a pilot directs a ship. Nor is it difficult to understand why an equal intelligence is by no means found in other things, if one accepts the view of recent writers, that any design to be found among lower animals is due to the form and arrangement of their material substance and its movement. Especially since you may discover even among men some who display a most quick wit in certain acts, but a most sluggish one in others, no more complicated or difficult, the reason for which can come only from the special disposal of their 124 parts, especially of the brain and emotions. Cf. Plutarch, Septem Sapientum Convivium [xxi], p. 163 E, ed. Wechel. Those, however, who like to give the designation of 'a law of nature in lower animals' to the endowment of brutes whereby they perform specific actions, needlessly misuse the term 'law'. But there is no lower animal which performs all the duties expected of man, and there is no duty of man the opposite of which many animals do not perform; although in general the popular feeling is greatly aroused against some crime, if it be shown that even the lower animals avoid such deeds. Thus Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 840 D E], says that, in legislating against unnatural vice among men, one may quite properly cite the nature of the lower animals, among which is found no trace of such a foul practice. Theseus in Seneca, Hippolytus, lines 913[-14]:

The very beasts
 Shun love incestuous, and keep the laws
 Of nature with instinctive chastity. (M.)

Add Oppian, On the Chase, Bk. I, lines 239 ff.; while what the same writer gives in his On Fishing, Bk. I, lines 702 ff., may be applied to parents that are ἀστοργοί [unaffectionate].

3. Some persons, indeed, more, I presume, to display their ingenuity than in all seriousness, have endeavoured to show the existence of a community of law between men and the lower animals, gathering reasons from every possible source, which, however, scholars have long since answered. Those which they draw from the Sacred Scriptures need be touched on but lightly. The words in Genesis, ix. 5¹: 'Your blood will I require at the hand of every living thing', some take to mean that it is the will of God to avenge the death of a man whether it be caused not merely by another's hand or weapon, but also by the attack of some wild beast. They would assert that, in the days before the deluge, impious men kept wild beasts, whom they used to punish those who would not obey their orders. Others infer from this passage that God would also, with the aid of wild beasts, exact a penalty

In Leviticus, xviii. 23, and xx. 15-16, it is commanded that even the beasts, which men or women had used for their lust, shall be stoned to death, no distinction of age being observed between an old and a young animal. But the Jews felt that such a distinction should be observed among persons of either sex, so that if a boy was not over nine years of age and a girl not over three, they did not inflict death upon them by virtue of this law, nor upon the animal either, whatever its age, since they do not admit that intercourse before this age was forbidden in the law. For when the animal is stoned, this was not because it had committed any wrong, but partly in order that it might not by its presence incite any other person to a similar breach, and partly that its survival might not keep fresh the shameful remembrance of the person who had been punished. Gratian, Decretum, II. xv. 1. 4: 'We must believe that the beasts were ordered slain, because, contaminated with such a sin, they keep fresh the shameful memory of the deed.' But Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. viii], gives the further reason: 'To prevent their bringing forth or begetting anything intolerable, as would naturally be the result of such pollutions. Moreover, those who have even a slight care for what is becoming, would never use such animals as these for any purpose of life.' (Y.) Thus God, in Deuteronomy, xiii. 15-16, commands that the animals of idolatrous peoples should be killed, not because the animals were capable of idolatry, but to show the awfulness of that sin. It is, furthermore, to be observed that when a Gentile living among the Jews had intercourse with a beast only the man suffered death, while nothing was done to the beast. Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. iv; Mornacius on Digest, IX. iii. 7.

In Exodus, xxi. 28, a goring ox was to be stoned, not because he had committed sin, but partly that he might not do a similar hurt to others in the future, and partly that the owner might be punished by his loss, since he had taken but poor care of him. For this latter reason, also, they were not to eat the flesh of the ox. The owner was punished in this way by the loss of his animal, when his fault was only slight, or when he was not aware of the viciousness of the ox; but if the owner knew the animal's failing, he forfeited his own life. In this connexion, 12 however, the Jews note that the ox was slaughtered only when he had killed a Jew, and not a Gentile, and, indeed, it was not unusual among certain other peoples as well to destroy the instrument of some evil deed or misfortune. Thus it is clear from the orations of Demosthenes against Aristocrates, and of Aeschines against Ctesiphon, that by the laws of the Athenians, if a rock, a piece of wood, a knife, or the like, had been the instrument of some one's death, it was brought before a court in the Prytaneum, as if it were going to suffer punishment. The people of Thasos once decreed that the statue of Theagenes, which had fallen down and killed some one, should be dragged out and cast into the sea. See Dio Chrysostom, Rhodiaca, p. 340, ed. Morelli. St. Ambrose in his Hexameron, Bk. V, chap. iii, says that the mating of asses and mares, the offspring of which is mules, is forbidden, not that the animals commit any sin thereby, but because in Leviticus, xix. 19, man was forbidden to secure any such hybrid. See Selden, loc. cit.; Ant. Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. ii, § 1; and other authors. The account given by Thuanus, Bk. VI, of the Burgundians instituting a process against mice, is only a kind of jest.

We might say in defence of the Roman Jurisconsults that they used the term 'natural law', Digest, I. i. 1, § 3, improperly of course, of the ordering by God of such things as serve to preserve nature herself, that is, to preserve species and individual animals. A reason for this is that in the particular section of their law they discuss only the conjunction of sexes, the procreation and education of offspring, and self-defence. Many others have in almost the same way used the term improperly, like Ivo Parisinus in his treatise De Jure Naturali a Deo Rebus Creatis Constituto, and Descartes in his Principia Philosophiae. Plutarch has written to the point on this matter, On the Love of Offspring [iii, 495 BC]:

For, as in wild plants, such as wild vines, figs, and olives, Nature has implanted the principles of cultivated fruit, though crude and imperfect; so she has endowed beasts with a love of their young, though imperfect and not attaining to justice, nor proceeding further than utility. But in man, whom she produced a rational and political being, inclining him to justice, law, religion, building of cities, and friendship, she hath placed the seed of those things that are generous, fair, and fruitful—that is, the love of their children, following the first principles which entered into the very constitution of their bodies. (G.)

4. Some writers constitute as the object of natural law such acts as contain in themselves a moral necessity or baseness, which are, therefore, in their own nature either required or unlawful, and hence necessarily understood to be commanded or forbidden by God. And in this respect, they say, natural law is distinguished not only from human law, but from the divine voluntary or positive law, which does not command or forbid things which are of their own proper nature obligatory or unlawful, but makes them by its forbidding unlawful, or by its command obligatory. But things forbidden by natural law are not improper because God forbade them, but God forbade them because they were of themselves improper; while in the same way things commanded by the same law are not proper or necessary because they are commanded by God, but they were commanded because they are of themselves proper. See Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 10.

Now in addition to the fact that even if this definition be accepted it will still be very uncertain just what acts are of themselves unlawful, how they shall be clearly distinguished from other acts, and what is the principal reason, why they are so; it has already been shown, in Book I, chapter ii, § 6, that no acts are of themselves obligatory or unlawful, until they have been made so by law. Nor is it necessary that any one be perplexed by such a question as the following: 'If the entire morality of human actions depends upon law, might not God have been able to decree a law of nature so that He should have commanded just the 126 opposite of what now prevails; so that, for example, among the duties which men owe one another would be murder, theft, fornication, bearing false-witness, and among the things forbidden them would be gratitude, keeping one's agreements, repayment of loans, and the like?'

Although it seems idle and childish to inquire what God might have done when what He actually did is quite clear, nevertheless, if it suits one's fancy to dispel such vagaries, one can easily make the reply that the question raised above implies a manifest contradiction. For although God was under no constraint whatsoever to create man (and certainly they have a feeble conception of God's power who think that His glory would have been in any way diminished, if He had never created the inhabitants of this earth; see Job, xxxviii. 7), yet, when once He had decreed to create him a rational and social animal, it was impossible for the natural law not to agree with his constitution, and that not by an absolute, but by a hypothetical necessity. For if man had been bound to the opposite duties, no social animal but some kind of wild and fearful creature would have been produced. Yet, despite all this, it is still true, that before there was any law, every kind of action was indifferent; for by His decision to create man, that is, an animal whose every act should not be indifferent, God also by the same act constituted for him a law. But it does not follow from our assertion that all acts of themselves were indifferent before the announcement of a law, that, had God so wished, He could have commanded that He be worshipped by blasphemy or contempt, as Vazquez asserts, Controuersiarum Illustrum, Bk. I, chap. xxviii, n. 9 ff., since the rites of Hercules of Lindus, as described, among other writers, by Lactantius, Bk. I, chap. xxi, are the lies of senseless men. For a rational creature, that is, one whom God has endowed with the faculty of recognizing the real nature of things, can conceive God in no other way than as one possessed not only of a certain infinite superiority, but also of the highest authority over him; otherwise he would conceive only an idol, or anything rather than God. But this would plainly imply that one conceives the same being as both most eminent and also abject; that one commands, and yet I can rightfully flaunt him; that I do, as a witness of my appreciation of the eminence of His divine nature and power, something which directly and of itself denotes the very opposite. When, indeed, it is said that God cannot sanction such things by law, this no more implies a detraction from His omnipotence than to say that He cannot die, or lie, or make undone what has already been done.

A further warning is here due. If the definition of natural law is built upon that foundation of the necessary good repute or baseness of some actions, it cannot avoid being obscure, and revolving, as it were, in a circle, as is perfectly clear to any one who weighs the definition of Grotius. And Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 9, properly maintains that, in the definition of natural law, 'good' must be understood as natural good and not moral good, since, indeed, it would be absurd to define a thing in terms which presuppose that the thing defined is already known.

5. Those who search for the prototype of natural law in God himself fall into two classes. The one finds its prime origin in the divine will, and since this is in the highest sense free, they conclude that the law of nature can be changed by God, nay, its very opposite can be enjoined, just as is the case with positive laws. The other maintains that it is based on the essential holiness and justice of God, so that the law of nature expresses these attributes like a kind of ἐκτύπωμα [copy]; and from this proceeds also the immutability of natural law, because the justice and holiness of God reject all alterations and change.

127 We must remark on the first of these opinions that it was, indeed, within the power of the divine will to produce, or not to produce, an animal such as the law of nature would agree with. But after man had once been created by God, an animal which could not be preserved alive unless he observed the natural law, it is no longer possible to believe that He will annul or change the law of nature so long as He makes no change in the nature of man, and so long as actions enjoined by the natural law make, by natural consequence, for a social order, in which the race of man finds a temporary happiness, while, by a like necessity, actions contrary to the natural law destroy it; that is, so long as kindness, humanity, fidelity, gratitude, and the like, will have the power to win over the minds of men, while perfidy, injury, and ingratitude will irritate them. And so, on the assumption that the world of nature and man remain constant, the law of nature, even though it was formed in the beginning at the pleasure of God, remains fixed and unmoved; very different from such laws as are so connected with the divine will, that they do not seem to be so necessary a desideratum for the condition of men in general. Furthermore, by this statement God is made the author of natural law, a fact which no sane man can question, although it still remains uncertain how the divine will can be discovered, and on what evidence we can be certain that God wished to include this thing or that under the natural law.

The same inconvenience attends likewise the second statement. Surely no one will be so impious as to dare to assert that the natural law contains anything repugnant in itself to the holiness and justice of God—the sense in which the line of Euripides is to be understood, Hecuba, line 800: ‘For by the Law we know Gods are.’¹ (W.) And yet it will be difficult to show that the natural law so expresses the holiness and justice of God, that the way God acts towards his creatures, and especially towards man, is also the way men should act towards their fellow men, on the command of the natural law. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, Prolegomena, § 6, and chap. v, § 13. For it is not clear how a right which is to have power among persons equal by nature can be drawn from that most supreme right which the Creator exercises towards His creation; that is, how a law, which imposes a mutual obligation upon men, can be a counterpart of the divine power, which can be restrained by no law and no obligation.

The argument brought from Sacred Scripture to the effect that man was made in the image of God has no bearing on this point, for even those who confess that this image has been lost recognize that the appreciation of natural law has remained in man. Among men we usually call that one holy who avoids the more grave offences and is alive to his duty. But who would conceive the holiness of God by such a criterion? Among men he is considered just whose intent is to harm no one, and to give each man his due. But God has the right to destroy what He created, even though it entail suffering. Neither can it be said that God owes something to any man, so that, if it is denied, He can be said to have done him an injury. If God has promised mortals anything, He keeps His pledge, yet not because they have secured any right against Him from His promise, but because it would be unworthy of the divine greatness and goodness for man to trust His pledge in vain. For when a man does not fulfil his engagement, it is because he either lacks the power to do so, or from fickleness or evil design he afterwards renounces an agreement made in good faith, or else, at the time he made the promise he did not know the circumstances which would attend the time of its performance. All these causes imply some imperfection, and so God cannot but keep His promises, man should not but keep his. Furthermore, a promise of man becomes a thing owed; the promises of God are fulfilled simply by His grace. It is beyond our grasp to understand what rules the vindictive justice of God observes. It is at least certain that it does not display complete 128 resemblance to the findings of a court of law. The words of Aristotle on this point are not inappropriate, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. X, chap. viii:

What kinds of actions do we properly attribute to the gods? Are they just actions? But it would make the gods ridiculous to suppose that they form contracts, restore deposits, and so on. Are they then courageous actions? Do the gods endure dangers and alarms for the sake of honour? Or liberal actions? But to whom should they give money? It would be absurd to suppose that they have a currency or anything of the kind. Again, what will be the nature of their temperate actions? Surely to praise the gods for temperance is to degrade them; they are exempt from low desires. We may go through the whole category of virtues, and it will appear that whatever relates to moral action is petty and unworthy of the gods. (W.)

Catullus [Carmina, lxviii, To Mallius, 142]:

Yet it is not fit that men should be compared with gods. (C.)

Now by reason of the fact that a common right, as it appears, should not be admitted for God and men, an easy reply is possible to the illustration from which some wish to conclude that God dispensed with the law of nature, as when He commanded Abraham to offer up his son, and the Israelites to take vessels of gold and silver from the Egyptians. To God, indeed, as the supreme master of all things, there belongs a far superior right over His creatures than to man over man, by nature his equal. And so, properly speaking, the law of nature is not dispensed with when man, acting merely as the instrument of God, by His express command exercises the right of God upon men. Cf. Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 10. No one, I believe, will be so simple as to hold that from some change in the object, or variation in the circumstances, the law too has suffered some change. For when a creditor has cancelled a loan to his debtor, the case is no longer covered by the law that a loan must be repaid, since the loan as such is no more. But in the former example, when the property of a person who has put it in trust has been confiscated, neither the law nor its object is changed. For the wording of the law is: 'One who receives a deposit must return it to him who deposited it, or to whatever person has succeeded to his right over it.' And so this law does not cover a thief, because the thing deposited is not his, nor a banished man, because the public treasury has taken over his property rights.

6. No more do the arguments of the author of De Principiis Justitiae et Decoris [Velthuisen], p. 254, seem to show that we set up a twofold 'natural law, divine and human, which, in the present world order, coincide'. For since every right or law implies an obligation, which presupposes some intrinsic and superior authority, it appears absurd that such an obligation could be laid upon God. In the same way there is no force in the statement that 'God is obligated by Himself or by His own essence'. Nor may you deduce from Romans, i. 32, that there is such a law in God, for since the Gentiles were able by the use of reason to understand the law of nature, the next thing for them to have recognized was that God, as a lawgiver, would not allow any violation of that law. And so, upon the violation of the law of nature, God acquired a right—if such a form of statement be proper—to exact a punishment; or, in other words, upon the commission of a sin, God properly carries His own threat into execution. But who may conclude from this that God is subject to any right, that is, to law?

But the following is also ambiguous: 'The supreme right of God over His creatures is made known to the natural reason by those principles which form among men the foundation of natural law and equity.' If this means that, in many things, God proceeds with men in the same manner as He wishes mortals also to conduct themselves, no one may take offence. See Luke, vi. 35. Thus God through the natural law has commanded men to keep their promises, just as He also will steadfastly keep His promises to them. Romans, iii. 4; Hebrews, vi. 17-18. He forbids that the innocent shall be condemned by human judges, and He himself will do likewise. 2 Chronicles, xix. 7; Romans, ii. 2. But if the writer means that God has no more right over His creatures than He has given men over each other, we need more convincing arguments, if we are to believe that a supreme master has no more right over his own servant than has the latter over a fellow servant, whom nature has made his equal; or, to use the language of Grotius, that 'the right of directors and the right of equals' [ius rectorium et aequatorium] exactly correspond. 129

But another remark, which the same writer makes, on p. 52, deserves criticism: 'God should of necessity consider natural laws to be just, the order in this universe being established and constituted as it now appears to the eyes of every man; and He must recognize as unjust and improper every deviation from them.' These lordly words, 'God should of necessity,' are without doubt inapplicable to the majesty of the omnipotent lawgiver; and with Him there can be discovered no necessity other than that which derives from the divine pleasure. Nor does the reason which he subjoins satisfactorily uphold his thesis: 'Because all things which we can picture in our minds always have a σχέσις or relation, arising from the intrinsic nature of the thing, which cannot by sound judgement be separated from the thing'; since things do not have such a nature and accompanying relation of themselves, but they have them at the will of the Creator, and the decision of His will cannot be properly called a law. Thus the reason why, among men, a favour obligates one to gratitude, and why a violation of agreements, savagery, pride, and contumely can never be lawful, is because God has appointed for man a sociable nature, and so long as this is untainted, what is agreeable to it is reputable, and what does not agree with it is unlawful and base. But this does not imply any right common to God and men, or any endowment or σχέσις [relation] of things which is not based upon the divine will.

7. Those who base the law of nature on the general agreement of all men or nations, or at least of the majority of nations, and of civilized mankind, do so on the authority of Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. x, where he defines 'natural justice' as 'that which has the same authority everywhere, and is independent of opinion'. (W.) He also says, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. xiii: 'For there is a certain natural and universal right and wrong, which all men divine, even if they have no intercourse or covenant with each other.' (J.) Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. I [xiii-xiv]: 'In every case the consent of all nations is to be looked on as a law of nature. And the consent of all is the voice of nature.' (Y.) Now such a way of proving the law of nature is not only an a posteriori argument which does not show at all why the law of nature was so constituted, but also in very truth a slippery statement, involving numberless obscurities. It seems to Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 1, improper to appeal to the consensus of all mankind, because then, if a man really used his reason, it would be impossible for him to sin against the law of nature, since, when that individual, being as he is a part of mankind, strikes his own course, the agreement of mankind is thereby impaired; and because it is improper to deduce the laws of nature from the agreement of those who break them more often than they observe them. For, as Isocrates says, To Philip [35]: 'We are all so constituted by nature as to go wrong more often than right.' (F.)

130 Nor is it any happier to appeal to the agreement of all nations; for who knows the language of all peoples both ancient and modern, not to mention their customs and institutions? Nor will the case be any better, if we say that agreement on the part of the more civilized peoples will suffice, and that no account need be taken of barbarians. For what people, endowed with enough judgement to preserve its existence, will be willing to acknowledge that it is barbarous? or what nation will claim so much for itself as to demand that all other nations be measured by its customs, and to adjudge that one barbarous which departs from them? In former days the Greeks, in their pride, looked down upon all other peoples as barbarians, and the Romans succeeded to their arrogance; and to-day in Europe some of us claim for ourselves to be superior to others in the development of our culture, while, on the other hand, there are peoples who rank themselves far above us. The Chinese have long held that the Europeans have only one eye, and that all other peoples are condemned to blindness. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. viii, and Bk. I, chap. xxxix, where he includes among foolish notions the habit of condemning some custom, and rejecting it as barbarous and base, for the simple reason that it does not agree with our own general customs and ideas. Idem, Bk. II, chap. ii, n. 7.

There are some, also, who rail at the learning on the acquisition of which we expend so much labour as if it were a support for our dullness; since the talents of certain other peoples, without the acquisition of learning, are conspicuous for a natural excellence, and a good mind needs but little education. Nor is learning always accompanied with good habits. Plato, Epistles, X [p. 358 c]: 'Steadfastness and loyalty and sincerity, that, say I, is the genuine philosophy.' (P.) Some nations, furthermore, find their greatest delight in a laborious display of idle or superfluous things, and despise those who lead a more simple life; and yet frequently the latter surpass the former in the innocence of their behaviour. Cf. the remarks of Justin, Bk. II, chap. ii, on the Scythians:

And it appears extremely wonderful that nature should grant that to them, which the Greeks cannot obtain by long instruction from their wise men, and the precepts of their philosophers; and that cultivated morals should have the disadvantage in a comparison with those of unpolished barbarians.¹ So much better effect has the ignorance of vice in the one people than the knowledge of virtue in the other. (W.)

Valerius Maximus, Bk. I, chap. i, § 2 ext. There are also several passages in Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhoneiae, Bk. II, chap. v, which can be adduced on this topic.

A further argument for the contention that there is little value of itself in this agreement of all peoples lies in the evidence that the majority of men are foolish rather than wise, and few have based their opinions on an investigation of the real nature of things, the majority in blind assent, and without using their own judgement and observation, following others who have preceded them.

Finally, it also happens that, although a fairly clear idea can be obtained as to what most peoples agree upon, at least touching the general principles of the law of nature, and although we can judge the general opinion of nations with which we are unacquainted by the disposals of those which we know, because of their general similarity, yet from all this it is safer to gather what they have felt was to be observed among their own citizens rather than in relation² to other peoples, towards whom many men have a general hatred and whom they have always held it proper to treat as enemies. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxx.

8. Now, although the customs of many peoples can be used more effectively to show what is permissible by the law of nature rather than what is prescribed, yet the inconsistencies and differences in the institutions of celebrated peoples show that it is not always safe to draw conclusions even about the former. So true is this that the remark of Socrates in Plato, Alcibiades, No. I [p. 110 E], may be well applied in this connexion: 'I cannot say that I have a high opinion of your teachers, when you betake yourself to the many.' (J.*) The same thought is in Plutarch, Themistocles [xxvii]: 'Men's³ customs differ; different people honour 131 different practices.' (P.); and Tacitus, Histories, Bk. III [xxxiii]:

'In an army differing in language and manners, composed of Roman citizens, allies, and foreign auxiliaries, all the diversities of passions were exhibited. Each had his separate notions of right and wrong; nor was anything unlawful.' (O.) The following may serve as examples¹ of this difference. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VII, chap. vi, tells how: 'Some savage tribes near the Black Sea lend their children to one another to feast upon.' (W.); a little farther on he calls these peoples 'irrational, brutal, living a life of mere sensation'. Eusebius, De Praeparatione Evangelica, Bk. I, chap. iii, in recounting the disgraceful customs which were corrected by the Gospel, mentions among other things the illicit intercourse with mothers and daughters among the Persians, which is noted also by Diogenes Laertius in his Prologue [I. 6], on the authority of Sotion, and the eating of human flesh and the slaughter of children, as religious rites, among the Scythians; how the Massagetae and Derbices killed their aged and banqueted off them; how the Tibareni threw their old people down from the cliffs; how the Hyrcani cast out their dead to be devoured by birds, and the Caspii theirs to be devoured by dogs. With these customs belong foul vigils beset with adulteries and debauchery in honour of the gods, and the use of human victims. The same writer gives the following facts on the authority of Bardesanus the Syrian, Bk. VI, chap. viii [X, 275 D ff.]:

Among the Geli,² it is legal for women to lie with any one they choose, and especially strangers, and they are not accused for so doing by their husbands, nor called adulteresses. The same custom used to prevail among the Bactrians. On the other hand the Arabs kill not only all adulteresses, but punish even those who are merely suspected of the sin. In Parthia and Armenia the murderer of a wife, son, daughter, or unmarried brother or sister is not even brought to trial, for the law so provides among them. Among the Atrii a thief who has stolen even a penny's worth is stoned to death. In Bactria a petty thief is spat upon. With the Greeks even wise men who have boy loves are not reproved. Many of the Britons have but one wife for the whole group; in Parthia, on the other hand, a number of women have a common husband.³

Sextus Empiricus, Pyrhoneiae, Bk. III, chap. xxiv [199 ff.], collects a great medley of conflicting institutions to show how there is no definite line between what is base and good. But he falls into serious error at the very beginning of his discussion, when he says: 'Now among us it is disgraceful, nay, rather, criminal, for men to indulge in homosexual relations, but among the Germans, as they say, it is not disgraceful, but a common habit.' For the Greeks were so addicted to that vice that Plato, in his Laws, VIII, feels the necessity of giving reasons to show how it can be prevented by legislation. Nepos, Epaminondas, chap. iv, apparently shows that the Boeotians were not free from that failing, unless it be that it died out among the later

Thebans, as the following observation seems to imply: 'Nay, among the Thebans at one time this is said not to have been regarded as disreputable.'¹

But the remarks which he subjoins upon the Germans are so crude a falsehood that it is strange how any one, who had even the slightest knowledge of those peoples, could harbour such ideas. He adds: The Cynic philosophers, and Zeno of Citium, Cleanthes, and Chrysippus regarded ἀρρενομιξία [sodomy] as a matter of indifference. Certain tribes of India thought it nothing wrong to disport with their wives in public. It was held quite proper by many peoples of Egypt for their women to play the prostitute, and some of their daughters secured a dowry before their marriage by a life of shame, and then married. The Stoics said that it was not unreasonable to consort with a harlot, or to make one's living from the profits of prostitution. The Persians married their mothers, and the Egyptians their sisters, of which practice Zeno of Citium said the first was not unreasonable. 132 (Add Idem, chap. xxv, where the words ascribed to Zeno cannot² be surpassed in effrontery.) Chrysippus allowed a father to secure offspring from his daughter, a mother from her son, and a brother from his sister. Plato allowed a community of wives. It was an established custom among many barbarian peoples to eat human flesh, a custom approved even by the Stoics. Among many races adultery was regarded as an indifferent thing. The Scythians offered up strangers to Diana, and killed their elders when they had passed the age of sixty. A law of Solon's allowed any Athenian to put his son to death. Among the Romans, gladiators who had killed a man were attended with special honours. The Spartans punished thieves, not as such, but because they had been apprehended. If the Amazons bore any male children, they maimed them so that they would not be able to perform any deed worthy of a strong man. He then adds a great deal on the different opinions held concerning the gods, on the diversity of ritual, on customs of burial, and on death. Add Diogenes Laertius, on Pyrrho, Bk. IX [23-4]. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. V [xxvii]: 'The minds of the Egyptians being tainted with pernicious opinion, they are ready to bear any torture, rather than hurt an ibis, a snake, a cat, a dog, or a crocodile; and should any one inadvertently have hurt any of these animals, he will submit to any punishment.' (Y.) Busbecq, Letters, III, recounts that thievery was honoured by the Colchians; and Francisco Alvarez says that the Abyssinians have a custom whereby thieves give part of their loot to the king, and keep without any disgrace the rest for themselves. The following instructive passage from Philo Judaeus, De Temulentia,³ pp. 208-9 [xlvi-xlviii], belongs here:

And then, too, do not those facts which are diffused over nearly the whole world, and which have caused both to Greeks and to barbarians such erroneous judgements, exhort us not to be too ready in giving our credence to what is not seen? And what are these facts? Surely they are the instructions which we have received from our childhood, and our national customs and ancient laws, of which it is admitted that there is not a single one which is of equal force among all peoples; but it is notorious that they vary according to the different countries, and nations, and cities, aye, and even still more, in every village and private house, and even with respect to men and women, and infant children, in almost every point. At all events, what are accounted disgraceful actions amongst us, are by others looked upon as honourable; what we think becoming, others call unseemly [...]. Yet I am not surprised if a confused and mixed multitude, being the inglorious slave of customs and laws, however introduced and established, accustomed from its very cradle to obey them as if they were master and tyrants, having their souls beaten and buffeted, as it were, and utterly unable to conceive any happy or magnanimous thoughts, believes at once every tradition which is presented to it, and leaving its mind without any proper training, assents to and denies propositions without examination and without deliberation. But I am surprised if even the multitude of those who are called philosophers, pretending that they are really seeking for certainty and accuracy in things, being divided into ranks and companies, come to discordant, and often even to diametrically opposite decisions, [...] about almost everything, whether great or small. (Y.*)

Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxii, and Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. viii, §§ 4, 7.

9. But the idea of deducing the law of nature from the customs of peoples is attended with yet another difficulty: There is no nation which is governed entirely by the law of nature; but each has laws, whether codified or not, which have been added to it, and are used when its citizens have any business with one another. Furthermore, the relations between nations are very often defined according to a civil law which is common to both, or by the law of nature, which has been clothed, as it were, with many positive additions. Hence it is not so easy to decide what such nations consider a natural law, and what a positive and civil one. And does not custom when long established assume the specious appearance of natural law? Agathias, Bk. II [x. 23]: 'It is manifest that whatever law has obtained for a long course of time among any people, this they certainly regard as most excellent and equitable, and if anything contrary is done, they feel that it should be rejected, is ridiculous, and incredible.'

The famous passage in Herodotus, Bk. II [38], illustrates this thought of Agathias:

133 Darius called into his presence certain Greeks of his empire and asked them how much they would take to eat their parents when they had died—a custom of certain inhabitants of India. They replied that they could not be induced to do so at any price. He then asked some Indians what they would take to burn their parents upon death, as the Greeks did, but not to eat them afterwards. They exclaimed aloud and bade him forbear such language. (R.*)

Furthermore, to have been brought up from infancy on some one idea is so powerful an influence that, even though the idea be fallacious, the thought of questioning it scarcely ever occurs to a man, certainly if he has no more wit than the common run of humanity. Aristotle, Problems, xviii, quaest. 6; 'In whatever men choose to start with and grow accustomed to, they can no longer judge what is better, for the mind has become corrupted through evil prepossessions.' Cicero, Academics, Bk. IV [II. iii]:

In the first place, some have been bound hand and foot, before they were able to judge what was best; and, secondly, before their age or their understanding had come to maturity, they have either followed the opinion of some friend, or been charmed by the eloquence of some one who was the first arguer whom they had ever heard, and so have been led to form a judgement on what they did not understand, and now they cling to whatever school they were, as it were, dashed against in a tempest, like sailors clinging to a rock. (Y.)

And a little farther on: 'But, I know not how it is, most people prefer being in error, and defending with the utmost pugnacity that opinion which they have taken a fancy to, to inquiring without any obstinacy what is said with the greatest consistency.' (Y.) Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxii; Philo Judaeus, On Abraham [xxxiv]: 'A habit of long standing is for the most part as strong as nature.' And the greater part of mankind is included in the judgement of Sextus Empiricus, Pyrrhoneiae, Bk. III, chap. xxiv [235]: 'He follows the ordinary practices of life without ever a thought'; as well as in the lines of Euripides, The Bacchanals [201 ff.]:

Traditions of our fathers, old as time,
We hold: no reasoning shall cast them down,—
No, though of subtlest wit our wisdom spring. (W.)

The words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians, xi. 14, also apply here, as also in a less degree the statement of Plato, Laws, VII [p. 749 D E], to the effect that our less ready use of the left hand than the right is due to practice, since nature is equally disposed to both. In the same way many peoples attach no little distinction to the possession of a beard, see Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xvi [10-14], while most of the Americans [American Indians] consider it beastlike to raise one. See Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. viii, § 6 and chap. ix. And yet let us by no means attribute such strength to custom that it be held capable of so distorting and weakening the judgement as to make it incapable of apprehending the truth concerning natural laws. Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. vi.

10. Now these differences between the laws and customs of different peoples have undoubtedly given some men excuse for alleging that there is no such thing as natural law, and that all law has arisen from the convenience of individual states, and cannot be measured in any other way. So Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. iii [98 and 111 ff.]:

Utility, the mother, or next to it, of justice and right [. . .]. If you examine the dates of the world's history you will have to confess that the source of justice was the fear of injustice. Nature can draw no line between the unjust and the just, in the way that she does between what is advantageous and the reverse. (W.)*

Ovid, Heroides, Bk. I, ep. iv [131 ff.]: 'Such old-fashioned regard for virtue was rustic even in Saturn's reign, and doomed to die in the age to come. Jove fixed that virtue was to come in whatever brought us pleasure.' (S.) Lucan, Bk. VIII [488 ff.]:

As different as are the stars from the earth, as the flames from the sea, so is the profitable from the right. The entire power of sceptres perishes if it begins to weigh what is just; and regard for what is honourable overthrows citadels. It is the liberty to commit crimes which protects a hated sway. (R.)

Very crude language is also used about the origin of justice and injustice, by Aristippus in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. II [93], and by Pyrrho, Bk. IX, § 61. Carneades had disputed at length on this point, and Lactantius abbreviated his arguments in the following words, Divine Institutes, Bk. V, chap. xvi:

134 That men enacted laws for themselves, with a view to their own advantage, differing indeed according to their characters, and in the case of the same persons often changed according to the times; but that there was no natural law: that all, both men and other animals, were borne by the guidance of nature to their own advantage; therefore that there was no justice, or if any did exist, it was the greatest folly, because it injured itself by promoting the interests of others. [...] That all the nations which flourished with dominion, even the Romans themselves, who were masters of the whole world, if they wish to be just, that is, to restore the possessions of others, must return to cottages. (C.)¹

Add Grotius, On the Law of War and Peace, Prolegomena to Book I.

In meeting such arguments it will be convenient to begin with the following passage of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II [iii]: 'In connexion with this term "expediency" custom has so declined and gradually deviated from the right path that, separating virtue from expediency, it has determined that some things may be virtuous that are not expedient, and some expedient which are not virtuous; than which doctrine nothing more pernicious can be introduced into human life.' (E.) He further remarks, Ibidem, Bk. III [iii]: 'Socrates used to execrate those who had first separated in theory those things cohering in nature.' (E.) Certainly such men have imposed upon the less informed by employing the ambiguous word 'utility', which has a double use, as it is considered from different points of view. One kind is what appears to be useful to the depraved judgement of disordered affections, which centre upon advantages that are for the most part immediate and fleeting, and are little concerned with the future. The other kind is judged to be useful by sound reason which not only examines what lies before its very feet, but also weighs the future consequences. It then regards that as really profitable, which will be so under all circumstances and for all time (Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VII, § 74: 'To act by the law of Nature is its own benefit.' (H.)). On no account is the enjoyment of a temporary advantage which will entail a long series of misfortunes considered desirable; just as it is a highly dangerous pleasure for men burning with fever to drink cold water, only to suffer soon thereafter the sharpest distress for doing so.

Actions in conformity with the law of nature have, indeed, this characteristic, that not only are they reputable, that is, they tend to maintain and increase a man's standing, reputation, and position, but they also are useful, that is, they procure some advantage and reward for a man, and contribute to his happiness. This quality is so far from unbecoming to a high character, that even in Holy Writ 'godliness' is said to be 'profitable unto all things', on the ground that it has the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come [1 Timothy, iv. 8]. But actions repugnant to the law of nature are, indeed, always base, although they may at times apparently return some advantage, and more often some pleasure, which latter, however, never endures for long, and is followed by a throng of much greater ills. See Proverbs, xx. 17; v. 3-4; ix. 17-18; xxi. 6. A remark of Cicero's bears on the same point, On Duties, Bk. I [iv]:

But the greatest distinction between a man and a brute lies in this, that the latter is impelled only by instinct, and applies itself solely to that object which is present and before it, with very little sensibility to what is past or to come; but man, because endowed with reason, by which he discerns consequences, looks into the causes of things and their progress, and being acquainted, as it were, with precedents, he compares their analogies, and adapts and connects the present with what is to come. It is easy for him to foresee the future direction of all his life, and therefore he prepares what is necessary for passing through it.¹ (E.)

Therefore, so far is it from being true that even the laws of states were instituted with an eye to this false and momentary utility, that their special end was to prevent citizens of those states from weighing their actions by that idea of utility. For if one wished to test everything by his individual profit alone, without considering other men, all other men would be allowed to pursue the same course, and there could result nothing but the greatest confusion and a kind of war of all men against all others. Nothing could be of less advantage, nothing more unsuitable for man than such a condition, since, on the other hand, it is clear that he, who, by observing the law of nature, studies to put others under obligation to himself, can hold a far more certain hope that some advantage will come to him from others, than he who trusts in his own strength, and decides to do to others whatever suits his pleasure. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. ii, § 29, n. 2. 135

Nor, indeed, is it possible for mortals to imagine any utility which cannot have a universal value, since nature has given no man the privilege² to use some right against others which they may not in turn exercise against him. Hence it is idle for you to believe that it is profitable for you to take by stealth or force the product of the labour of others, since they are able to resist as well as to enjoy the same privilege against you, or that it is to your advantage to break your given promise, since your own example can be turned against you. Proverbs, i. 13 ff. Isocrates, Aeropagiticus [34]:

The poor sustained more injury than the rich by the act of those who did not faithfully observe their agreements; for the latter, if they were to give up lending money, would only lose a small portion of their income, while the former, if they should be without any to assist them, would be reduced to the greatest distress. (F.)

The same writer, in his On Peace [26], lays down as the basis of his counsel that his fellow-citizens convince themselves that 'Peace is more useful and more profitable than meddlesomeness, justice than injustice, and the care of one's own than hankering after what belongs to others'. (F.) This principle he elaborates admirably in the course of his work.

Nor is it possible for a man to set such store by his own strength as to believe that the like cannot be done by others in retaliation upon him. All strength, indeed, comes from union with other men whom you may by no means hold together by your own strength alone. Therefore, if everything may be measured by that false standard of utility, the safety of every man, however powerful he be, would be uncertain so long as any one thinks it to be to his advantage for him to die; and whoever pursues such a course, by his example shows others the way to undertake the same course of action against him. And so not justice but injustice is supreme folly, which is of no general or lasting advantage even though a man's evil conduct may seem to him to succeed for a time, and which is certain to overthrow the general security of man, which is maintained by fellowship. And this applies not alone to men as individuals, but to entire states as well, no one of which has been hitherto so well equipped with resources, or so secure that it can do without the friendship of others, and cannot be injured, at least by an alliance of its enemies. Quintilian, Declamations, cclv: 'No bad precedent is any good; even though at the very moment it pleases us in a way,¹ still it does us all the greater harm in the end.' Demosthenes, Olynthiacs, II [10]: 'Impossible is it to acquire a solid power by injustice and perjury² and falsehood.' (K.)

The remarks of Epicurus on justice, as given by Gassendi, Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuri, Pt. III, chap. xxiv-xxv, agree with what has just been said:

Justice not only never injures any one, but it gives some benefit, firstly, of its own power and nature, since it calms the mind, and, secondly, by the hope that a nature not depraved will have what it desires. If injustice makes its home in any man's mind, the mind cannot help but be disturbed by its very presence, and even if it undertakes something secretly, it can never be sure that it will always remain concealed. And since justice has been devised for the common good, it follows that that is right or just, whatever its nature be, which has for its object what is good for groups and individuals who are members of society. And since every one, under the guidance of nature, desires what is good for himself, what is right or just is according to nature and is therefore called natural. And this natural law is nothing else than the stamp by which utility is recognized, or that advantage which is proposed on the basis of a common accord, which consists in men neither doing nor suffering injury in their relations with one another, and, in consequence, living in security. Now since this is good and profitable, every man seeks it under the leadership of nature.

But what he afterwards says about the different kinds of advantage among different peoples, and hence of the variation of justice, can be applied only to the civil law and not to the natural. Diodorus Siculus says briefly, Bk. XXV, Eclog. 1: 'Epicurus [. . .] in his book called Golden Maxims, says that the righteous life is void of all trouble and disturbances; but the unrighteous life is full of trouble and sorrow.' (B.*) Lucretius Bk. V [1151 ff.]: 'For violence and injury enclose in their net all that do such things, and generally return upon him who began, nor is it easy to pass a quiet and peaceful life for him whose deeds violate the bonds of the common peace.' (R.) Furthermore, any one can realize how contradictory it is to common sense to weigh all actions by utility as opposed to justice. Compare the apposite words of Protagoras, otherwise a trifling Sophist, in Plato, Protagoras [p. 323 A B]:

In other cases, as you are aware, if a man says that he is a good flute-player, or skilful in any other art in which he has no skill, people either laugh at him or are angry with him, and his relations think that he is mad and go and admonish him; but the opposite is true when dishonesty is in question, for even if they know that he is dishonest, yet, if the man comes publicly forward and tells the truth about his dishonesty, in this case they deem that to be madness. They say that men ought to profess honesty whether they are honest or not, and that a man is mad who does not make such a profession. Their notion is that a man must have some degree of honesty; and that if he has none at all he ought not to be in the world. (J.*)

Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. III, chap. viii [44]: 'Nor is there any one so wicked that he would like to appear wicked.' Nay, there is no man who does not speak better than he either thinks or does.

But by the results of so perverted a doctrine the divine providence effectively unmasks the exponents of the same, as we may show by choosing one or two instances from an infinite number of examples. The famous Lysander, 'being a very crafty fellow, frequently using subtle tricks and notable deceits, placing all justice and honour in profit and advantage, would confess, indeed, that truth was better than a lie, but the worth and dignity of either was to be defined by their usefulness to our affairs'; . . . who said: "'Boys must be cheated with knuckle-bones, and men with oaths,'" (G.*) as Plutarch, Apophthegms [p. 229 A B], and Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. I [xlv], describe him. But did Lysander establish his fortune on a firmer foundation than if he had ordered all his course by truth and honesty? See Cornelius Nepos, Lysander. In the same way Agesilaus, who was constantly maintaining in all his utterances that 'justice is the fountain-head of all virtues, since clearly valour is worthless if justice be not on one's side', defended the occupation of the Cadmea by Phoebidas with the following specious argument: 'One must see whether the deed offers any advantage; for it is proper to venture whatever is of advantage to Lacedaemon, even if no one has ordered it.' [Plutarch, Agesilaus, xxiii. 4.] But was not that very act the cause for the Spartans losing the hegemony of Greece?

11. With the foundations thus laid, the arguments which are offered have an easy solution. It is foolish to conclude that, 'since states have instituted different laws on the ground of profit,' it follows that there is no natural and eternal law. All civil laws, indeed, presuppose or incorporate the general principles at least of natural law, whereby the safety of the human race is maintained; and these latter are by no means done away with by the former, which are merely added to them as the distinct advantage of each state has required. We admit that penal 'laws', or penalsanctions, 'have been devised out of a fear of injustice', doubtless after the mere requirements of natural law were found insufficient to restrain the wickedness of men. We acknowledge, indeed, the denial of Horace that nature can distinguish what is unjust, if restricted to that nature which man shares with animals, whereby animals by their senses know what things are good for their body and what harmful, without any knowledge of right or wrong. But we deny the application of his statement to rational nature. The argument of Carneades that, 'if the Romans wish to be just, that is, if they would restore what belongs to others, they would have to return to their primitive huts,' and that therefore justice is folly, has some force in the eyes of the mob, but 137 carries no real weight with those who examine it carefully. For since others can avail themselves of the same right against us, that we use against them, there is surely no advantage in taking by force what belongs to others, and thereby inviting them to prey¹ upon our possessions.

And in defining profits one's attention should not be confined to what seems to benefit one man or another temporarily, to the detriment of others, but to what is advantageous for everybody and for all time. So let us imagine that some man has accumulated great wealth by robbery. He thinks it folly to restore what he has gained unjustly, and thereby of his own accord to reduce himself to his former straitened circumstances. But when in later years his Prince has detected his thefts, confiscated his wealth, and consigned the feloniously crafty man to the gallows or to prison, do we believe that he ordered his ways more wisely than the man who preferred to be content with a modest fortune, honestly acquired? Thus I question whether it would not have been better for Rome to abide by her modest and justly acquired resources, than, after plundering the world, to have turned the sword upon her own vitals, and to have offered her enfeebled body to the Goths and Vandals for them to rend in pieces.

Nor is there any need of a painstaking response to the other arguments of Carneades which Lactantius, loc. cit., records. For if any one thinks the seller of a house is wise if he hides the fact that it is infected with pestilence, so that he may sell it at a higher price, then certainly the purchaser will be wise if he pays counterfeit in place of honest money for it, or if, after he has discovered the fraud, punishes the seller in the severest manner. Finally, we shall discuss in another connexion whether, in a shipwreck, a stronger may snatch a plank from a weaker, or a sound man in flight drag a wounded soldier from his horse so as to save his own life rather than the other man's. It will be enough to remark at this point that what is more readily excused than approved, under necessity or with a mind confused at the prospect of some impending danger, should by no means be laid down as a general rule of action. Add the author of De Principiis Justi et Decori, p. 114 ff. [Velthuysen].

12. The same author of De Principiis Justi et Decori has adopted the following method in investigating the law of nature. He presupposes at the outset that there is a God and that He has established the world in wisdom, a statement which no sane man will dispute. He adds: 'God has willed that He exercise the virtues of justice and truth in the control of the world.' Psalms, xcvi, the last verse [13]. But while the divine truth and justice can hardly with propriety be conceived in the manner of virtue, it is, furthermore, quite clear that that which is ascribed to the justice of God is very different from that which should be observed in the relations of men, for the former denotes the manner in which the most high and good Creator governs the intelligent creatures of His universe, while the latter belongs among those who are by nature equal and subject to the same master. That such divine justice should be measured by the same standard as human justice is by no means established by the fact that, in the Sacred Scriptures, we are often pointed to the example of God, Luke, vi. 36; Matthew, v. 44-5; xviii. 33, since in these passages the argument proceeds from the lesser to the greater.¹ From these preliminary statements he concludes: 'In creating² the world God set before Himself an end; and His means have in themselves the ability to attain an end; and finally: Man will not go unpunished if he deviates from that plan, which God wills that man should observe in attaining the end which He has set before Himself and man; and whoever orders his life and habits according to the plan prescribed by God, should be rewarded, since the justice of God implies nothing other than a proper distribution of penalties and rewards.'

As to these remarks I question whether it can be said in any useful sense that God set before Himself and man a common end, or that the order constituted for man, that is, the observance of the law of nature, produces the end of creation as set down by God. Nor can one easily accept the remarks which immediately follow: 'The natural necessity, 138 which is in God, lays upon men the necessity of cultivating virtues and avoiding vices.' But even if we should wholly grant all this, and then in working out a law of nature lay some such groundwork as the following: 'Everything so constituted by nature as to obstruct the purpose designed by God at the creation of the world is forbidden by the law of nature; but whatever have such a nature that this same end cannot be obtained without them, are all enjoined by the law of nature'; still it is impossible to understand clearly and distinctly what integral relation each of the precepts of the law of nature bears to that purpose, since the purpose itself has not yet been defined with sufficient clearness. So, for example, a long deductive process would be required for me to know that the purpose of the creation of the world cannot be attained without honouring one's parents, or that robbery is repugnant to the same end. Nay, the man who confines himself to general terms of this kind without appealing to more concrete and distinct principles arrives nowhere. Therefore a man still leaves the basis of natural law in obscurity if he knows how to do nothing else than reiterate that, 'Since the world was ordered in wisdom, and since courses of action have been assigned man in this universe, this order should of necessity show man what is each person's duty in every step of life.'

13. Most men agree on the one point that the law of nature should be deduced from the reason of man himself, and should flow from that source, provided it be not perverted. Dio Chrysostom, De Servis, x [28, p. 110 c]: 'Since you have a mind, you may know of yourself what you should do and how.' For the same reason the Holy Writ declares it to be written in the hearts of men. But we hold it manifest that, even if the divine revelation throws the greatest and clearest light upon the knowledge of the law of nature, it can still be investigated and definitely proved, even without such aid, by the power of reason as it has been given man by his Creator and still persists. Yet we do not, for all that, feel obliged to maintain that the general principles of the law of nature come into and are imprinted upon the minds of men at their birth as distinct and clear rules which can be formulated by man without further investigation or thought as soon as he acquires the power of speech. For any one will readily recognize that this is a mere fancy if he undertakes to examine with some interest and care the different steps of children as they gradually advance from the ignorance of infancy. Nor should it be considered unimportant that the Sacred Scriptures regularly describe infancy as a state of ignorance of right and wrong, and manhood as one of knowledge of the same. See Jonah, iv. 11; Deuteronomy, i. 39; Isaiah, vii. 14-16.

Richard Cumberland, in his De Legibus Naturae, Prolegomena, §§ 5, 7-8, clearly shows that, even if such ideas are denied, the knowledge of the law of nature has in fact been stamped upon the minds of men by God as the first source of their being, whereby any one can also know that it is His wish and command for men to live in accordance with that law. The phrase in Romans, ii. 15, so pressed by most writers, is a figure of speech, and means nothing other than that this knowledge is clear, is fixed deep in the heart, and each man is sure in his own conscience of the source from which it was impressed upon his heart. In the same way the words of Jeremiah, xvii. 1, that sins 'are graven upon the tables of their hearts' only mean that they are real sins, not that they were known from birth. Add Luke, ii. 51; Proverbs, vii. 3. Likewise the ease with which children and the uneducated distinguish right from wrong comes from experience, since from their earliest days, and as soon as they show some use of reason, they have seen good deeds approved and rewarded and evil ones reprov'd and punished. They daily exercise such virtues and order every detail of their life by this pattern, and in this way their minds become so moulded that it occurs 139 to very few of them to question whether things could be done in any other way. Indeed, if any one should undertake to examine this matter in detail, he will discover how difficult it is to give any clear explanation for many things which the common throng does at once, and without a sign of hesitation. For instance, the author of De Principiis Justitiae et Decori [Velthuysen] asserts [p. 81]: 'If any one is caught stealing, the whole multitude are of one mind and body in striving to apprehend the thief, while if some one in a fit of anger has committed murder, every one hopes for his escape, and no one of his own accord lends assistance for his apprehension.' The common man does not know the reason for this, which is: 'Every one runs greater danger from a thief, who will take anyone's property, than from a murderer who is only angered against the one by whom he has been injured.' Therefore the law of nature may be called the dictate of a right reason only in the sense that the mind of man has the faculty of being able clearly to understand, from the observation of his condition, that he must of necessity order his life by that law, and at the same time to search out the principle whereby its commands can be convincingly and clearly demonstrated. Cf. Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. iv, § 3.

It is no objection to our theory that most men do not know or understand the method whereby the commands of the law of nature are demonstrated, and that the majority of them usually learn this law and observe it as a matter of training or by following the general example of society; for we also daily see workmen do many things by imitation, or with tools whose method of use they cannot demonstrate; and yet such operations can nevertheless be called mathematical and based upon good reason. From this it is clear how the fitness of the reason to work out the law of nature may be measured, and on what basis it can be decided whether some command proceeds from a sound or a depraved reason.

Now the dictates of sound reason are true principles that are in accordance with the properly observed and examined nature of things, and are deduced by logical sequence from prime and true principles. On the other hand, it is a dictate of depraved reason when one either proposes false principles, or by ἀσυλλογιστία [improper reasoning] formulates false conclusions. For to say that the law or nature is imprinted upon us by the nature of things implies¹ that it is true, since nature only puts forth what truly exists; and is the cause of that which contains nothing untrue, since, indeed, falsehood springs only from the error of men, who separate ideas which are related by nature, or else combine those which are separated by nature. Add Richard Cumberland, chap. v, § 1. If this is observed there need be no further fear that any one can palm off for the law of nature the vagaries of his diseased brain or the disordered craving of his mind; for his appeal to reason will be vain if he is unable to prove his assertions from principles which are legitimate and agreeable with the nature of things, inasmuch as truth and accuracy consist in the agreement of concepts and terms with the things which they are supposed to set forth. And if a man be so dull of wit as not to know how to weave the threads of an argument, he is very bold if he demands that any attention be paid to the conclusions of his fancy in so far as they deviate from the accepted beliefs of men. But it is clear to those who understand the true nature of proofs that principles should be not only necessarily true and fundamental, but also in a peculiar and intimate way be related to the subject of discussion, and so clear that the mind, on perceiving that the reason for making a statement is drawn from those principles, will rest satisfied and look for no further proof. This law for eliciting the true dictates of sound reason has been sinned against not only by those whose foundation of 140 the law of nature we have thus far discussed, but also by those who believe that they have set up a sufficient basis for the law of nature when they say: 'Natural good repute consists in the harmony of reason with desire; and the measure of this good repute is the excellence and dignity of human nature; while its end is that most noble one whereby we appear to have been appointed by nature to possess this universe.' For even if I should argue ever so emphatically that a certain action accords with the excellence and dignity of man, and therefore is reputable, and consequently to be performed, I would still not have attained a clear and distinct system in which my mind could rest with all confidence; but it remains none the less uncertain of what that excellence consists, and why it agrees with the nature of man. Thus, if one says to a priest, 'It is not becoming of you to frequent road-houses and places of prostitution,' of course he voices what is true, but he does not give the ultimate reason which leaves no room for further doubt.¹ Cf. Rachel, Prolegomena to Cicero, On Duties, §§ 38 ff.

Although it is not the right of merely any one whomsoever to draw out from its first principle, by proper deductions, the law of nature, yet evidence sufficient to enable us to assert that it can be understood by all men who are capable of reasoning may be found in the fact that even men of merely ordinary intelligence can grasp its demonstration, when presented to them by others, and recognize clearly its truth when they have compared their own natural condition with it. As for the common throng, who usually get their acquaintance with the law of nature from general information and common usage, the authority of their superiors, who oversee its observance in states should, in the first place, be enough to make them certain regarding it; secondly, the fact that there are no plausible reasons which can disturb or destroy its truth; and lastly, the fact that its concrete value may be observed daily. On such grounds the law of nature is considered common knowledge, so that no adult or sane person can oppose to it an insuperable ignorance.

To show how easy it is to know what the law of nature commands, Hobbes, in his De Cive, chap. iii, § 26, and Leviathan, chap. xv, recommends the following rule: 'When any one questions whether what he plans to do to another will be done in accordance with the law of nature or not, let him imagine himself in the other man's place.' For, in this way, when self-love and passions, which strongly bore down one scale of the balance, are transferred to the other scale, it will be easy to see which way the balance turns. This same rule is approved by our Saviour, Matthew, vii. 12. Moschus, Idyllia, v: 'If you would be loved where you be loving, then love them that love you.' (E.) Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. xii. When Aristotle, in Diogenes Laertius [V. 21], was asked how we should conduct ourselves toward our friends, he replied: 'As we should wish them to treat us.' Digest, II. ii. 1 and 4. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. III [xii]: 'Let us put ourselves in the place of him with whom we are angry: at present an overweening conceit of our own fortune makes us prone to anger, and we are quite willing to do to others what we cannot endure should be done to ourselves.' (S.) It was a saying of Confucius, as given by Martinus, Historia Sinica, Bk. IV, chap. xxv: 'Do not to another what you would not yourself experience.' The Inca Manco Capac, the founder of the empire of Peru, as narrated by Garcilasso [de la Vega] Comentarios Reales, Bk. I, chap. xxi, laid down the same rule for his citizens, whom he wished to raise to a higher level of culture.

Sharrock, De Officiis secundum Jus Naturae, chap. ii, n. 11, however, does not feel that this rule is universal, since under it a judge who was going to pass sentence upon some highway robbers would have to acquit them, as he most certainly, if put in their place, would wish his own life to be spared; I would have to lend a poor petitioner as much as he wished, since I would wish the same if I were in want; I would have to clean his shoes for my servant, since I regularly ask of him to do the same for me. But the rule will remain consistent, if it be borne in mind that not simply one but both scales are to be considered; that is, I must con-
 141 sider not only what suits me, but also what obligation or duty rests upon the other, and what I can demand of him without damaging our mutual obligation. We confess, however, that this rule cannot be held to be a basic axiom of the law of nature, since it is a corollary of the law that we should regard ourselves as on the same level with other men, and therefore can be ¹ proved a priori.

14. There seems to us no more fitting and direct way to learn the law of nature than through careful consideration of the nature, condition, and desires of man himself, although in such a consideration other things should necessarily be observed which lie outside man himself, and especially such things as work for his advantage or disadvantage. For whether this law was laid upon man in order to increase his happiness or to restrain his evil disposition, which may be his own destruction, it will be learned in no easier way than by observing when man needs assistance and when he needs restraint.

In the first place man has this in common with all beings which are conscious of their own existence, that he has the greatest love for himself, tries to protect himself by every possible means, and tries to secure what he thinks will benefit him, and to avoid what may in his opinion injure him. Cicero, On Ends, Bk. III [v]: 'As soon as an animal is born he is instinctively induced and incited to preserve himself and his existing condition, and to feel attachment to those things which have a tendency to preserve that condition; and to feel an abhorrence of dissolution, and of those circumstances which appear to be pregnant with dissolution.' (Y.) Valerius Flaccus, Argonautica, Bk. V [643]: 'There is love, and all things protect their own.' Add Diogenes Laertius on Zeno, Bk. VII [85]; Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. XI, § 8; Epictetus, Manual, chap. xxxviii. 2. And this love of each one for himself is always so strong that any inclination towards any other man yields to it. It is true that there are instances when some men seem to cherish others more highly than themselves, to rejoice more in their success, and to grieve more in their misfortunes than in their own, as Descartes says, Les Passions, chap. lxxxii:

The love which a good parent bears towards his children is so pure that he wishes to get nothing from them, nor to have them in any different manner than he now does, or to be more closely united to them than at the present moment. He regards them as his other self and strives for their advantage as if it were his own; or rather with greater interest, since he feels that he and they form one whole, of which he is not the better part, and he prefers their advantages to his own, not fearing even to sacrifice his own life so as to save them.

But passing over the fact that this love is not always constant, parents often wish to have the misfortunes of their children transferred to themselves, because they feel that they can bear them better than can their children, or because the youth of the latter makes them more worthy to live. Furthermore, when parents are so greatly affected by the successes of their children, it is principally because they think that it constitutes credit for them to have brought them into the world. See Luke, xi. 27; Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. I [606]: 'What glorious parents gave birth to so noble a child?' (F.) On the other hand, Epaminondas used to say that of all the successes which he experienced, the one which pleased him most was that he defeated the Lacedaemonians at Leuctra while his parents were still alive. Plutarch, Apophthegms [Epaminondas, x, p. 193 A]. But it is well known that many others have calmly faced death for those whom they have loved greatly, or to whom they have strongly attached themselves. To such they feel themselves joined and united as lesser parts of the whole, and hence they prefer to die that so they may preserve the greater part. Cf. Descartes, op. cit., chap. lxxxiii, and the account of the soldiers in Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. III [xxii]; Procopius, Persian War, Bk. I, chap. iii [6]:

Among the Ephthalitae Huns the wealthy citizens are in the habit of attaching to themselves friends to the number of twenty or more, as the case may be, and these become permanently their banquet-companions, and have a share in all their property, enjoying some kind of a common right in this matter. Then, when the man who has gathered such a company together comes to die, it is the custom that all these men be borne alive into the tomb with him. (D.)

Francis Carron, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. vii, writes that such human sacrifices are the present custom among the Japanese. On the customs of the Ethiopians, see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. vii. The truth is that such peoples hold the boasting of friendship and love, and the glory derived from it, above all other things, and feel that they are well purchased even at the cost of life itself. Some people, furthermore, take their life to avoid misfortune, feeling that it will henceforth be loathsome to them, now that the one is gone in whom they centered all their hope. Without doubt, in whatever a man does for another, he never forgets himself, and the general feeling of men is well expressed in the words of Satan in Job, ii. 4.

In addition to this self-love and desire to preserve himself by any and all means there is observable in the character of man the greatest weakness and native helplessness, so that if one could conceive of man as deprived of every assistance that comes to him in this world from other men he would think that life had been given him as a punishment. It is also evident that no greater help and comfort, after that granted man by God, comes to him than that from his fellow-creatures. For although the power of individual men to preserve themselves is so slight that they need the assistance of many things and men if they are to live well and comfortably, because their own strength and time would fail to give men very many most useful and most necessary things did not several persons unite their efforts; yet, on the other hand, individual men can contribute many things to the use of others, of which they do not feel the need, and which would therefore be of no use to themselves if they were not bestowed upon other men. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. v: 'Man was born for mutual assistance.' Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. II, chap. i: 'For we have come into being for co-operation, as have the feet, the hands, the eyelids, the rows of upper and lower teeth.' (H.) Yet men can, and often do, inflict just as much injury and harm on one another, either because of their base desires, or because they are forced to defend themselves against the injuries of others. Such acts constantly meet our eyes, and have been described more fully above in chapter i of Book II. Add Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. i, §§ 14 and 18.

It should be observed, in this connexion, that in investigating the condition of man we have assigned the first place to self-love, not because one should under all circumstances prefer only himself before all others or measure everything by his own advantage, distinguishing this from the interests of others, and setting it forth as his highest goal, but because man is so framed that he thinks of his own advantage before the welfare of others for the reason that it is his nature to think of his own life before the life of others. Another reason is that it is no one's business so much as my own to look out for myself. For although we hold before ourselves as our goal the common good, still, since I am also a part of society for the preservation of which some care is due, surely there is no one on whom the clear and special care of myself can more fittingly fall than upon my own self.

15. After the preceding remarks it is easy to find the basis of natural law. It is quite clear that man is an animal extremely desirous of his own preservation, in himself exposed to want, unable to exist without the help of his fellow-creatures, fitted in a remarkable way to contribute to the common good, and yet at all times malicious, petulant, and easily irritated, as well as quick and powerful to do injury, For such an animal to live and enjoy the good things that in this world attend his condition, it is necessary that he be sociable, that is, be willing to join himself with others like him, and conduct himself towards them in such a way that, far from having any cause to do him harm, they may feel that there is reason to preserve and increase his good fortune. Cicero, On Laws, Bk. I [v. 10]: 'You will appreciate the fact, if you investigate the nature of human associations and society, that law has not been established by opinion but by nature.' (Y.) Iamblichus, 143 Protrepticon, chap. xx [123 A]: 'That men should live together and at the same time contrary to law would be utterly impossible. For in that case they would suffer more than if each man lived altogether by himself.' And so it will be a fundamental law of nature, that 'Every man, so far as in him lies, should cultivate and preserve toward others a sociable attitude, which is peaceful and agreeable at all times to the nature and end¹ of the human race'. For by a sociable attitude we do not understand here the particular meaning of a tendency to form special societies, which can be formed even for an evil purpose and in an evil manner, such as a banding together of highway robbers, as if it were enough for them to band together with any end whatsoever in view. But by a sociable attitude we mean an attitude of each man towards every other man, by which each is understood to be bound to the other by kindness, peace, and love, and therefore by a mutual² obligation. And so it would be absolutely false to assert that the sociable attitude which we propose makes no distinction between a good and a bad society.

We said that every man should cultivate, and by his life promote, a sociable attitude 'so far as in him lies'. Because, inasmuch as it is not in our power to make all others conduct themselves towards us as they should, we have, therefore, done our duty, if we have omitted nothing within our power which might move them to be in their turn sociable towards us. A corollary of this is that, since whoever obligates a man to an end obligates him as well to the means without which the end cannot be obtained, 'all things which necessarily work to that sociable attitude are understood to be commanded by natural law, and all that disturb or destroy it to be forbidden.' It is patent that this way of eliciting the law of nature is not only the most clear, but the majority of scholars recognize that it is also the most fitting and proper. There is no need of piling up a mass of testimony. The words of Seneca may serve as an example of all others, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xviii:

To what do we trust for safety if not in mutual good offices one to another? It is by the interchange of benefits alone that we gain some measure of protection for our lives, and of safety against sudden disasters. Taken singly, what should we be? a prey and quarry for wild beasts, a luscious and easy banquet. [. . .] Man is covered by a soft skin, [. . .] weak and naked by himself he is made strong by union. [God] has bestowed upon him two gifts, reason and union, which raise him from weakness to the highest power. And so he, who if taken alone would be inferior to every other creature, possesses supreme dominion. Union has given him sovereignty over all animals [. . .]; it is union which has checked the inroads of disease, provided support for our old age, and given us relief from pain. [. . .] Take away union, and you will rend asunder the association by which the human race preserves its existence. (S.) For man saves man, and city, city; one hand washes the other, and one finger the other; all our security rests in comrades.¹

Pliny, Natural History, Bk. IX, chap. xlvi. Add Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IV, § 4, and Bk. V, § 16, where he calls 'society the good of the logical creature', and Bk. V, § 29, and passim, where he denominates man as 'by nature a social creature'. Add Idem, Bk. VII, § 55. Libanius, Declamations, xix [xiii. 30]: 'Nature has appointed man to be a helper to his fellow man and a partner in his life.'

Though other reasons also may be added, they are less important, or are arguments for man's social nature. Such, for example, is the fact that nothing is sadder for man than continued solitude. So Cicero, On Ends, Bk. III [xx]: 'No one would like to pass his life in solitude, not even if surrounded with an infinite abundance of pleasures.' Therefore, 'it is easily perceived that we are born for communion and fellowship with man, and for natural association.' (Y.) Or that the tongue would in that case serve no end, that most noble instrument, by which man 144 alone of all animals can express his thoughts in articulate sound (see Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. II, chap. xvi). Or that every good man takes the greatest delight in distinguishing himself among his fellows by worthy deeds. Thus what Cicero has to say should surely be considered only among the secondary reasons of sociableness, On Duties, Bk. I [xliv. 158]:

But if we could be furnished, as they say, as by a kind of magic wand, with everything that relates to food and raiment, then every man of excellent genius, laying aside all other occupations, would apply himself to knowledge and learning. The fact is not so; for he would fly from solitude and look out for a companion in his pursuits; and would desire sometimes to teach and sometimes to learn, sometimes to listen and sometimes to speak. (E.)

In another place he speaks to the same effect, On Duties, Bk. III [v. 25]:

To undergo the greatest labours and inquietudes for the sake, if it were possible, of preserving or assisting all nations—imitating that Hercules whom the report of men, mindful of his benefits, has placed in the council of the gods—is more in accordance with nature than to live in solitude, not only without any inquietudes, but even amid the greatest pleasures, abounding in all manner of wealth, though you should also excel in beauty and strength. Wherefore every man of the best and most noble disposition much prefers that life to this. (E.)

The following remarks of the same writer, in his Laelius [viii],

apply more properly to friendship in particular than to our general sociable attitude: 'Friendship and society have sprung rather from nature than from a sense of want, and more from an attachment of the mind than from a calculation how much advantage they would afford.' (E.)

The law of nature, as stated by Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. i, § 4, regarding zeal for the common welfare and the greatest possible exhibition of good will towards others does not differ from our fundamental law. For in saying that man is a social animal we do not intimate that he should hold his own advantage, distinct from that of others, as his good, but the advantage of others as well, nor that any one should seek his own advancement to the oppression or neglect of others, nor that a man should hope for happiness if he disregards and injures others.

From the social nature of man, and from the fact that he was born not for himself alone, but for the human race, Bacon of Verulam in his Advancement of Learning, Bk. VII, chap. i, has drawn some excellent corollaries, for example: That the active life is to be preferred to the contemplative; that the happiness of man is to be sought in virtue, not in pleasure; that we should not withdraw from active life or separate ourselves from contact with others because of unforeseen events; finally, that we should not retire from public life because of timidity or disinclination to conciliate men. In the same connexion he also observes that no system of philosophy, religion, law, or belief has in any age so increased the public good and repressed individual self-seeking as the Christian faith.

16. Let us now consider whether what Hobbes advances in his De Cive, chap. i, § 2, is opposed to what we have said. Certainly his position has been represented by some learned men in a very unfavourable light, as if he maintained that 'nature has ordained discord and not society between men'; from which in their minds it follows that 'every kind of human society is contrary to the purpose of nature'. Cf. Conring, De Civili Prudentia, chap. xiv, towards the end. This is as if I should say that no man is by nature born with the power of speech; therefore all speech which is acquired is contrary to the purpose of nature; or that all men on first seeing the light are by nature very small; therefore it is contrary to nature when they grow up; or that men are by nature subject to disease; therefore it is contrary to nature when they avert or throw off diseases by dieting and medicine.

Now at first sight the theory of Hobbes appears paradoxical enough, especially if one does not carefully note the ambiguity of the word nature. That no one may be led to make the same mistake it should, first of all, be observed that self-love and a sociable attitude should by no means be opposed to each other, but rather that their tendencies should be restrained in such a way that the latter be not checked or destroyed by the former. (Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xix [xiv]: 'It can no longer be regarded as unsocial for a man to do everything for his own sake.'¹) When unrestrained licence has broken up that control, and each man decides to seek his own advantage to the hurt of others, all manner of confusion arises, whereby the race of man is divided into warring groups. To avoid such a state of affairs the care of one's own safety commands that the laws of a sociable attitude be observed, since without the latter the former cannot be secure. As for the demonstration whereby Hobbes very adroitly deduces the laws of nature from the desire for self-preservation we should observe at the outset that such a method of proof shows, indeed, most clearly how conducive it is to the safety of men for them to lead their life in accordance with such dictates of reason. But the conclusion should not be drawn, without more ado, that man has a right to use such dictates as means for his preservation, and that therefore he is also bound to observe them as by some law; if those dictates of reason are to have the effect of laws they must certainly be drawn from some other principle.

In the next place great care should also be taken to prevent any one from concluding that when he feels he has made his own safety perfectly sure he need take no thought of others, or that he may do despite at his pleasure to anybody that contributes nothing to my safety, or has not the strength to work it harm. For we called man a sociable creature because men are so constituted as to render mutual help more than any other creature, just as no creature can suffer more injury² from man than can man himself. Nay, man's eminence and perfection stand out all the more as they contribute to the advantage of others, and deeds of such a nature are considered most noble and indicative of the greatest wisdom, while on the other hand any worthless fellow and a fool can bother and injure others. Furthermore, if it be proper to consider a man's own advantage his one end of life, then when several persons decide that their greatest advantage is concerned with the same thing it will follow either that the ends of several people, involving a contradiction, are said to agree at the said time with right reason, which is absurd; or, since no one can claim that his end should be preferred to that of another, it will have to be admitted that man should not propose his own advantage as his end unless he also takes into consideration the advantage of others. Nay, should a man neglect all his fellow men, and endeavour to adjust all things to his own advantage, he will have his pains for nothing, since it is impossible for all things and persons to be disposed according to the desires of individual men who seek contrary ends, and so he will invite others to prey upon him. Furthermore, if only that is good for man which serves his own advantage alone, it follows that it is evil for others, since it cannot serve their advantage. Hence the same thing will be sought by one person and opposed by all others—a situation which can only give rise to conflicts among men. For a fuller discussion see Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v. Bacon wisely observes, Essays, chap. xxiii: 'It is a poor centre of a man's actions himself.'¹

Finally, even though some man may be unable to work me any benefit or harm and has in himself nothing for me to fear or desire, yet it is nature's will that even such a one be considered my kinsman and equal, and this reason alone, were there no others, lays upon the race of men the cultivation of a friendly society. And if there were any nation addicted to internal peace and justice, and so powerful that it could be formidable to all others, for which reason they would not be restrained from injuring others by the fear that their deeds might return upon their own heads; yet, were this nation to prey at its will upon weaker peoples, harry, plunder, kill, and drag others into slavery, just as they felt it to be to their profit, we would say that they had plainly broken the law of nature. And yet this people, as we imagine them, might preserve themselves, even if they observed no right towards others. Cicero, On Ends, Bk. III [xix]: 'Nor is a betrayer of his country more to be blamed than one who deserts the general advantage or the general safety on account of his own private advantage or safety.' (Y.) In the same way no one would commend the life of brigands, because among themselves they maintain some elementary justice and observe laws, because also their leader divides their booty equally, and because that one of their number who openly or secretly robs one of his fellow thieves thereby leaves for himself no place even in their own undertakings. See Cicero, On Ends, Bk. II [xi]. And this point needs stressing all the more, the more evident it is that a very strong man is led to break the law of nature on the grounds that he is sufficient for himself, his own safety is abundantly provided for, and there is no reason why he should conduct himself in a peaceable and friendly manner towards others. 146

In conclusion, as the care for one's own safety does not exclude the care for a sociable attitude, so also the former can continue unimpaired along with the latter, as is clear from the words of our Saviour when He commands us to love our neighbour as ourselves. Chrysippus says in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [x]:

He who runs a race ought to make exertions, and struggle as much as he can to be victor; but he ought by no means to trip up or push with his hand the person with whom he is contesting. Thus in life it is not unjust that each should seek for himself what may pertain to his advantage—it is not just that he should take from another. (E.)

Nay, reason also plainly declares that he who regards his safety and life cannot renounce the care of others. For since our safety and happiness depend in large part on the goodwill and assistance of others, and the nature of men is such that they desire for their good deeds some like return, and when this is not forthcoming make an end of their benefactions, no sane person can propose to protect himself on the theory that he renounce respect for all others. But, on the contrary, the more he loves himself the more he will endeavour by kindly deed to get others to love him. For no one can hope with any reason that men will want, of their own accord, to make any effort to increase the happiness of those whom they know to be malevolent, perfidious, ungrateful, and inhuman; surely one must rather believe that other men will watch their opportunity to repress and destroy such persons.

17. Again, it does not follow that individual men, on entering some society or association with particular men look for some special advantage which will come to them; and hence that the nature of man is not determined for society, and I am not expected to live on social terms with one from whom I expect for myself no special profit. For this much is surely clear that, when certain men gather into a particular kind of organization, it is because of some congeniality, peculiar to themselves, of mind or other qualities, or because they think they can secure some special end better among these associates than among others. Moreover, granting that as a rule it is agreeable to no man to live outside some form of society, also among those who are united by no other bond than a common humanity, this general sociable attitude and peace should be fostered, which consists in the avoidance of unjust injuries, and in the mutual advancement and division of advantages and profits,¹ so far as more binding obligations leave it possible.

147 18. All this makes perfectly clear the reply to be made to the following objection: 'If a man loved another man naturally, that is, as a man, there would be no reason why every man should not love every other man equally, as being equally a man, or why he should associate himself more closely with those in whose society more than in that of others he is accorded honour or profit.' In this statement general sociable attitude is confused with particular and more limited societies, and general love with that which arises from particular causes, for, as a matter of fact, no reason is required for this general love other than that a person is a man. Nature, indeed, for the reasons cited above, has in fact ordained a certain general friendship between all men, of which no one is to be deprived, unless some monstrous iniquities have made him unworthy. But, although by the wisdom of the Creator the natural law has been so adapted to the nature of man, that its observance is always connected with the profit and advantage of men, and therefore also this general love tends to man's greatest good; yet, in giving a reason for this fact, one does not refer to the advantage accruing therefrom, but to the common nature of all men. For instance, if a reason must be given why a man should not injure another, you do not say, because it is to his advantage, although it may, indeed, be most advantageous, but because the other person also is a man, that is, an animal related by nature, whom it is a crime to injure. Lucian, Amores, [xxvii]:

We are not like brute beasts in loving a solitary life, but, as we are united in a kind of friendly community, our blessings are more sweet, our burdens are lighter, when they are shared with one another, and we are the happier when we have communicated our pleasures.

Dio Chrysostom, Orations, xii, says that Zeus has been called 'the patron of friends' and 'the patron of companions', because 'he gathers all men into groups and wills that they be friends to one another, and no one the opponent or enemy to another; likewise "the patron of strangers"', because one should not be indifferent even to strangers, and should consider no man an alien'.

Now, indeed, there are not a few circumstances above and beyond this general friendship which make a person cherish one man with greater affection than another. For instance, because there is a greater congeniality of mind between them along certain lines of conduct; because one is more fitted or inclined than another to work to your advantage; or because they have close relations of birth or residence. But the reason why a man more gladly associates himself with those in whose society he is accorded more honour or profit than another, lies in the fact that no man can avoid setting his heart upon his own advancement, so far as he recognizes it correctly. But such a setting of one's heart is by no means repugnant to the social nature of man, provided it does not disturb the harmony of society. For nature has not commanded us to be sociable, to the extent that we neglect to take care of ourselves. Rather the sociable attitude is cultivated by men in order that by the mutual exchange among many of assistance and property, we may be enabled to take care of our own concerns to greater advantage. And even though a man, when he joins himself to any special society, holds before his eyes, first of all, his own advantage, and after that the advantage of comrades since his own cannot be secured without that of all, yet this does not prevent his being obligated so to cultivate his own advantage, that the good of the society be not injured, or harm offered its different members; or at times to hold his own advantage in abeyance and work for the welfare of the society.

And it has nothing to do with the case when the assertion is made that the origin of large and lasting societies, that is, of states, lay not in the mutual good-will of men, but in their mutual fear, the latter word 148 being taken as the prospect of future evil or precaution against it. For, passing over the fact that we are now concerned not with the origin of civil society, but with the general sociable attitude, it is furthermore entirely in keeping with the state of man's nature that, while single men or small groups should lay themselves open to the injuries of those who look for their own advantage without the slightest regard for others, many should unite, and so defend themselves against the infliction of such injuries. For is it not required for a society to be said to be in harmony with nature that it have been formed upon the basis of mutual good-will alone. And yet this motive is not entirely absent in the formation of states, since, indeed, at least the majority of those who lay the foundations of states are united by a feeling of mutual good-will, even though afterwards others, whose compelling motive is fear, are led to join with them. But on fear as the bond of states, as well as on the dispute, whether man is by nature a ζῷον πολιτικόν [political animal], we shall dwell more at length when we have to discuss the origin of states.

19. This method of deducing the natural law, we feel, is not only genuine and clear, but also so sufficient and adequate that there is no precept of the natural law affecting other men, the basis of which is not ultimately to be sought therein. Yet, as we shall show later, if these dictates of reason are to have the force of laws, it is necessary to presuppose the existence of God and His providence, whereby all things are governed, and primarily mankind. For we cannot agree with Grotius, when he says in his Prolegomena that natural laws 'will have some place, even if we should grant—what can only be done with the greatest impiety—that there is no God, or that He does not concern Himself with the affairs of men'. For if some man should devise such an impious and idiotic theory, and imagine that mankind had sprung from itself, then the dictates of reason could in no possible way have the force of law, since law necessarily supposes a superior. Cicero observes quite properly, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. I [ii]: 'I do not even know if we cast off piety towards the gods, but that faith, and all the associations of human life, and that most excellent of all virtues, justice, may perish with it.' (Y.) Libanius, Declamations, iii [v. 79]: 'Good faith does not go hand in hand with disrespect for the gods.' Although, of course, its rules might conceivably be followed out of regard for profit, like the medicines which are prescribed by physicians in order to maintain one's vigour. The sentiments of Grotius seem to be gathered from a passage of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VI, § 44:

If the gods take counsel about nothing at all—an impious belief—why may I not take counsel for myself? It is still in my power to consider my own interest. And that is to every man's interest which is agreeable to his own constitution and nature. But my nature is rational and civic; my city and country, as Antoninus,¹ is Rome; as a man, the world. The

Now the view of a certain scholar, that upon our principle the virtue of fortitude cannot be proved unless a basis is laid for it in the immortality of the soul, since otherwise no reward could fall to the lot of the man who sacrifices his life for a worthy cause, his view, I say, offers little difficulty. Although it is impious to deny or to cast doubt upon such a belief, still it is possible to show that even without it a soldier can be commanded to do battle to the death for his country. For, not to mention the fact, that it has not been clearly proved, that every proper action must necessarily be sacrificed for some, as it were, external reward, it is certainly agreed that it lies within the power of the supreme authority to arm citizens, and to proclaim upon pain of death that no one flee from his appointed place. Now of two evils a man cannot avoid choosing the lesser. But it is a lesser evil to fight with peril to one's life, and even to one's last breath, than to face certain death. Therefore a soldier would be the greatest fool and coward who would not prefer falling at the hand of the enemy with some expectation of revenge, to offering his throat to the executioner, with the disgrace attendant upon such a death. The saying of Iamblichus, Protrepticon [xiii, p. 76 A], applies here: 'When brave men meet death it is from fear of greater¹ evils.' But it would appear to be sufficient that one fight boldly and with all his strength, whatever be his motive; nor is it always necessary for the preservation of states and society among men that all be endued with a steadiness of mind imperturbable in the face of death, which certainly cannot be predicated of every man's spirit. Nay, the use of fortitude is seen not only in bravely facing death, when that is necessary, but chiefly in vigorously repelling the danger of death. For it frequently happens that perils are the only means of avoiding perils, and 'Death o'ertakes not less the runaway, nor spares the limbs and coward backs of faint-hearted youths'. (B.) [Horace, Odes, III. ii. 15 f.]

Nor does it follow that, unless the immortality of the soul be presupposed, the summum bonum of man must be found in sensual pleasure. For passing over the fact that in the system of natural law, as set forth above, the immortality of the soul is not denied, but only not taken into consideration, that sensual pleasure, which is popularly considered the summum bonum of Epicurus, does not work towards the conservation, sociable attitude, peace, and tranquillity of mankind, but is on the contrary opposed to it. Very different from this system of natural law is the heart and scope of the Christian religion, and therefore the Apostle is entirely right in saying that Christians would be of all men most miserable if in this life only they had hope in Christ [1 Corinthians, xv. 15, 19].

20. But if these dictates of reason are to have the force of law, there is need of a higher principle; for although their advantage is most manifest, still it alone could never lay so firm a restraint upon the spirits of men that they could not forsake such dictates if they should find satisfaction in disregarding this advantage, or believe that they could better consult their own advantage in some other way. Nor can a man's will be so thoroughly restrained by his mere intentions that he cannot go opposite to it whenever he so pleases. And even if many men endowed with natural liberty should agree to keep those dictates, these will, none the less, abide only so long as the agreement of those men continues in force. Nor would the obligation cease only when all who had agreed to it should decide to give it up—as is now the custom, whenever pacts are renounced by mutual disagreement—but even while the compact stands there would be no power to enforce it since, as the case supposes, the aforesaid dictate of reason which maintains agreements has not yet taken on the force of law; and so each person concerned will be able to withdraw from such an agreement whenever he wishes, no matter though the other members disagree with him.

Finally, the mere authority of men does not seem able to endow these dictates with the power of obligation. For since such authority can arise only by means of pacts, and pacts secure their force through law, it does not appear how any human authority could arise endowed with power to assert the force of obligation, unless the dictates of reason had beforehand the strength of law. Even if you should imagine that human government depends on the mere consent of men, and by this consent the observance of the dictates of reason is enjoined with the force of laws, they still would have no greater force than do positive laws, which in origin and duration depend upon the will of the legislator. Cf. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. vii.

150 It must, therefore, under all circumstances be maintained that the obligation of natural law is of God, the creator and final governor of mankind, who by His authority has bound men, His creatures, to observe it. And this assertion can be proved by the light of reason. Inasmuch as it has long since been established by men of discernment, and no God-fearing man disputes it, we now assume that God is the maker and controller of this universe. Since He so formed the nature of the world and man that the latter cannot exist without leading a social life, and for this reason gave him a mind capable of grasping the ideas that lead to this end, and since He suggests these ideas to men's minds by the course of natural events as they come from Him as the first cause, and represent clearly their necessary relationship and truth, it is surely to be recognized that He also willed for man to regulate his actions by that native endowment which God Himself appears to have given him in a special way above the beasts. And since this end cannot be attained in any other way than by the observance of natural law, it is understood that man has been obligated also by the Creator to observe this law, as a means not elaborated by the wish of men, and changeable at their pleasure, but as expressly ordained by the Creator Himself to secure this end. For whoever has the authority to enjoin some end upon another is also understood to have obligated such a person to use the means without which that end cannot be secured. See Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 1.

That a social life has been enjoined upon men by the authority of God is clear from the following considerations: Because the human race is of such a nature, that it cannot exist in safety if this belief be not firmly established; because, therefore, the will of the first cause has brought it about that, in natural consequence, the happiness of the human race is secured through acts commended by the natural law, and its misery is created by such as are forbidden; but especially because in no other creature than man is there to be found any religious sense or fear of God. To be added to these considerations is the sensitive conscience in the hearts of upright men, which convinces them that, in sinning against the law of nature, they are offending Him who has sovereignty over the minds of men, and is to be feared even when there is no impending fear of other men. This is illustrated by the passage of Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [vi], about Tiberius:

So terribly had his own crimes and excesses recoiled in punishment on his head! How true the saying of the great ancient sage [Socrates] that, if the souls of tyrants could be laid bare, the marks of blows and tortures might there be seen; since just as the body is scored by stripes, so is the mind by cruelty, by lust and wicked purposes. (R.)

Cicero, On Ends, Bk. I [xvi]:

But if any men appear to themselves to be sufficiently fenced around and protected from the consciousness of men, still they dread the knowledge of the gods, and think that those very anxieties by which their minds are eaten up night and day are inflicted upon them by the immortal gods for the sake of punishment. (Y.)

Seneca, in Lactantius, Bk. VI, chap. xxiv: 'Foolish men! what does it profit you not to have a witness, if you have the witness of your own conscience?' (C.) Albricus,¹ De Deorum Imaginibus, 22: 'Malice never wears a frank expression.' Add Juvenal, Satires, XIII [193]. On the advantages of a good conscience, Martial, Bk. X, ep. xxiii: 'A good man lengthens his term of existence; to be able to enjoy our part of life is to live twice.' Add Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VII, chap. xvii.

Now the laws of nature would have had full power to obligate men, even if God had never proclaimed them again in his revealed word, for man was bound to obey his Creator, whatever the way in which He might reveal His will to him. Nor was a special revelation absolutely necessary, in order that a rational creature might recognize that he was subject to the command of the final judge of things. No one, indeed, would deny that even those to whom the Sacred Scriptures were not known have sinned against the law of nature—a statement which could not be made, if it acquired the force of law only through its pronouncement in the Scriptures.

For this reason we cannot approve the following statement of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, towards the end: 'Since those which we call the laws of nature [. . .] are nothing else but certain conclusions, understood by reason, of things to be done or omitted; but a law, to speak properly, is the speech of him who by right commands somewhat to others to be done or omitted, therefore they are not, in propriety of speech, laws, as they proceed from nature, but only as they are delivered by God in Holy Scriptures.' For we do not feel that it belongs to the essence of law that it be spoken, or that it be made known to subjects by words formed into a speech; but it is enough if the will of the superior be arrived at and understood in any way whatsoever, whether by the inner dictate of the mind, from the condition of our nature, or the character of the business to be undertaken. He himself acknowledges this, ibid., chap. xv, § 3: 'The laws of God are disclosed in three ways: first, by the unspoken dictates of right reason,' and so forth.

But the laws of nature discovered by rational processes can only be conceived in the form of propositions, and in this respect they are properly called propositions. But just as it makes no difference, in the case of civil laws, whether they are made public in writing or by verbal proclamation, so the divine law will have equal force whether it be made known by God Himself in visible form, and speaking with a voice like that of man, or through very holy men, moved by a special divine impulse; or whether, finally, it be discovered through the natural reason by a study of the condition of man. For the reason, properly speaking, is not the law of nature itself, but only the means by the proper use of which it is recognized. Besides, the method of promulgating a law has no bearing upon its real nature. Now it may be a clearer, and possibly more convenient, method of revealing one's will to another, if a man impresses it upon the senses of another by propositions expressed in words; and yet a thing is held to be sufficiently revealed, when an opportunity is afforded, and even thrust upon a person, for considering and pondering it by the proper faculty. And so man, who has been given by the kindness of his Creator the faculty to understand both his own and others' actions, and to judge of their harmony with human nature, cannot but have occasion to judge of the agreeableness of those actions, positing the existence of other men. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. i, § 11; chap. v, § 1.

Although in order to make a law obligatory it is necessary for it to be known to the subjects, while it is not in the power of every one to deduce the natural law from the dictate of reason, and to recognize its necessary relation to the nature of man, yet this is no reason either for natural law ceasing to obligate all men, or for it being impossible to regard it as known by the light of reason. For a public and simple knowledge is sufficient to make a law obligatory, and no elaborated demonstration and deduction of it is required for such a purpose. And although it be probable that the important principles of natural law were given to the first men by God, to be passed on to others afterwards by instruction and custom, yet the knowledge of that law can none the less be called natural, inasmuch as its necessary truth can be gathered by mental processes or the use of natural reason. And because the propositions which define natural law are suggested to the minds of men by a contemplation of the nature of things, they are referred back to the author of nature, even to God. Add Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. i, § 10.

The most enlightened of scholars refer the origin of natural law to God. Plutarch, On Listening to Lectures [i, p. 37 D]: 'It is one and the same thing to follow God and to obey reason.' An excellent passage from Cicero, On the Commonwealth, Bk. III [xxii. 16], is given in Lactantius, Bk. VI, chap. viii.

This is indeed a true law, right reason, agreeing with nature, diffused among all, unchanging, everlasting, which calls to duty by commanding, deters from wrong by forbidding; which, however, neither commands nor forbids the good in vain, nor affects the wicked by commanding or forbidding. It is not allowable to alter the provisions of this¹ law, nor is it permitted us to modify it, nor can it be entirely abrogated. Nor, truly, can we be released from this law, either by the senate or the people; nor is another person to be sought to explain or interpret it. Nor will there be one law at Rome and another at Athens; one law at the present time, and another hereafter; but the same law, everlasting and unchangeable, will bind all nations at all times; and there will be one common Master and Ruler of all, even God, the framer, arbitrator, and proposer of this law; and he who shall not obey this will flee from himself, and, despising the nature of man, will suffer the greatest punishments through this very thing, even though he shall have escaped the other punishments which are supposed to exist. (C.)

Sophocles, Oedipus the King [865 f.]:

Those laws ordained on high
Whose birthplace is the bright ethereal sky.
No mortal birth they own,
Olympus their progenitor alone. (S.)

Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. viii, shows that even though the Gentiles recognized that the principles of natural law were now and then violated and overturned, as it were, by the depraved manner of men, still they were persuaded that τὸ αὐτοδίκαιον, or what is really just by the command of the gods, remains the same at all times, and always maintains the same force of obligation. This belief was the source of the prevailing belief of the Gentiles on the tortures of the wicked in the lower regions, which awaited those who were guilty of gross sins against the law of nature; for since they believed that the gods demanded satisfaction for a violation of the natural law, they must have believed that they were the authors of that law. Likewise, all the best of the Gentiles, on the other hand, were persuaded that the virtue displayed by good men was not without the favour of Heaven. Iamblichus, Protrepticon, chap. xiii [p. 83 A]: 'This one thing must be thought true, that no evil befalls a good man either in life or in death, and his¹ fortunes are not disregarded by the immortal gods.' Euripides, Ion [1621 ff.]:

For the good at last shall overcome, at last attain their right;

Selden proceeds to show that among the early Christians the general opinion prevailed that even in the interval between the creation and the handing down of the Decalogue, the natural and universal laws were given man by God, which were later inserted in the body of the Mosaic law. This caused Chrysostom to make the excellent remark, Orations, xii, To the People of Antioch: God added no reason to His laws on the honouring of parents, murder, adultery, and theft, because they were already well known as portions of the natural law; but since the law on the Sabbath was positive, He took care to add a reason. Add also ibid., Bk. I, chap. ix; Bk. VII, chaps. ix-x. In conclusion, the wisest legislators have recognized that all laws secure their greatest stability from religion, and so have regularly given the first place in their codes to the worship of God. See the introduction to the laws of Zaleucus, as given by Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xxi.

21. It is also worth while to treat more carefully the sanction of natural law. In this connexion, beside what has been set forth above on the sanction of law in general, we open our discussion by observing that the good and evil which fall to the lot of man can be divided into three classes. Now, among good things, some proceed from the free gift of the Creator, or from the voluntary benevolence of other men, or are acquired by the labour of man, which he has undertaken without compulsion and of his own free will. This class is plainly not due to the observance of laws. A second class of good things proceeds by a natural consequence from an action required by the laws, because the Creator
53 has assigned to every act agreeable with His laws its regular and natural effect, which tends to the advantage of man. These good things Richard Cumberland calls 'natural rewards'. The third and last class of good things follows certain actions, because of the will of the legislator or the agreement of men; of these the former are rewards κατ' ἐξοχήν [par excellence], or arbitrary rewards, the latter are wages.

In the same way some evils follow from the particular nature and condition of man—no notice being taken of how this condition first came about—or they involve no guilt on the part of him on whom they fall. These you may call in a sound sense evils of fate, the word fate not being opposed to the disposal of God, but to the special guilt of him who suffers from that evil. Others follow upon sins by a natural consequence and connexion; and these are sometimes called natural punishments. The last class arises from sins upon the special determination and disposal of a legislator, not from a line of natural effects; and in this case the quality, degree, place, and time of the evil depend upon the will of the legislator. These last are what we call punishments, in the proper sense of the word, or, in a looser sense of the word, arbitrary punishments.

With this much by way of introduction we declare that, although the most Good and Great Creator might, by virtue of His power, have demanded of us an obedience that would certainly have been without any merit for us, it pleased His goodness so to constitute the nature of the world and of men that certain good things follow by a natural connexion the observance of natural laws and certain evils their violation. And the observance of natural laws is attended by an easy and good conscience, joined with a good assurance, a well-ordered and calm mind, the preservation of the body from many not fatal evils and unnumbered advantages which can be secured by the mutual good-will and attentions of other men. Thus Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xiii, calls 'a great reward the steady calm of a happy mind';¹ and again:

The road to happiness is easy. [. . .] What is more restful than a mind at peace, and what more toilsome than anger? What is more at leisure than clemency, what fuller of business than cruelty? Modesty keeps holiday while vice is overwhelmed with work. In fine the culture of any of the virtues is easy, while vices require a great expense. (S.)

Add ibid., Bk. II, chap. xxx, and the last chapter; Bk. III, chap. v and xxvi. The same is illustrated by the story of Prodicus about Hercules at the two ways, in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. II [i. 21 ff.]. Proverbs, ii. 4; viii. 18; x. 9; xi. 3, 5, 10, 18, 19, 25; xviii. 20; Sirach, vi. 5; vii. 37, 39; xxxi. 28.

On the other hand there comes by natural connexion from a violation of the same law uneasiness of conscience, distress and degeneracy of mind, a wasting away of the body, and countless evils which can arise from the provoked violence of other men and the withdrawal of their aid. Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 4: 'The unjust man is unjust to himself, for he makes himself bad.' (H.) Cicero says of a ruined man: 'His own habits will take their revenge upon him,' [Letters to Atticus, IX. xii] Proverbs, v. 9-11; vi. 33-5; xii. 13; xiv. 14, 22, 32, 34; xvii. 13; xix. 29; xx. 1; xxii. 5; xxiii. 20, 28 ff.; Sirach, xix. 3; xxxi. 22 ff., 39, 40.

Now although these rewards and evils are said by some to come with only little certainty from good and evil actions, since many are returned for their benefactions only hatred, envy, and other ills, while, on the other hand, others enjoy without punishment the fruits of their evil deeds, and so it cannot be assumed, without chance of error, that for our good deeds we shall be returned in kind by other men (although the fruit produced within ourselves is never subject to interruption); still it is sure that, from good and just actions, we can reasonably hope for advantages with a degree of certainty that would not be justified if one were to expect to get them from the opposed vices. Proverbs, xi. 31. And even if these good deeds do not secure everything, which by the nature of things they were fitted to secure, there is still an evident probability that not a few benefits will follow, or at all events more than can be expected from evil actions. And so on this score we are 154 consulting far better for our safety, and can conceive a much more likely hope that others will contribute something to our advantage than if we should have no respect for other men, and should refer all things to our own advantage; and especially is this true if we should decide to practice violence and deceit on others and to seek our gain through their loss. On this argument, therefore, the value of the reward that must follow a good action when all things are properly weighed exceeds the gain that will accrue from an illegal action.

It should be carefully noted at this point, when the effect of good and evil actions is being discussed, that no consideration is being given to those advantages and evils which we referred above to the first class, and which cannot be either acquired or avoided by our foresight and endeavour. For such can and do fall equally on good as well as on wicked men. Thus a scoundrel may receive from nature a healthy and strong body, a good man one that is weak and subject to disease. In the same way death carries off the good as well as the evil. But the only things concerned here are those that can be foreseen by the human reason, and therefore depend to some extent upon our actions.

Now although some of the advantages which it is our endeavour to gain from other men by observing the law of nature depend upon the good-will and honour of others, and are, therefore, clearly not within our control, yet because it is probable that they also have the same end as we, there is good reason at least to expect the effects which depend upon others, although they cannot be determined beforehand with the same accuracy. And hardly any person has had experience with men so incensed at him that he does not recognize he owes much to the good-will of others. Certainly the evils which have come of men have never been able to encompass the destruction of the human race; and this is a proof that good actions have attained their effect more often than they have fallen short of it. Thus, even if, by an unforeseen concurrence of external causes, many benefits from other men pour as though of their own accord upon a man who neglects the law of nature, yet because such effects in this case are only, as concerns him, contingent, and certainly come but rarely, it is clear that reason does not prescribe acts of such a kind, nor does law command any such thing. Reason, indeed, teaches quite clearly that it will lead with far greater probability to our happiness for us to act with an end in view, and through the best means at our disposal, than if we take no foresight and commit ourselves entirely to the uncertain play of chance. But all this is perfectly obvious, and is most fully set forth by Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae.

There remains, therefore, the question whether in addition to these natural effects of evil actions, and those which spring from the sanction of civil laws, there are still others framed by the will of God, to be exercised, as it were, by his sovereign hand; or whether natural laws are sanctioned by God with a further arbitrary penalty; especially since it is observed that the natural effects of evil actions are sometimes interrupted and the crimes of some men turn in part to their profit. On this point the Sacred Scriptures give clear testimony. But affirmation of this point is also furnished by the very ancient belief, found among most peoples, of the divine Nemesis and the punishments of the lower world. Illustrations of this appear in Jonah, i. 7, and Acts, xxviii. 4, where there was, indeed, no natural connexion between the sin of Jonah and the storm on the sea, and between the murder and the bite of the viper, and so the sailors of Palestine and the people of Malta assumed that crimes were being punished from heaven by the sovereign hand, as it were. Add Grotius, On the Truth of the Christian Religion, Bk. I, §§ 19–22; Bk. II, § 9. And in truth, since it is certainly the will 155 of God for those laws to be observed by men, and it appears that their natural effects are in part, at least, evaded by some, it is highly probable that God will punish their wickedness in some other way; especially since the remorse of conscience, and the loss of security, that is the lot of wicked men, do not always seem to equal the greatness of their offences. Add Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 25. But since such a priori reasoning does not seem to carry full proof, but only a high probability, and since such an arbitrary penalty presupposes a positive determination of the divine will, which can scarcely be apprehended without a definite revelation of God, and since an induction or proof from experience is as yet imperfect, we cannot avoid having to confess, that for those who follow the mere light of reason this question is still involved in obscurity.

22. Regarding the material of natural law, Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 10, observes that many things are commonly ascribed to natural law not properly, but reductively, in that natural law does not oppose them; just as not only the things which are owed by justice are called just, but also such as are not repugnant to justice, although you might more properly call them permitted. But you might apply this distinction more conveniently to those institutions which have been introduced on the persuasion of a will for peace and quiet, in accordance with a certain state of mankind, and to acts which are undertaken and accomplished in accordance with these institutions. For you may hear questions like the following discussed among lawyers; for example, whether the ownership of things, the acquisition of title by long use [usucapio], the drawing up of a will, buying and selling, fall under natural law. Such questions cannot be directly answered, unless you separate those things, which the law of nature disposes of by direct command or denial from those which a desire for sociable relations has persuaded men to institute, or the permission to undertake which has come directly from these institutions, so that they are said to belong reductively to the law of nature. Thus the ownership of things does not come directly from nature, nor can any express and determinate command be alleged for its introduction, yet it is said to spring from natural law, since the condition and peace of the multiplied human race could no longer tolerate their primitive community. In the same way there is no definitive command of natural law for the existence of usucapion, yet after distinct ownership of things came to be established, the peace of mankind favoured it, so that the ownership of property might not always be in question. Nature also commands no man to make a testament, to buy, or to sell, but, in the course of nature, it follows from antecedent ownership that a man on his death-bed may dispose of his property, or, again, that any one may by agreement sell his possessions or acquire those of another.

Grotius, in the same passage, further notes that things are sometimes improperly ascribed to natural law which reason declares are noble and better than their opposites, although they are not really owed. To this class belong many acts of such liberality as is unusual and surpasses the general average, acts of mercy and compassion, and occasions when a man yields his right under no constraint. Illustrations of such are given by the Apostle in 1 Corinthians, x. 23; vi. 12; vii. 38. So Ulpian writes in Digest, IV. vii. 4. 1.

However, the Praetor does not find fault with the behaviour of the man who shows this anxiety to be rid of property, where his object is to avoid being exposed to constant litigation about it—indeed such a [...] resolution, proceeding as it does from the party's hatred for actions at law, is not a thing to be censured. (M.)

an injury, considering it no more than if an ass had kicked him. So Cato, 'when he was struck in the face, did not fly into a rage, did not take vengeance, did not even pardon the injury, but denied that it had been done.' 'He thought it was better not to admit it than to avenge it.' [Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxxii; On the Steadfastness of the Wise Man, chap. xiv.]

23. There is, finally, one more question to be considered here, namely, whether there be a peculiar and positive law of nations, distinct from natural law; for on this point scholars are not entirely agreed. It is held by many that the law of nature and the law of nations are one and the same thing, differing only in their external denomination. Hence Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, §§ 4, 5, divides natural law 'into the natural law of men and the natural law of states, which is commonly called the law of nations. The injunctions of both', he adds, 'are the same; but because states, upon being constituted, take on the personal properties of men, the law, which we call natural when speaking of the duty of individual men, on being applied to whole states and nations or peoples, is called the law of nations.' To this statement we also fully subscribe. Nor do we feel that there is any other voluntary or positive law of nations which has the force of a law, properly so called, such as binds nations as if it proceeded from a superior. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 14; Bk. II, chap. iv, § 9. And so we do not, as a matter of fact, disagree with those who like to define the law of nature as that which is in conformity with rational nature, and the law of nations as that which proceeds from considerations of our requirements which are helped most of all by sociable attitude; for we deny the existence of any law of nations arising from a superior. And whatever is deducible from the requirements of human nature we refer to the natural law, since we are unwilling to deduce it from a conformity with rational nature, inasmuch as by such a procedure reason is set up as its own rule, and any demonstration of natural laws undertaken in this way is merely arguing in a circle. 156

Most of the matters which the Roman Jurisconsults and others refer to the law of nations, such as ways of acquiring things, contracts, and the like, belong either to the law of nature or to the civil law of different nations, which law amongst most nations agrees in such matters as do not otherwise depend on the universal reason that is common to all mankind. But no distinct branch of law can properly be constituted from these, since, indeed, those laws are common to nations, not because of any mutual agreement or obligation, but they agree accidentally, due to the individual pleasure of legislators in different states. Therefore, these laws can be and many times are changed by some people without consulting others. Nor is the view of Felden, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 20; Bk. II, chap. viii, § 1, to be lightly dismissed when he says that for the Roman Jurisconsults the law of nations is the right to actions and business belonging to aliens in the Roman state, while the civil law is that of citizens only, excluding aliens. So the making of wills and marriage was said to fall under the civil law, but contracts under the law of nations, because only citizens could enjoy the former, but also aliens at Rome the latter.

Among many writers there is also gathered under the term law of nations certain customs which amongst most nations, at least those that lay claim for themselves to some repute in more refined and human deeds, are observed by a certain tacit agreement, especially in warfare. For after it was considered a matter of great pride among the more advanced nations to secure glory in warfare, that is, to show in combat a man's superiority to other men, because he had the boldness and the skill to slay many men, and so unnecessary and unjust wars were frequently rushed into; therefore, in order to prevent great warriors from unduly exposing their skill to envy when they exercised the full licence of a just war, it seemed best to many peoples to restrain the excesses of wars by a form of humanity and magnanimity. This was the origin of customs about the exemption of certain things and persons from the violence of war, about the manner of injuring enemies, of treating captives, and the like. I question whether the custom was worth the profession of soldiers, which Machiavelli in his Princeps, chap. xii, says was introduced by Albericus Comensis e Flaminia,¹ and followed in Italy, in former centuries, in combats between mercenary cavalry, whereby 'their generals strove with all their power to remove all fear and exertion from themselves and their soldiers, taking care that 157 there should be no casualties, but that only captives might be taken on each side, and released these without ransom. No storm missiles were shot at night against cities which they were besieging, nor did the garrisons of the city shoot into their tents.² Furthermore, their camps were not surrounded by any wall or trench, nor used in winter. All this was a part of their military discipline and of institutions of their own making.' Strabo, Bk. X, tells of a similar agreement between the citizens of Eretria and Chalcis, whereby they would not use missile weapons. You may also class with such practices the customs of the Hindus, as described by Arrian, Indica [xi], whereby in time of civil war farmers were kept free from all harm.

Now although such customs seem to have an obligation arising from some sort of tacit agreement, still, if a man who is waging a legitimate war neglects them, and declares that he will not be bound by them, providing a course opposed to them is possible by the law of nature, he may be accused of no fault other than a kind of ungentlemanliness, in that he has not adapted himself to the number of those by whom war is considered one of the liberal arts. In the same way, among gladiators, he is accused of lack of skill who wounds another contrary to the rules of the art. Therefore, whoever wages just wars can neglect these observances, and conduct them by the mere law of nature, unless he prefers to observe them for some advantage to himself, in that he may find his enemy less cruel to him and his troops. But he who proceeds to violent and unjust wars follows, it may be, such observances carefully, so as to play the scoundrel with some appearance of right. Since, however, these reasons are not general, they cannot constitute any universal law and such as binds all people. Especially since it appears that any one can free himself from such obligations as rest only upon a tacit agreement, if he expressly declares that he is not willing to be bound by them, and that he will not complain should others also not observe them towards him. And so we see that many such observances have become obsolete in the course of time, or else an opposite custom has overpowered them. And there is no reason for any one to make complaints, as if this doctrine destroyed the safeguards of the security, interest, and safety of nations, since these surely lie not in such customs, but in the observance of the law of nature, which is much more sacred. If this latter be intact, mankind has no need whatsoever of the former. Furthermore, if any custom is based upon the natural law, without doubt far more is done to give it dignity than if its origin is based upon the simple agreement of nations.

Among the most important divisions of the voluntary law of nations Grotius numbers the law of embassies. On this point we feel that envoys, by the mere law of nature, are inviolable, provided they play the part of envoys and not of spies, even among enemies, so long as they form no hostile designs against him to whom they have been sent; although perchance, in the ordinary manner, they seek through negotiations the advantage of their master rather than that of another. For since such persons are necessary, in order to negotiate, preserve, and strengthen by treaties and agreements that peace which the law of nature itself commands men to embrace by all honourable means, surely it is agreed that the same law has provided for the security of the individuals without whom the end ordained by it cannot be secured. Add Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. II, chap. xiii. To this right there is added the one, that in those matters with which the duty of ambassadors is concerned they are free from the jurisdiction and control of him to whom they are dispatched, for, were this not so, they would have no power to serve the interest of their master with fitting zeal, if on this point they had to render an account to any other than their master. But the other privileges commonly allowed ambassadors, and especially those who reside at some court, more to seek out the secrets of another state than for the sake of 158 peace, depend entirely upon the indulgence of the prince to whom they are sent, and so they can be denied them, if it seems advisable, without violation of any law, provided the prince is willing to see his own envoys treated in the same way.

Also the right of burial, which Grotius appears to make likewise a special chapter of the law of nations, can be referred to the obligations of humanity. Add Antonius Matthæus, De Criminibus, Prolegomena, chap. iii, § 5.

Nor are his other instances of such importance that they should form a special field of law, since they can very easily find place in the system of natural law. But it seems to us quite incongruous for some to refer to the law of nations special agreements of two or more peoples, usually defined by leagues and agreements of peace. For although the natural law about the keeping of faith orders that such agreements be maintained, they still do not properly fall under the term of laws.
 Furthermore they are practically infinite in number and for the most part temporary. They no more form a part of law than do agreements between individual citizens belong to the body of their civil law; but they are rather the subjects which history claims for her own. Add also Selden, Mare Clausum, Bk. I, chap. ii. On unwritten law or custom see especially Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 5.

24. In our opinion that division of natural law seems to be the best, wherein it is considered how, on the command of natural law, a man should conduct himself, in the first place, toward himself, and, in the second place, toward other men. The commands of natural law, as they concern other men, can be further divided into absolute and hypothetical. The former are those which obligate all men, in whatever state they be, and without regard for any institution formed or introduced by men. The latter presuppose some state or institution formed or accepted by men. This has been stated by Grotius, loc. cit., as follows: 'The natural law is concerned not only with things which exist apart from relation to the will of man, but also with many things which attend an act of his will.' Hence, although the will of man has set up the ownership of things as it now stands, yet now that it is established, the natural law itself declares that it is illegal to take another's property, if he be unwilling. See Digest, XLVII. ii. 1, § 3; L. xvi. 42. Now there are many things which are arbitrary as touching¹ the exercise of the act, or, in other words, it lies within the judgement of men, whether or not they care to undertake a certain action; but, when the action has been undertaken, a moral necessity or obligation from some precept of the law of nature follows it, or else its mode and circumstances are determined thereby. For example, although the law of nature does not command me to buy from another, yet, granted that I buy of my own choice, the same law commands me not to seek my gain at the loss of another, nor to defraud him in some bargain. Thus there are a great number of precepts of natural law which have no reason or any ground for existing, unless there are posited the separate possession of property and civil authority.

But this does not mean that all positive laws are also part of the natural law, because by our own consent we put ourselves under the direction of another whose commands the law of nature bids us to obey. It is, indeed, certain, that violators of civil laws mediately sin against the very law of nature by reason of such an agreement. Yet there is this great distinction abiding between hypothetical natural laws and positive civil laws, namely, that the reason for the former is sought from the condition of mankind as a whole, while the reason for the latter is taken from what appears to be of advantage for some certain state, or from the mere will of the legislator. And so positive civil laws are not hypothetical precepts of the natural law, but they borrow their power to obligate in a court of law, from a hypothetical precept.

Now we feel that the three most important of those institutions upon which hypothetical precepts rest are speech, the possession of things and their price, and human sovereignty; and hereafter our discussion will be based on such a division.

ALTHOUGH man has this in common with other animals, that he is interested in his self-preservation, and is naturally glad to be in as good condition as possible, yet this interest should be far more refined and of a higher type than that which beasts observe, not merely because he has received far more endowments than they, which permit a high and productive culture, but also because the duties to which he is bound cannot be fittingly observed unless he quickens his native endowment by education, and renders it fitted for worthy conduct. Another reason is because the labour which a man undertakes in developing himself does not end in himself, but spreads abroad its fruit to the widest benefit to all mankind, and the more outstanding a person is for his own advantage the more noble and worthy a citizen he is considered of this world. Therefore, as man studies to fulfil the laws of that sociableness, for which his Creator intended him, he should properly give his first attention to himself, since he will fulfil his duties towards others more satisfactorily as he exercises himself with greater care for his own perfecting. And from him who is of no use and a sluggard in his own concerns others can expect no advantage.

But this regard for oneself is as difficult as it is necessary, not only because men come into the world entirely ignorant of all things, and their still immature minds can easily be filled with evil thoughts which you may afterwards remove only with difficulty, but also because man's innate evil desires draw him, now with greater and now with less violence, away from the dictates of right reason, and unless they are restrained, they produce throughout his entire life a flood of evil actions.

This always holds true, for the old complaint in Euripides is of no avail, Suppliants [1080 ff.]:

Ah me, why is not this to men vouchsafed,
Twice to see youth, and twice withal old age?
Now in our homes, if aught shall fall out ill,
By wisdom's second thoughts this we amend.
Our life we may not. Might we but be young
And old twice o'er, if any man should err,
We would amend us in that second life. (W.)

Now since man consists of two parts, soul and body, of which the former is the source and inspiration of a man's own actions, and the latter serves as their instrument, the care and cultivation of the former lays proper claim to our first consideration.

2. The cultivation of the mind, which all men are constrained to undertake, and which is necessary to the complete fulfilment of the duty of man, consists primarily in the following: That his conclusions on matters which concern his duty be rightly reached, that his judgement and opinion of matters which commonly arouse his appetite be properly formed, and that the impulses of his mind be regulated and governed by the rule of right reason.

3. Now among the opinions which all men should make a part of themselves, the first is that which concerns God as the Creator and Governor of this universe: That there exists in fact a supreme Being from whom all other things derive their origin and the principle of their motion, not as from some inanimate power, as, for instance, the weight moves a clock, but from what is endowed with intelligence and liberty; and that this Being exercises His control over the entire universe, over mankind, and even over individual men; whose eye nothing escapes; by whom in His sovereign right through the natural law certain duties are laid upon men, the observance of which is approved by Him and their violation and neglect frowned upon; and that He will for this reason demand from every one a reckoning without favour and without regard of persons.

Now as the first duty of man, which we have treated more fully elsewhere [De Officio Hominis et Civis, I. iv], and have not felt it necessary to repeat in this connexion, is concerned with this belief, so it is the source of that calmness which suffuses from within the minds of men, and is furthermore the guarantee of all uprightness which should be shown towards other men, and without which no one can be said to have done a good deed with proper intent, nor can others be convinced of any one's good purpose. Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy [V. vi]: 'There is a great necessity of doing well imposed upon you, since you live in the sight of your Judge, who beholdeth all things.' (R.) Grotius, Commentary on the Book of Wisdom, chap. xii, § 1:

Although people speak grandly of how good repute should be cultivated for its own sake, yet so great is the force upon the mind of the things we see, that without a belief in a divine providence that visits the deeds of men with retribution, and without laws as well to direct men in the right way, men cannot avoid wandering into devious and evil ways. For as the reason of men is inconstant when the passions are aroused and appealed to by alluring behaviour, it easily finds an excuse for its evil designs, and refuses to heed its own calling, until it becomes deaf to all appeals. Those men, therefore, are considered foolish who have no careful regard for the belief in God and His providence, but allow every man his own opinion on this point, the most pernicious thing to be found, not only, I maintain, to good morals, but to the state as well.

Now although it does not appear from the decrees of the Christian religion that God can be so appeased by men with any kind of worship, that He is willing to favour them with His grace and grant them eternal happiness, which effect only follows that worship which He himself has in a special way ordained for the human race, yet a serious belief of any nature in the Divine Being and His providence, under whatsoever particular form or manner of worship, has the effect of rendering men more observant of their duty. Lucian, De [Pro] Imaginibus [xvii]: 'Those who worship the Deity most sincerely are very apt to be most upright in their dealings also with men.' The proof of this is the fact that there have existed in the past, and are now to be 161 found, men addicted to a religion which is harmful to the welfare of their souls, such as the Mohammedan, or pagan, who, because of their belief in a divine providence, show an active concern for decency and duty so that, so far at least as their outward acts are concerned, they do not seem to fall behind the majority of Christians. There are, indeed, some who after long travels claim to have observed that the Christian religion has not affected the particular inclinations of peoples towards certain vices, and that the truth of this religion cannot be discovered from the outward manners and acts of its professors. But the reason for this I judge to lie in the fact, that most men embrace the Christian religion from no personal conviction so much as from the custom and usage of the state in which they were born, and so for the most of them it lies rather on their lips than in their mind, while but few take it to their heart to improve their character according to its direction. For I have no doubt that they could restrain at least the external acts of their, as it were, national vices, if they seriously endeavoured to conduct themselves in a manner worthy of their profession.

4. As, therefore, this belief and whatever else reason or a particular revelation teach regarding the worship of God, should be implanted before all else in a properly educated mind, so all ideas contrary to it should be carefully excluded. By such we understand not merely Atheism and Epicureanism, but not a few other beliefs as well, which are destructive to true religion, good morals, and human society, and which it is to the highest interest of the human race thoroughly to root out. Among these is that doctrine of the Stoic Fate, or of the unchangeable sequence of all things and actions, even those of men, whereby men are made the mere instruments of their actions, which it is not in their power to change at their will, however much they may wish to try. For if this opinion stands, it is not apparent why a man's actions can be imputed to him rather than the motions of a clock be imputed to its wheels; or what use religion has, or justice, laws, and penalties. Seneca, Oedipus [1019]:

What thou deplorest is the fault of fate.

A fated crime can leave no stain of sin. (M.)

Add ibid., lines 980 ff., Homer, Iliad, Bk. XIX[86-7]: 'But it is not I who am the cause, but Zeus and Destiny and Erinys that walketh in darkness.' (L.) This tenet was rather evaded than maintained by Zeno, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VII [23]: 'He was once scourging a slave whom he had detected in theft; and when he said to him, "It was fated that I should steal"; he rejoined, "Yes, and that you should be beaten."' (Y.) The words of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius] are more to the point, Bk. II, chap. xi: 'And the Gods have put it wholly in man's power not to fall into evils that are truly such.' (H.)

A belief similar to this is that the sequence of cause and effect, or that kind of chain of things constituted by the Creator, has so unchangeable a law governing it that God has not reserved for Himself any liberty regarding it, even in particular instances. In this way miracles and special aid from God, as well as effects from prayers, repentance, and reformation, are apparently done away with.

To the same frame of mind belongs also that very ancient as well as general belief that the relation of the stars lays some unavoidable necessity upon human actions and events, or that the hour of birth governs the whole course of one's life. Manilius, among others, poses as an advocate of this in the following lines, Bk. IV [79 ff.]:

One mad in love to Troy will carry war,

Or swim the flood and view the torch from far;

The other is determined to the bar.

A son his father, father kills the son;

On mutual wounds two brothers headlong run.

Those combats prove the force of ruling powers,

For they are too unnatural to be ours. (C.)

And this false view is still held throughout a large part of the 162 Orient, where nothing of any importance is undertaken without first consulting astrologers, 'That they may read', as the phrase runs, 'what has been written in heaven.' An amusing story along this line is told by Bernier, in his account of life in the Mogul Empire, about a gardener of Abbas, king of the Persians, who dug up some trees that had been planted by the king, on the advice of an astrologer, at the most auspicious hour. Upon being threatened by the king he turned to the astrologer and said: 'You chose a bad hour, because trees planted at noon are dug up in the evening.' He gives another story of a runaway slave from Goa who, with great assurance, was foretelling many events to the people of the city of Delhi, every now and then looking at a mariner's compass and his book of the Hours, as they call it, as if at the most noble instruments. And when some who had known him expressed surprise at his new occupation and equipment, he replied, 'For such beasts such an astrologer.'

But such astrology is in fact nothing other than a specious device of certain cheats to mulct the credulous of their money. In speaking so boldly about the future, they rely more on the credulity of others than on their own skill; and if things fall out as they have foretold, they are held in great esteem, while if they turn out otherwise, their predictions are forgotten. Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I [xxii], calls such pseudo-mathematicians 'men dangerous to princes, and a fallacious reliance to aspiring subjects'. (O.) Add Hobbes, De Homine, chap. xiv, § 12. Agathias, Bk. I [i]:

I do not believe that the cause of evils is the course of the stars, and destiny, and unreasonable necessities. [. . .] For if fate should prevail in all things, the element of moral choice and of free will would be taken from us, we should have to regard all admonition, art, and instruction as empty and useless, and the hopes of those men who have lived the most upright lives would pass vainly and fruitlessly away. Nay more, in my opinion it is not seemly to regard God as the author of murders and conflicts.

See also Grotius, On the Truth of the Christian Religion, Bk. IV, § 11. Moreover, in addition to the other ills which attend this belief, it has the further consequence that those who gape so much at the stars are too little concerned with suiting their actions to the norm of sane reason. True is the saying of Euripides, Helena [757]:

Sound wit with prudence is the seer of seers. (W.)

Statius, Thebaid [II. 582 ff.]:

Those only, who have forfeited his love,
Explore the counsel of almighty Jove.
Hence falsehood, discontent, and impious rage,
Hence every vice that stains the present age. (L.)

Pernicious also is the belief that God holds a kind of market for the sins of men, and allows them to be redeemed with money and other presents, as well as with some empty mummary or set forms of speech, without any change of life. Likewise the idea that God is pleased with such inventions of men and artificial institutions of life, which do not accord with human and civil society as it is adapted to the command of sane reason and natural law. Here belong most of the institutions of monasticism, found in such numbers not only among certain Christian sects but also among Mohammedans and pagans. Likewise any superstition which has a low regard for God and His worship, since every sensible man should, on the contrary, be 'God-fearing and yet not given to superstition.' (H.) Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. VI, § 30. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xviii.

Evil also is the belief that it is enough for a man merely to show a piety toward God, without any regard for the exercise of probity and one's duties toward men, or that displays of piety, and the careful observance of the formalities of God's worship, can make amends for a life of injustice toward men; and that it is proper, throughout one's entire life, to scrape together money by good or bad devices, provided that a man upon his death-bed leave something for so-called pious causes. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. v, § 25 ff.

Perverted also is the belief that a mere man is able not simply to fulfil his own duty towards God, but also to store up for himself some added virtue which he may transfer to others, so that a deficiency from some neglected duty can be, as it were, made good by another's merit.¹ Nor is the belief any better that, because of the satisfaction and merit of Christ, men are any less obligated to cultivate uprightness and purity of conduct, or that trust in Him gives one security in sinning. For when a man is persuaded that his sins are forgiven him through the merit of another, he can scarcely avoid slipping into the loosest licence, unless he is also persuaded that he is under a personal obligation to give every attention to a holy life.

It is no less pernicious than brutal to hold that the Divinity smiles at the adroitness and abandon of certain crimes, and regards some sins as but jests. Thus the old poets spread the nonsense that the gods overlooked the perjuries of lovers and ignored their furtive acts. Tibullus, Bk. III [vi. 49-50]: 'Jupiter laughs at false oaths of lovers, and bids the winds carry them off without fulfilment.' (P.) Their madness went to such bounds that they did not shrink from asserting that such deeds were practised by the gods themselves, and they set up certain gods as patrons of such offences. So Fulgentius quite properly says, Mythology, Bk. I [xviii]: 'If there were gods' (Mercury and Laverna) 'who presided over theft, there were no use of having a judge to punish crimes, because the thieves had a deity as author and patron of their guilt.'

Seneca, Hippolytus [195 ff.]:

The gods! 'Tis vicious lust
That hath his godhead framed; and, that its end
More fully may be gained, it has assigned
To its unbridled love the specious name,
Divinity! (M.)

Euripides, Ion [449 ff.]:

Unjust it were
To call men vile, if we but imitate
The sins of gods: they are vile which teach us this. (W.)

Nor was the reasoning so bad of the Indian who replied to a Spaniard, when he was boasting that he was a Christian and the son of God, the creator of heaven and earth, and that he had come to proclaim His law: 'If your God commands you to invade in this way the lands of others, spoiling, burning, killing, and committing every outrage of which you can conceive, know that we will never believe in that God or accept His law.' Geronimo Benzoni, History of the New World, Bk. II, chap. xiii.

It is also wrong to believe that God is pleased with the prayers which a man pours forth, to the effect that other men may suffer an undeserved evil wherein he may find some chance for profit. For instance, if those who dwell along the coast should pray that many shipwrecks occur at that place. Nor should I judge that those supplications are any more holy that are raised when a man wages an unjust war upon another, or when success in such a war smiles upon him.

Base also is the view that it is allowable in religion and the worship of God to break any command of the natural law to another's hurt. Instances of this are when some men believe that they should maintain an active hatred towards those who do not belong to our religion; that religion should be spread¹ by the sword; that faith should not be kept with men of a different belief, and no so-called political friendship or acts of humanity should be shown them; or that every contact with such should be avoided as if they were unclean; that any crimes, treachery, perfidy, treason, rebellion, are lawful, nay, even praiseworthy, if they are done in the interest of religion.

Baneful also is the belief that it makes no difference for real happiness whether a man cultivates virtue, or abandons himself to vice, and that no better state awaits the just than the unjust. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. III [xxxv]: 'Surely there is no Divine Providence regulating the world if there is no distinction between the honest and the wicked.' Likewise, that man has nothing better to look forward to than the present enjoyment of the senses, and that souls of men perish together with their bodies. Also, that all law, even that called natural, is but a device of man, and that it cannot be referred 164 to God as its author, nor secure from Him any authority or sanction. Therefore, these and similar opinions are certainly to be eradicated, since they undermine the duty of man towards God and prevent any firm endeavour to conform conduct to sane reason.

5. The next prime concern of a man in his self-development is carefully to examine and become acquainted with himself and his nature. Antiquity made so much of this inquiry as if it opened the way to true wisdom, that the words 'Know thyself' were set up in gold letters on the temple of Delphi. On this motto Cicero remarks, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. I [xxii]:

The precept of Apollo, which advises every one to know himself, I do not apprehend to have been, that we should understand our members, our stature, and form; for we are not merely bodies. When, therefore, he says, 'Know thyself,' he says this, 'Inform yourself of the nature of your soul'; for the body is but a kind of vessel, or receptacle of the soul, and whatever your soul does is your own act. (Y.)

Add what Casaubon has written in his commentary on Persius, Satires, iii, line 67.

Now from this knowledge of himself, when properly secured, a man is led on to a knowledge of his condition, and the task the performance of which has been laid upon him in this world in that he observes that he did not come into being from himself, but that he owes his origin to a more sublime cause; that he has been endowed with more noble faculties than he observes in the animal world about him; and, finally, that he was born not for himself, but as a part of mankind, towards whom he is obliged to bear himself in a sociable manner. From these fountains, as it were, there is easily drawn the knowledge of man's duty. See Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. X, § 6; Persius, Satires, iii [133 f.]:

What heaven would have us be, and where to stand,
In this Great Whole, is fixed by high command. (G.)

It is also a part of this self-knowledge that whoever knows what his strength is, and how far it may reach, knows also how to extend his actions, as well as what further undertakings he should attempt. With this is connected the explanation of that noble utterance of Socrates, in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. IV [ii. 24]. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xxxvi. A corollary of this is that one should know the effects of every human action, and what relation and use the things outside of man have for man himself.

6. Now it follows from this knowledge that man will recognize that he is subjected to the sovereignty of God, and that in return for the gifts granted him, he is under obligation both to publish abroad the majesty of God, and to show himself sociable towards other men. And since he has been endowed by God with the light of intelligence, he should certainly conclude that he should not do everything on blind impulse, or without a definite goal, but that whatever he undertakes should be first carefully weighed and planned. It follows, then, that he will propose for himself a goal suited to his nature, and then properly fit his actions as well as other means to that goal. And this in such a way that he will not proceed to the use of means before he has decided upon the end, nor will he set an end for the attainment of which no means are available. Connected with the foregoing is the thought that, since truth and right are always uniform, one should so shape his judgement that he will always reach similar conclusions on similar matters, and when once he has reached a right decision, that he will always abide by it. Furthermore, that the will and desire do not precede, but follow, a right judgement, and do not resist its decisions. For he who takes this course will act both with wisdom and with constancy and with moderation. Such a man did Lucan, Bk. II [381 ff.], make his Cato: 'To observe moderation, and to adhere to his end; to follow the guidance of nature, and to lay down his life for his country; and not to believe himself born for himself, but for the whole world.' (R.) He who acts otherwise does not move with a steady tread, but is tossed this side and that through this world, and 'is ever at odds with the ordered way of life' [Horace, Epistles, I. i. 99]; nor will he ever attain happiness. For as Sophocles says, Antigone [1348]:

Of happiness the chiefest part
Is a wise heart. (S.)

- 165 7. If a man knows his strength and his power, he will recognize that it is finite and has set limits beyond which it may not go, and that, therefore, there are a multitude of things in this universe which he can by no possible means control or oppose. Some things, however, are not absolutely beyond the power of man, but can be prevented by the interplay and opposition of other powers. A final class only yields to our power, if it is aided by dexterity. These classes agree with the well-known distinction of the Stoic philosophy, according to which some things are said to be ἐφ' ἡμῶν, or in our power, and others, οὐκ ἐφ' ἡμῶν, [not in our power].

What seems to be most of all under our control is our free will and its power, in so far as it is exerted in eliciting actions proper to a man. For although inclinations towards stubbornness surround the will, such as tend to move it from its balance, yet there is nothing closer than it to a man, or more a part of him, or less open to hindrance from external powers, nothing the motions of which belong to a man, and can be more imputed to him. Hence it should be every man's special care to employ his faculties and strength with all diligence, and in accordance with the command of sane reason; that, at least, he have a firm and continued resolution to do, so far as in him lies, what is appropriate to his end and duty. This last is the measure whereby every man must be weighed, and his intrinsic worth and probity measured. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. i: 'What follows? We must make the best of those things that are in our power, and take the rest as nature gives it.' (M.)

8. With regard to the other matters which lie outside us, a man will exert himself about them in so far as they are not beyond our strength, and lead towards an end which is proper for him, and if the things on which labour is being expended are worthy. Things that are beyond our strength he will not strive after with idle hope and vain effort, and he will deem it folly to pursue with all his might an object which he knows he cannot secure with only the means which he may rightfully expect, unless it is at least certain that the probable hope of attaining his object is of more value than any effect which he may be able to produce at the same time with his own labour. He will commit all things else to the divine providence, and will steel his mind to receive them, so far as possible, with resignation; he will not disturb himself because of misfortunes which have already happened, or may come to pass, through no fault of his; and so he will avoid in advance a large part of the evils which a vain hope, that drives one on to improper undertakings, or grief, or wrath, or fear, are wont to engender. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. vii: 'Is anything better than what seems good to God?' (M.) Libanius, Declamations, xxi [x, p. 535 c]: 'A good and worthy man is judged by his intent and his moral purpose; and even if the final result does not correspond with the measures which he has taken, he is none the less a worthy man.'

From what has been said it follows that in so far as a man is guided by the mere light of reason he should not in this world create for himself and take as his goal any other happiness than that which comes from the prudent direction of his faculties and from those aids which we know the Divine Providence in His administration of this world will offer us. But a second consideration from the foregoing is that, just as nothing should be committed to blind chance, when there is opportunity for human foresight, so, if we have done all in our power, we cannot be responsible for an event which is otherwise unforeseen 166 by us, and does not depend upon our direction. For as all wise men should lay to heart the remark of Iphicrates, given by Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. III [ix. 17], that 'It is not the part of a general to say "I did not think so"'; so the poet has well said: 'Let him come to naught, I pray, who thinks the deed should be condemned from its result.' (S.) [Ovid, Heroides, II. 85 f.]. Yet it is said that this belief is prevalent among the Mohammedans, so that they think success is a sure proof of a just cause and a kind of vote by heaven, by which that cause is approved. But this position is by others more properly classed among the foolish claims of the untutored. For, as Juvenal says, Satires, xiii. [104-5]: 'Many commit the same crimes with results widely different. One man receives crucifixion as a reward of his villainy; another, a regal crown.' (E.)

This further thought naturally follows: That just as a wise man should not merely see what lies immediately before his feet, but also foresee what future events will bring forth,¹ and with all his strength persist in a decision which he has properly reached, and allow himself to be shaken from it neither by fear nor by the enticements of an immediate pleasure, so it is characteristic of a fool to struggle against the stream, and not rather to accommodate himself to things, in so far as they are unwilling to accommodate themselves to him. Martial [De Spectaculis, xxxi. 1]: 'To yield to the stronger is valour's second prize.' (K.)

And finally, inasmuch as human foresight is quite blind when coming events are concerned, and therefore it is not within the power of man to control them, though they often fall out better than our hope—Tryphiodorus¹ [310-11] calls them 'the shadowy mist of things to come'—too great security should not be felt in present conditions nor should future events be anticipated with undue anxiety and worry. But for the same reason insolence in prosperity and despair in adversity should be carefully avoided.

It would be easy to illustrate all of this with numberless sayings from men of learning. It may suffice merely to scatter, as it were, a few flowers from their garlands. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. i: 'Be confident in all that lies beyond the will's control, be cautious in all that is dependent on the will.' (M.) Plutarch, On Superstition [viii, p. 169 c]: 'God is the hope of virtue, not the pretext of cowardice.'² Juvenal, Satires, x [365]: 'No divinity is lacking, if Prudence be present.'³ Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode iv [65]: 'Brute force bereft of wisdom falls to ruin by its own weight. Power which counsel tempered, even the gods make greater.' (B.) Lucretius, Bk. III [1000 ff.]: 'For to seek a power, which is but in name, and is never truly given, and for that to endure for ever grinding toil, this is to thrust up hill with great effort a stone, which after all rolls back from the topmost peak, and headlong makes for the levels of the plain beneath.' (B.) Horace, Odes, Bk. II, ode ... Remember, when life's path is steep, to keep an even⁴ mind, and likewise, in prosperity, a spirit restrained from overweening joy.' (B.) Idem, Bk. II, ode⁵ x [21]: 'In time of stress show thyself bold and valiant! Yet wisely reef thy sails when they are swollen by too fair a breeze!' (B.) Idem, Bk. III, ode xxix [41 ff.]: 'Master of himself and joyful will that man live who day by day can say: "I have lived to-day; to-morrow let the Father fill the heaven with murky clouds, or radiant sunshine!"' (B.) Idem, Satires, Bk. II, Sat. vii [83 ff.]:

Who then is free? The wise man alone, who is a stern master to himself, whom neither poverty nor death nor bonds affright, who has the courage to say 'no' again and again to desires, to despise the objects of ambition, who is a whole in himself, smoothed and rounded, with the surface on which nothing from outside can find lodgement. (W.)

Juvenal, Satires, xiii [20 ff.]: 'Yet we deem those happy too, who, with daily life for their instructress, have learned to endure with patience the inconveniences of life, and not shake off the yoke.' (E.) Idem, Satires, x [347 f.]: 'If you will take advice, you will allow the deities themselves to determine what may be expedient for us, and suitable to our condition. For instead of pleasant things, the gods will give us all that is most fitting. Man is dearer to them than to himself.' (E.)

9. The most necessary part of education is that in which a person learns how to set a proper value on the things which especially attract the desire of man. For upon this depends the question of how much one should concern himself about each one of them. Now that which is considered the most eminent among these, and is fitted to attract 167 in a special way men of more noble mould, is a reputation for worth and excellence from which are born honour and fame. Regarding this the mind should be so shaped that it will endeavour in every way to procure a simple¹ esteem, or the reputation of being a good man; and this results as a rule from an observance of the natural law and its duty, while a disregard of it can furnish occasion for many ills to us. And if it be assaulted by the calumnies and lies of base men, care should be taken to have its former brilliance restored. But when it is not within our power to repulse calumnies and false opinions about us, the rectitude of our conscience will be our solace, and the fact that our innocence is established in the sight of God. Add Antoine le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae, Pt. VIII, art. x, p. 420.

Now intensive esteem, such as honour and fame, should be sought, in so far as it results from deeds worthy, agreeable with reason, and looking to the good of human society, and as it opens the way to the performance of such. But no matter how much of this comes even from worthy reasons, we must be careful to keep the mind from swelling with pride and insolence. Pliny, Panegyrics [lxxi. 4]: 'He who has reached the highest exaltation has but one way in which yet further to increase; and that is for him, in the full confidence of his greatness, voluntarily to yield place to others.' And regard as one of the greatest follies the desire to plume one self on something that is empty and forms no solid argument for our worth. Thus, for instance, Lucian tells us, Demonax [xli], how, when Demonax once saw a man puffed up because of the width of the purple stripe which he was wearing, he put his head up to the other's ear and fingering the garment said: 'Look you, a sheep used to wear this before ever you did, and was but a sheep at that.' But when there is no opportunity for us to show our worth, and it is not in our power to offer such, we should not be disturbed, since there is no reason in this for our being criticized. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode² ii [18 ff.]: 'True worth, that never knows ignoble defeat, shines with undimmed glory, nor takes up nor lays aside the axes at the fickle mob's behest.' (B.) Claudian, De cons. Mallii [Panegyricus Dictus Manlio Theodoro Consuli, 1 ff.]:

Virtue is its own reward; alone, with its far-flung splendour, it mocks at Fortune; no honours raise it higher nor does it seek glory from the mob's applause. External wealth cannot arouse its desires, it asks no praise but makes its boast of self-contained riches, and unmoved by all chances it looks down upon the world from a lofty citadel. (P.)

On the other hand, it is clearly foolish and wicked to affect the insignia of honour when its intrinsic fundamentals are lacking, and a mad and abhorrent thing to struggle to secure fame and position by evil designs and deeds repugnant to reason, or to wish to surpass others so that you can insult them and have them as objects for your wantonness. And since it is not always within our power to make¹ our fortune as we will, in so far as it depends on extrinsic causes, a man should so dispose his soul that, when it has done what lay within its strength, it may accept the lot that falls to it, and may look without vexation upon the things which it could not control, as if they were none of its concern. Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. ii, § 1, ext. Seneca, Agamemnon [102 ff.]:

The meanest things in longest fortune live.
Then happy he whose modest soul
In safety seeks a nearer goal;
Fearing to leave the friendly shore,
He rows with unambitious oar,
Content in low security to thrive. (M.)

Idem, Hercules Oetaeus [691 ff.]:

So are great fortunes joined To mighty ills.
Let others then as fortunate
And great be hailed; I wish no share
Of popular renown. My boat
Is frail and needs must hug the shore.
And let no strong wind force my bark
Far out to sea; for fortune spares
Safe-harboured boats, but seeks the ships
In mid sea, proudly sailing on,
Their topsails in the clouds. (M.)

Add Idem, Oedipus, lines 882 ff.

10. A man for his preservation has need of external things, the procurement of which often belongs to the duties of others as well. And 168 so it is a reasonable thing to give attention to securing them, so far as is compatible with one's strength, opportunity, and honesty. Vergil's ant, providing for the need of its old age, Georgics, Bk. I [186], is commended also in Holy Writ among the illustrations of innocent industry. Proverbs, vi. 6. Euripides, Electra [80-1]:

None idle—though his lips aye prate of gods—
Can gather without toil a livelihood. (W.)

But since our needs are not infinite, but extremely moderate, the desire of such things should be limited to the measure and frugality of nature. Proverbs, xiii. 7. It is told, in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. II [25], that when Socrates used to see many objects for sale, he would say to himself, 'How many things there are that I have no need of!' Juvenal, Satires, v [6]: 'Nothing is more easily satisfied than the cravings of nature.' (E.) Idem, Satires, xiv [316 ff.]: 'Yet if any one were to consult me what proportion of income is sufficient, I will tell you. Just as much as thirst and hunger and cold require.' (E.) Apuleius, Apologia [19]:

I approve of wealth on the same principles that I do a garment, rather when it suits the person, than when it is remarkable for its length. [. . .] Indeed, in all matters which are needed for the requirements of life, everything that steps beyond becoming moderation is superfluous, and is rather a burden to us than useful. Hence it is that immoderate wealth, just like a large and disproportioned rudder, is more apt to sink than to guide, for in such a case people have a useless abundance, a pernicious superfluity. (A.*)

Lucan, Bk. IV [381]: 'Learn with how little we have the power to prolong life, and how much it is that nature demands. Enough for the people is the stream and bread.' (R.) Lucretius, Bk. V [1117]: 'But if a man would steer his life by true reasoning, it is great riches to a man to live thriftily with calm mind.' (B.) Claudian, Against Rufinus, I [215-16]: 'A frugal life is best. Nature has given the opportunity of happiness to all, knew they but how to use it.' (P.) Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode xvi [39 ff.]:

By narrowing my desires I shall better enlarge my scanty revenues than were I to make the realm of Alyattes continuous with the Mygdonian plains. To those who seek for much, much is ever lacking; blest is he to whom the god with chary hand has given just enough. (B.)

Idem, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. x [32]: 'Under a humble roof you may live a far happier life than kings and kings' friends.' (W.) Idem, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. xii [4]: 'For he is not poor who has the full use of property.' (W.) Quintilian, Declamations, xiii: 'To want nothing more is wealth enough.' Turpilius in Priscian [De Metris Terentii, 16]: 'Assuredly, the very least a man was content with, the very happiest was the life which he led.' And so the reins on our desire for possessions should not be held too loose; and much less should we hasten to seek wealth by base means, and to the injury of others. Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. i [92 ff.]: 'The sum of my answer is, let us end our money-getting somewhere. As what you have increases, let your fears of poverty diminish; begin to bring your toil to a finish when you have gained that which you desired.' (W.) Eumenius [Incerti¹], Panegyric [xv]: 'No gifts of fortune can satisfy those whose desires are not limited by reason, and thus happiness glides past them without bringing joy, while ever full of hopes, yet destitute of comforts, they lose the present and look to the future.' Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxi.

Furthermore, what has been secured should not be regarded as anything but helps for our need and means for deserving well of others. On no account should the mind be solely concerned or satisfied with the mere possession and care of property, and the infinite concern of accumulating it. Juvenal, Satires, xiv [136-7]: 'It is palpable insanity to live a beggar's life, simply that you may die rich.' (E.) There is excellent commendation of the wise man in Statius, Silvae, Bk. II [ii. 150-3]: 'Thy riches are not hoarded and stifled in miserly chests; thy heart is not tortured for loss of greedy gain. Frank and open is thy abundance, moderate thy desires, and no strangers to joy.' (S.) Hippodamus, De Felicitate [frag. 1, Mullach]: 'It is not enough to possess the good, but one ought also to enjoy it.' Add Theocritus, Idylls, xvi. Horace, Epodes, ii [i. 33-4]: 'I will not lay up treasure, either to bury in the ground, like miser Chremes, or to squander like some reckless spend-thrift,' (B.) Idem, Odes, Bk. IV, ode ix [45 f.]: 'Not him who possesses much would one rightly call the happy man; he more fitly gains that name who knows how to use with wisdom the blessings of the gods.' 169 (B.) Idem, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. ii [56]: 'The covetous is a beggar always. Try to find a definite limit to your wishing. When a man has enough he should wish for no more.' (W.) Idem, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. ii [190 ff.]: 'I shall use and take from my modest heap as much as need requires, nor shall I fear what an heir may think of me because he does not find more than I leave him.' (W.) Add Gellius, Bk. X, chap. xvii.

It must also be borne in mind that nature does not cease to produce lavishly what serves the need of man. Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. xxiv: 'No man is an orphan, but all men have always the Father who cares for them continuously.' (M.) Note also that the things laid up for future use are liable to such a variety of accidents; and the protection of them calls for a concern as great as the labour attending their acquisition. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode xvi [17]: 'As money grows care follows after.' (B.)

And, finally, remember that at our death everything which has survived us must always be left to an unworthy or smiling heir. Bion, Idyl. iii¹ [7]: 'How long shall we go thus miserably toiling and moiling, and how long shall we lavish our life upon getting and making, in the consuming desire for more wealth and yet more? Is it that we all forget that we are mortal?' (E.) As, therefore, no opportunity of honestly securing wealth should be neglected when it offers itself, so the mind should be trained in such a way that, if it so chance, the loss of one's wealth will not entail the collapse of one's courage. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode xxix [53 ff.]: 'I praise Fortune while she stays; but if she shakes her wings for flight, I renounce her gifts, enwrap me in my virtue, and woo honest Poverty, undowered though she be.' (B.) Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix, n. 11, § 9.

On the other hand, touching the disposal of wealth, the mind should be so tempered that it will give out gladly what it is the command of duty to pay, and not lavish it beyond what is necessary and reasonable. Horace, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. ii [195-6]: 'For difference there is whether you scatter your substance lavishly or neither grudge any expense nor be anxious to add to your store.' (W.) Juvenal, Satires, xi [37-8]: 'Do not long for a mullet,¹ when you have only a gudgeon in your purse. For what end awaits you, as your purse fails and your gluttony increases?' (E.) It is equal folly not to be willing to devote money to the end for which it has been created, and recklessly to pour out what was owed to better use; especially since the former carries with it many a transgression of one's duty, while the latter paves the way to many vices and injuries, such as debt, disgraceful poverty, rapine, deceit, and theft. Catullus [Poems, xxvi]: 'My little farm stands exposed not to the blasts of Auster or Favonius nor fierce Boreas or Aphelotes, but to a call of fifteen thousand two hundred sesterces. A wind that brings horror and pestilence!' (C.) Lucan, Bk. I [181-2]: 'Hence devouring usury, and interest greedy for each moment, and credit shaken, and warfare profitable to many.' (R.) Ovid, Heroides,² Bk. I, ep. xv [66]: 'The wealth he cast away by evil means once more by evil means he seeks.' (S.) Add Bacon, Essays, chaps. xxviii and xxxiv.

11. It is, furthermore, agreeable with reason to avoid unnecessary sorrow and shun it so far as possible, since it works to the destruction of the body; not merely that one may be free from sorrow, but that objects may also be suited and pleasing to the senses. See Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. vi, n. 1-2. But the mind should not be trained eagerly to seek a singular and refined gratification of the senses, since this either enervates a man, diminishing the vigour of the body as well as that of the mind, and making it unfitted for serious undertakings; or steals time away from better and necessary tasks; or consumes and wastes the necessary equipment of a man and his substance that should be better spent, or often, when combined with fault, brings in its train peril, loss, disgrace, or remorse. Therefore, as it borders on madness to solicit sorrows that are unnecessary and serve 170 no purpose, so it is reasonable to indulge only in a taste even of lawful and harmless pleasures, rather than to plunge deeply into them. But on no account should duty be neglected or shirked for pleasure's sake.

12. Finally, the mind should take every care that it keep its motions and affections in control, since most of them do not only entirely destroy the strength of the body and vigour of the mind, but becloud and distort the judgement of the intellect, and turn it with great force away from the path of duty and reason, so that a coldness of the passions is, as it were, the natural source of prudence and probity among men. Quintilian, Declamations, ccxcvi: 'Profound emotions pay no attention to laws.'

It will not be beside the point to note a few things about the different passions. Joy is in itself entirely agreeable with nature. But care must be taken to keep it from expressing itself to excess, or for improper reasons, such, for instance, as the misfortunes of another, and from leading to idle matters, vanities, and what is base or unfitting. Gloominess, like a disease, wastes away the mind and body. It should, therefore, to the best of one's ability be banished, save in so far as it is held among the duties of humanity to show pity and grief at the misfortune or death of others, or in so far as it is a part of the expression of remorse for evil deeds. Love is a passion friendly to the nature of man, but one that must be controlled by reason, that it may be shown toward a worthy object, that it may not turn to the accomplishment of base deeds, or seek fuel for itself in evil ways, that it be not the cause of delay in other duties, nor degenerate into a disease, nor, when concerned with something that may pass away or be lost, set such store upon it that at its loss the mind will be unable to contain itself. Sophocles, Antigone [648]: 'Let no woman ever fool away thy wits.' (S.) Euripides, Hippolytus [253 ff.]:

Let heart-strings ne'er together cling,
Nor be indissolubly twined
The cords of love, but lightly joined
For knitting close or severing.¹ (W.)

Add Bacon, Essays, chap. x.

Hate is a passion as harmful for him who holds it as for those upon whom it falls. When possible, therefore, it should be quenched and restrained, lest under its impulse we do to others what duty forbids. And even if the one for whom we have an aversion entirely deserves it, let us not for that reason make trouble for our own selves.

Envy is indeed a base passion, and one that often leads to evil consequences for others, but always for the one who nurses it; for the envious person is consumed by his own habits, like iron by rust. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. II [781 ff.]: 'Unwelcome to her is the sight of men's success, and with the sight she pines away; she gnaws and is gnawed, herself her own punishment.' (M.) Horace, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. ii [58-9]: 'The tyrants of Sicily never invented a torture worse than envy.' (W.)

Hope, although a more gentle passion, should be so controlled that the mind be not diseased through it, and waste not itself away for naught in cherishing vain and uncertain things, or such as are beyond its power, nor become a 'day dream' as Aristotle calls it, Diogenes Laertius, Bk. V [18]. Nor may that befall us which Lucretius describes, Bk. III [1085 ff.]: 'But as long as we have not what we crave, it seems to surpass all else; afterwards, when that is ours, we crave something else, and the same thirst for life besets us ever, open-mouthed.' (B.)

Fear is an enemy of the mind of man, and a wholly useless thing. For the caution, which is supposed to come from it, can be produced also without its aid by prudence, and a wariness that is not over apprehensive or anxious.

Anger is a most violent as well as baneful passion, to be resisted 171 by every means; it blinds and destroys even bravery itself, and that constancy in the face of dangers which it is commonly supposed to support. Xenophon, Art of Horsemanship [vi. 13]: 'Anger is a reckless thing, that often makes a man do what he must regret.' (N.) Statius, Thebaid, Bk. X [703-5]:

Give not thy heated mind the reins of sway,
Allow some internal, some short delay:
Impetuous haste misguides us oft. (L.)

Horace, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. ii [62 ff.]: 'He who will not control his anger will presently wish that undone which irritation and the feelings of the moment have made him do in his hurry, to satisfy his vengeful hatred. Anger is a short madness.' (W.) Add Libanius, Progymnasmata: Vituperatio Irae [Vituperationes, vii].

Related to anger is the lust for vengeance, which is clearly a vice when it exceeds a legitimate and proper defence of oneself and one's own, and the assertion of one's rights against any violators. See Antoine le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae Cartesianae, Pt. VIII, chap. xii.

13. Now in these duties lies that cultivation of the mind which all are required to undertake, and for the acquisition of which those who have laid upon them the education of others should be especially concerned. The absence of this cultivation, or an attitude hostile to it, is opposed to the duty of man, or else constitutes no slight obstacle¹ to the proper performance of his duty. And so whoever lacks such an endowment is worthy of reprehension.

There is, furthermore, a special development of the mind consisting in the knowledge of various things, of the arts and the sciences, which is not absolutely necessary for the proper undertaking of a man's duty; and so a person will seek it as his capacity, opportunity, impelling causes, and the advantages to be gained from it, will lead him. Now no one questions that the arts are useful in their service to the necessities and advantages of the life of man. Yet many scruple at literary pursuits, on the ground that they are not only useless but even harmful, and hence it is forbidden in many states to advance beyond the knowledge of reading, writing, and handling numbers. Nay, many are convinced that it makes men unfitted to conduct business affairs. Erasmus, in commenting on a certain learned man, adds this statement, Epistles, Bk. XVII, ep. xii: 'He had a foresight in common affairs, which is usually lacking among the more highly educated.' Every one is familiar with the terms that are applied to scholarly men. A good illustration is the well-known passage from Procopius, The Gothic War, Bk. I [ii. 12 and 14]: 'Letters are far removed from manliness, and the teaching of old men results for the most part in a cowardly and submissive spirit [. . .]. Theodoric [. . .] used to say to them all that, if the fear of the strap once came over them, they would never have the resolution to despise sword and spear.' (D.) The sentiment of Plato is not very different, Republic, Bk. VII [p. 536 E]: 'A freeman ought to be a freeman in the acquisition of knowledge.' (J.) Seneca, Hippolytus, [459-60]:

So do our inborn powers a richer fruit
Of praise and glory bear, if liberty,
Unchecked and boundless, feed the noble soul. (M.)

Plato, Gorgias [p. 484 D], says of philosophers: 'When they betake themselves to politics or business, they are ridiculous.' (J.*) Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xi [39], calls a scholar 'a creature at whom we all laugh'. Add Michel Montaigne, Bk. I, chap. xxiv; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xxxix ad fin.; III. xiv, n. 19 ff.

If we are to have a clear understanding of the matter, and know, therefore, the proper value to put upon letters as well, it makes a great difference if we lay it down in the first place as unquestioned that the mere knowledge of letters is not enough to secure foresight and wisdom, but that a native endowment is an absolute requisite; and if this is lacking you will no more be able to secure wisdom by letters alone than 172 you can secure a rich harvest if you plough the desert sands. It is one thing to have read much, another to understand it and to be prudent. An old poet has said: 'Of how little use is learning, if there be with it no understanding' [Menander, Monostichoi, 557]. And Quintilian has put it well, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VI, chap. vi, § 32 [VI. v. 11]: 'It is certain that judgement can do more without learning than learning without judgement.' (W.) Therefore, the fact that a naturally stupid and dull person does not turn out to be prudent and wise by the aid of letters no more detracts from the worth of sound learning than the inability of medicines to restore life to the dead lessens their efficacy. 'To him that hath shall be given.' [Matthew, xxv. 29.] And 'culture enhances innate power' [Horace, Odes, IV. iv. 33], but it is applied in vain when there is nothing innate.

It has been further observed that, by the acquisition of letters, native folly becomes no less incurable and intractable than do native evil and impiety, but rather more so, since letters give folly, as it were, weapons wherewith it defends evil and impiety and makes open use of them. Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. iv, observes: 'Without letters men do neither, as a rule, become especially wise, nor (unless a man's mind be impaired by some chance disease or ill constitution of the organs) especially foolish.' Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xlviii.

And so not everything which passes under the title of letters is of the same nature and should not be considered of the same value. For we call some learning useful, some elegant and curious, and some, finally, idle. Useful learning may be divided into three classes: moral, medical, and mathematical science. For true and sound theology stands on its own worth, unless one may choose to place it in the first class. Moral science is concerned with the cultivation of the mind and the promotion of social life; medical science with the health of the body, and mathematical science, which has manifest utility, with the various arts that contribute very great advantage to the life of man. By elegant and curious learning we understand that learning the usefulness of which is not, indeed, so great that without it the life of man would be less sociable or convenient, but the knowledge of which is worthy of a free man, since it either leads us more deeply into a study of the works of nature, or witnesses to the excellence and ingenuity of the human mind, or preserves the memory of the human race and of its undertakings and accomplishments. And to this class we can refer the acquaintance with several languages, the subtle inquiry into the works of nature, the higher departments of mathematics, all fields of history, criticism, in so far as it preserves intact the best works of men's minds, poetry, oratory, and the like. Such studies are in themselves certainly excellent and worthy of praise, and serve as the spice and adornment of man's development, and according to this measure they should be allowed their due cultivation and value.

Now by idle learning we mean not only that which is concerned with false and erroneous matters, but that which troubles itself with the opinions of smooth-speaking or idle men, whereby the mind is perplexed and prevented from aspiring to the substantial knowledge of things. To this class should be assigned not only many views of ancient philosophers, utterly divergent from the nature of things, but also most of those matters with which the schools resounded in the dark ages just past and which are still bitterly maintained by many to the ignorance of better things, either because they are ashamed to unlearn what they learned with such pains, or because it is to the interest of the papal monarchy that active minds be busied with trifles. See Hobbes, Leviathan, chaps. xlvī-xlvīi. Plutarch, Alexander [vii. 5], remarks on the metaphysics of Aristotle: 'For in truth his treatise on metaphysics is of no use for those who would either teach or learn the science.' (P.) Martial, Bk. II, ep. lxxxvi [9-10]: 'It is absurd to make one's amusements difficult; and labour expended on follies is childish.'

- 173 A man has the greater disdain for this idle learning the better acquainted he becomes with sound learning. Finally, the evil of pedantic learning and addled pedagogues is not to be laid at the door of letters. See Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. III, chap. xiv, n. 21 ff. Thus who could make any strides towards wisdom and prudence in such a school as that of the philosopher Uranius, as described by Agathias, Bk. II [29]:

When they hold their meetings every man talks as he pleases upon sublime themes and divine speculations, and although they are forever arguing these questions, they are never convinced by one another, nor do they ever give up a notion which they have once entertained, whatever it may happen to be. But the same men persistently hang on to the same doctrine, and when they come to the end of their argument they are angry, and openly revile one another, using the disgraceful language of dicers. Thus when the contention ends, it is hard to get them to separate; they neither give nor get any advantage, and change from friends into the bitterest enemies.

And the following caustic description hits the director [Ibid. 30]: 'He surpassed the rest only in impudence and garrulity [. . .] as 'one who knew nothing¹ among others who knew nothing'. A similar method of disputation is described by Lucian in his Bis Accusatus, with which may be compared his dialogue entitled Charon.

But who will question that one endowed with good wit will advance more rapidly in his undertakings, after he has been grounded in solid learning, than if equipped with only his natural ability? Plutarch, On Education of Children [x, p. 8 A]: 'He that spends his time in contemplation without action is an unprofitable man; and he that lives in action and is destitute of philosophy is a rustical man, and commits many absurdities.' (G.) An ancient poet has said: 'One must acquire learning and after that use judgement' [Philonides in Stobaeus, Anthology, III. xxxv. 6a, and Menander, Monostichoi, 96]. Sallust, Jugurtha, Preface [ii]: 'Therefore, we can but marvel the more at the perversity of those who allow the mind, which is better and greater than anything else in man's nature, to grow dull from neglect and inaction.' (R.) Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. VII, chap. xv: 'When the men of Mytilene commanded the sea, they punished the allies who fell away from them by prohibiting them from teaching their children literature and music, regarding it as the severest of all punishments to live in ignorance of the liberal arts.' Add Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vi], where he speaks of zeal in the pursuit of truth.

But those who undertake the study of letters should take care, first of all, to connect this study with some use in their life, and with the cultivation and improvement of their mind, and not make them a barren occupation with which to pass the time. Aristippus, as the account is given by Diogenes Laertius, Bk. II [80], when asked what were the things which well-born youths should learn, replied, 'What they may find of use when they become men.' And it is disgraceful for a person who holds such fine thoughts in his mind to be of no more service than common men. Pacuvius in Gellius, Bk. LIII, chap. viii [XIII. viii]: 'I hate men of philosophic sentiment but lazy in action.' Isocrates, Praise of Helen [4 f.]:

The Sophists held it their duty 'to bring up their disciples to a knowledge of practical politics, and to train them to experience in such matters, bearing in mind that it is far better to have a sound opinion upon useful things than an accurate knowledge of things that are useless, and to have a slight superiority in matters of importance, than to be far above others in small things that are of no practical benefit in life.' (F.)

Lucian, Convivium [xxxiv]: 'It is no good knowing the liberal arts if one doesn't improve one's way of living too.' (H.*) Among the Egyptians a library used to be called a 'clinic for the soul', Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xlix. They are ill educated to whom can be applied the remark of Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. IV, chap. v: 'In the lecture-room we are lions, and foxes in the world outside.' (M.)

Their second concern should be that not all their learning turn 174 upon mere authority and a habit of listening, as well as upon the imitation of unknown terms, but that their inquiry go down to the firm foundations of things. Let there be no obstinacy about questions which have not yet been reduced to a clear proof, and let one's former position be gladly changed when better and more certain facts have been presented, because it is quite possible than another's wit may surpass our own, and a following day improve upon the one that has gone before. This, indeed, is the surest proof of a noble mind. Sophocles, Antigone [710 f.]:

The wisest man will let himself be swayed
By others' wisdom and relax in time. (S.)

Pliny, Natural History, Bk. III, Preface: 'It is far from surprising that a mere mortal cannot be acquainted with everything.' (B. & R.)* Idem, Bk. XI, chap. iii [6]: 'For my part, whenever I have considered the subject, I have ever felt persuaded that there is nothing impossible to nature.' (B. & R.) And so we have the remark of Diogenes Laertius, Bk. X [87]: 'It is not a question of laying down, a priori, rules for the interpretation of nature; the only guides for us to follow are the appearance themselves.' (Y.) Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. I [v]: 'The authority of the teacher is often a disadvantage to those who are willing to learn. For they refuse to use their own judgement, and rely implicitly on him whom they make choice of for a preceptor.' (Y.)

Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. III, chap. i [6]: 'Their adherents approve whatever path they have pursued, and you will not easily alter prepossessions that have been inculcated¹ into youth, for every one had rather have learned than learn.' (W.) Ibid., Bk. VII, chap. xi [XII. xi. 6]: 'No man would like that art, in which he himself has been great, to fall into decay.' (W.) Horace, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. i [83 ff.]: 'Either they think nothing can be right but what has pleased themselves, or else they think it shame to be led by their youngsters, and to confess in their old age that what they learned before their beard grew is poor stuff.' (W.) But certainly, as Plato says, Republic, Bk. V [p. 480 A]: 'Men ought not to be angry at the truth.' (J.)* [Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, III. vi. 65]: 'Longer perseverance in study would be superfluous, if we were not at liberty to find out something better than what was advanced before.' (W.)

Their last care should be not to bury themselves so deeply in books that they neglect their other duties and become unfit for the spirit of social life. Lucian, Convivium [xxxiv]: 'Education leads men away from right thinking, since they persist in having no regard for anything but books and the thoughts of them.' (H.) For pedantry of mind is not a vice confined to literary pursuits, or to any religious sect, but pervades men of every race, calling, and position.

14. But although the highest and most toilsome training is that which has to do with the mind, yet the care of the body should not for this reason be neglected, since it is the support of the mind, and if it be disordered the mind also can accomplish little of value. We should, therefore, make every possible endeavour to have a healthy mind reside in a healthy body, and to have the latter trained to endure hardships rather than to be wrecked by dissipations and a life of ease. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. xlv. It is said by Lucian, *De Lapsu inter Salutandum*² [xi], that Pyrrhus in his daily sacrifices asked of God nothing other than ὕγιαλνεν, good health, since it includes all good. Care should also be taken that the vigour and strength of the body be not jeopardized by intemperance in meat and drink, by unseasonable or unnecessary labour, or in any other way. For this reason gluttony, drunkenness, excessive relations with women, and the like, should be avoided. Juvenal, Satires, xi, line 34: 'You should know the measure of your cheek.'³ Add the remarks of Socrates against incontinency, in Xenophon,⁴ Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. I [iii]. It is a pointed observation of Democritus, in Plutarch, Advice about Keeping Well [xxiv,

p. 135 E]: 'If the body should summon the soul before a court on an action for ill-treatment, the soul would lose the case.' (G.) Although the reply might be made that the mistakes of the mind about sustenance and sensual pleasure and the other things which concern the care of the body arise from the fact that the mind, without any warnings of the reason, yields to the desire and passions of the body, but is never made worse by itself. No less famous is the remark of Theophrastus, in Plutarch, loc. cit.: 'The soul pays a dear house-rent to its landlord the body.' (G.) Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xxx.

15. Our life has been given us by the Creator as a kind of race-course, where our strength is to be displayed¹ at the dictate of reason, and so it must be measured not by the succession of one breath after another, but by good actions. Therefore, every one must be watchful not to become a 'profitless burden of the earth' [Homer, Iliad, XVIII. 104], of no advantage to himself and a care to others; a mere unit of mankind, 'born to consume the fruits of the earth' [Horace, Epistles, I. ii. 27], or one whose sole reason for living is in his palate. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. II [xvi]: 'Whatever is wholly inactive seems to me not to exist at all.' (Y.) Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. I, ep. vi [I. v. 44]: 'I regard idleness as death.' (W.) Silius Italicus, Bk. III [145]: 'What is the difference between death and a life of obscurity?' Theocritus, Idylls, xiv [70]: 'We must fain be up and doing while there's sap in our legs.' (E.) Add Gellius, Bk. XIX, chap. x.

Now since the industry of men generally shows itself either in the quest of what is necessary for preserving life, or in the fulfilment of the duties of social and civil life, which has every kind of variety, and for which not every one is equally fitted, it follows that every one should early in life undertake and choose a course of life which is honest, advantageous, and suited to his capacity. For the most part, the way of one's manner of life is usually set by the impulse of one's bent, some peculiar aptitude of body and mind, the condition of one's birth, the goods which fortune bestows, the authority of parents, sometimes the command of the state, the invitation of opportunity, or mere necessity. Isocrates remarked about the ancient Athenians, Areopagiticus [45, p. 255]:

It was impossible to direct all towards the same pursuits, as their positions in life were not the same; but they ordered them to follow occupations in conformity with their means. Those who were less well off than others, they employed in agriculture and mercantile pursuits, knowing that want of means arises from idleness, and vicious habits from want of means; thus, by removing the source of those evils, they thought to keep them from the other offences that follow in its train. Those, on the other hand, who were possessed of sufficient means, they compelled to devote their time to horse-racing, athletic exercises, hunting and philosophy, seeing that as a result of such pursuits some gain distinction, while others are kept from most vices. (F.)

Among the Egyptians and Hindus every one was commanded to follow his father's trade, Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxiv; XII. xli. A reason for this custom is given by Isocrates, Busiris [§ 20]. The same thing was practised among the Peruvians in the time of the Incas, the nobles alone, but not the common people, being allowed to acquire the culture of learning, Garcilasso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. IV. The words of Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. II [i. 21], apply here: 'Those became best in any given thing who gave up paying attention to many things, and devoted themselves to that alone.' (M.) And Idem, Bk. VIII [ii. 5]: 'It is impossible for a man who works at many things to do them all well.' (W.) Hence, not only those who exist by knavery live in a state opposed to sane reason, but those as well who, without any necessity, withdraw themselves from the duties common to life, as, among others, many hermits and monks, and a few of the ancient philosophers. Such are also the able-bodied mendicants, who adopt a calling unworthy of the divine Name, and make God a kind of tributary of themselves; their wickedness is all the greater, if they voluntarily distort or mutilate their limbs, so that they may not be of any use in the future, even if they should wish to be. The fact is worth mentioning that, among the Chinese, no able-bodied man is allowed to beg, even though he be blind, the latter class earning their living by

And since time rushes on apace, and death often overtakes men unawares, while none can escape it, one should in his early years make the most of life, nor have too comprehensive a plan of action. Martial, Epigrams,¹ Bk. I, ep. xvi [I. xv. 11-12]: 'Tis not, believe me, a wise man's part to say, "I will live". To-morrow's life is too late: live to-day.' Silius Italicus, Bk. III [141-2]: 'The brevity of this changing hour forbids me to put off the day.' Horace, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. iv [12 ff.]: 'In a world of hope and care, of fears and angry passions, hold for yourself the belief that each day that dawns is your last: the hour to which you do not look forward will be a pleasant surprise.' (W.) Idem, Bk. I, ep. iv [15]: 'Life's brief span forbids our entering on far-reaching hopes.' (B.)

Finally, we should also always keep the balance-sheets of life ready to hand in, and harden our mind early to meet the terrors of death, so that, without complaint and without fear, we may return to the Creator, at His demand, what He gave us to use for a season. Silius Italicus, Bk. IX [376 ff.]: 'Valour is an empty name, unless it be that renown is vouchsafed for him who endures, when the moment of death draws nigh.'² Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. xl.: 'It is the day after that is the judge of the day before; and after all it is only the last day that is to set its stamp on the whole.' (B. & R.) Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. i: 'And afterwards when the time comes I will die. And die how? As befits one who gives back what is not his own.' (M.) Add Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. XII, last section [36], and Bacon, Essays, chap. ii.

16. Now every one knows how much a man loves his own life, and how its preservation lies upon his heart. But there is some question as to whether that natural instinct which he has in common with brutes impels him to this or whether, as a matter of fact, there is the addition of some command of natural law. For since no one can be obligated only to himself, it is not clear what efficacy belongs to that law which terminates only in myself, and the necessity of obeying which I can escape whenever I wish, while its breaking brings an injury on no one. Moreover, it seems superfluous to pass a law on such a matter, since even without it, through the anxious solicitude of self-love, a man would be so impelled to care for and preserve himself, that, not even if he willed it, could he easily do otherwise. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xvii: 'It is superfluous to force us into the path which we naturally take, just as no one needs to be urged to love himself, since self-love begins to act upon him as soon as he is born.' (S.) Nay, if a man were born only for himself, we confess that it would be fitting that what he would decide for himself should be left entirely to his own judgement. But since all wise men agree that the most Good and Great Creator made man to serve Him, and by improving His good gifts to make His glory greater, and since the social relation, for which man was created, cannot be exercised and preserved to good advantage unless every man improves and preserves himself to the best of his ability—because the safety of all human society is a meaningless phrase if it makes no difference whether individuals are safe or not—it is clear, that when a man neglects his own care, he works an injury, not, indeed, on himself, but on God, his Creator, and on the human race. Cf., however, Antonius Matthaëus, De Criminibus, Prolegomena, chap. iii, § 4.

However, such an argument cannot be pushed to the conclusion that the law of nature does not command a man to preserve his own life, inasmuch as instinct already bore heavily enough in that direction; rather, instinct appears to have been, as it were, enlisted as an aid to the dictates of reason, as if the latter by itself alone would not constitute a support adequate to sustain mankind. For surely if account be taken of the troubles which accompany the life of man, troubles that far surpass that brief and mean allotment of pleasures which constantly recur in the same degree, but only with less delight and even with distaste; and how many men there are for whom life is prolonged that they may encounter more misfortunes; who would not, at the first opportunity, take his own life, did not his instinct so forcefully commend it, or were 177 not death accompanied by ideas of such bitterness? Or who would not overcome that instinct, did not the commands of the Almighty Creator stand in his way? The words of Quintilian, Declamations, iv, are surely to the point:

Of what satisfaction, O wretched mortals, can it be to retain the soul for so many years or, if nature allows, for endless ages of time in the most unhappy restraint of the body? If you carefully weigh all our joys, all our pleasures, everything in this whole universe that rejoices our sight or serves our use, you will find that the entire life of man is but a single day. They must be utterly poor and abject minds who are not sated with this eternal repetition; so that he who has learned from his converse with the liberal arts, what is the end of blessings, and in what true happiness consists, will never feel that he is going to die by an untimely death, and of those who refer the cause of light to the soul and mind, there is not one but is surfeited of life every day. Do you expect me now to recount how many more things there are in this short space of life which we ought to avoid; to set off our fear and misfortunes against our joys and successes? Nay, let us rather weigh those things for which we weary the gods with our prayers, and on account of which we complain of the shortness of life. What are they but vanity, desire, luxury, and lust? Are we not ashamed for the sake of such things as these to bear weakness, sorrow, and lingering illness? and to prefer to suffer these even though we might escape?

And a little above [iii]: 'The most effective device of nature for the preservation of man is our own unwillingness to die, and the help which she gives us to bear up under such a multitude of misfortunes with patience and equanimity.' And Socrates, in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. I [iv. 7], 'judged it to be the handiwork of some wise artificer, that he planted in us this passion to beget offspring, this passion in the mother to rear her babe, and in the creature itself, once born, this deep desire of life and fear of death.' (D.*)

Now it is the last of these which makes each man's life safe from other men. For how easy it would be to slay if death were not so bitter! Hence he who despises his own life is master of another's, and the safety of others¹ is my defence. Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. xi, n. 8.

17. It is a question for more profound investigation as to whether a man has any power over his own life at all, and if so to what extent; whether willingly to expose it to real danger, or to wear it away by small degrees, or, finally, to end it in some violent manner. Certainly many of the ancients used to allow this right to man so freely that they believed a man could offer his life as a pledge for another man and sacrifice it in his own behalf without any purpose of saving another; and, when it grew wearisome, even do away with it before its natural or fated end. In Pliny, Natural History, Bk. II, chap.² vii, the ability to kill oneself is called 'the greatest blessing among such great penalties of life'. And yet a man can in no way be freed from the accusation of impiety in that he does not fear to have so low an opinion of the greatest gift of God. It will be our task to inquire as to what appears to be most in keeping with the principles of natural law.

Now, in the first place, there is no question but that, since a man may and should use his ability in the service of others, and since some kinds of tasks, or the diligence with which they are pursued, may so affect a man's strength that old age and death will come on sooner than if a man had spent his life in ease, one may quite properly choose a slightly shorter length of life, in order to give other men a more generous use of his ability. For since we live not for ourselves alone, but for God and society, surely, if either the glory of God or the safety of society demands our life, we should spend it gladly for such a use. Statius, Thebaid, Bk. X [615]:

Thrice happy who can so adorn his death,
And for so great a meed resign his breath. (L.)

Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode ii [13]: 'Tis sweet and glorious to die for fatherland. Yet Death o'ertakes not less the runaway, nor spares the limbs and coward backs of faint-hearted youths.' (B.) Here 178 belongs the remark of Pompey the Great, who, when there was a famine in Rome, and the officer in charge of the grain supply and his friends were using every means to dissuade him from setting out into a tempest, replied to them: 'It is necessary for me to go, not for me to live.' [Plutarch, Pompey, l.] Achilles, in Homer, Iliad, Bk. IX, preferred a brief but glorious life to one of no repute, unwilling to be a stay-at-home, and so attain to extreme old age.

18. Moreover, since it is certain that time and again the life of many a person cannot be preserved, unless others expose themselves to the probable peril of their life in his behalf, it is also plain that, at the order of a rightful commander, an obligation can be laid upon a person not to refuse to meet such a peril, unless he is willing to face the most grave penalties. The obligation of soldiers rests upon such a principle, of which more will be said in its proper connexion. It is a noble saying of Socrates, recorded in Plato, Apology [p. 28 D]: 'For wherever a man's place is, whether the place which he has chosen, or that in which he has been placed by a commander, there he ought to remain in the hour of danger; he should not think of death or of anything but disgrace.' (J.) But it does not appear to go against either natural reason, or Holy Writ, which commands a man to lay down his life for his brethren, that a person should of his own accord, without such a specific command, expose himself to the probable peril of his life, on behalf of others, unless there is some hope that such a course will work for their safety, and they are worthy of being saved at so high a price. For it would be an act of folly for a person merely to join another in his certain death, when no good results from it, or for a man of worth to perish in place of some ne'er-do-well. Grotius, On Jonah, i. 12: 'If it is right for one man to offer his life that he may preserve many, as Phocion told Demosthenes, such a deed is much more fitting in the case of one who recognizes that he is the cause of others' dangers.'

We feel, therefore, that it is proper for one to offer his person as security for another, especially for an innocent and worthy man, or to give himself up as a hostage that the safety of others may be secured, even though he run the risk of death, if the accused person does not appear or the treaty is not observed. Although, as we shall show hereafter, persons who offer themselves in this way as security, or as hostages, cannot rightfully be executed by another. But we have no hesitation in asserting that sacrifices of this kind, which serve no other purpose than to afford an empty show of confidence and bravery such as we have noted above is still to be observed frequently among the Japanese, are contrary to natural law. For any unreasonable display of courage is idle. We feel, indeed, that the law of nature in no wise commands that, especially when other things are equal, a man should value another's life above his own; the very contrary, in fact, is clearly to be deduced from the common feeling of men, and from witnesses too weighty for any exception who allow that every man is dearest to himself. See 2 Corinthians, viii. 13-14; Digest, XIX. v. 14; XXXIII. iii. 6; XXXIX. iii. 2, § 9; this is not refuted by Digest, XIII. vi. 5, § 4, nor by Digest, XXIX. v. 1, § 28. Add the author of *De Principiis Justi et Decoris*¹, pp. 122 ff. [Velthuysen].

19. There remains for discussion the question whether a man, of his own free choice, when he has rejected the pleasure of life, either to avoid great misfortune or to anticipate an ignominious death which is expected at any moment, may hasten his fate by his own hand. To this question applies that classic passage, praised even by Christian writers, in Plato, Phaedo [p. 62 B]: 'Man is a prisoner who has 179 no right to open the door of the prison and run away.' (J.) The same thought has been expressed more fully by Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. III, chap. xviii:

For as we did not come into this life of our own accord; so, on the other hand, we can only withdraw from this habitation of the body which has been appointed us to keep, by the command of Him who placed us in this body that we may inhabit it, until He orders us to depart from it. (C.)

However, it is worth while to note carefully how Plato describes the suicide, condemned by him to a disgraceful burial, Laws, Bk. IX [p. 873 c]:

The suicide, who deprives himself by violence of his appointed share of life, not because the law of the state compels him, nor yet under the compulsion of some painful and inevitable fortune which has come upon him, nor because he has had to suffer from

irremediable and intolerable shame, but who from indolence or cowardice imposes upon himself an unjust penalty. (J.)

Aristotle also, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. xi, says: 'But it is the act, not of a courageous person, but rather of a coward, to fly from poverty or love, or anything that is painful, by death. For it is effeminacy to fly from troubles.' (W.) Seneca, Phoenician Women [190-2]:

It is not valor [...]

To shrink from life; but 'gainst the mightiest ills

To stand opposed, and not to flinch or budge. (M.)

Martial, Epigrams,¹ Bk. XI, ep. lvii [lvi]: 'In adversity it is easy to despise life; the truly brave man is he who can endure to be miserable.' Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. VI [436 f.], allots a place in hell for those 'Who, free from crime committed suicide, and hating light, in madness flung away their lives'. (B.) Procopius, Gothic History, Bk. IV [xii. 11]: 'To bring man's life to a violent end is useless, and a piece of frantic madness, and unreasoning boldness in the face of death, although it bears a specious appearance of valour, is regarded as folly by the wise.' Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXV, chap. iv: 'It may be said in all fairness that the man is fearful and cowardly who longs for death when he should not, and flees before it when it is opportune.' Add Abr. Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. II, chap. xviii; Nicolaus Trigautius, De Regno Chinae, Bk. I, chap. ix; Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. II, chap. xi, n. 18.

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xix, § 5, observes that among the Gentiles, as well as among the Hebrews, suicides were forbidden due burial. Add Josephus, Jewish War, Bk. III, chap. xxv. But some of the Hebrews found reason for one exception to the law against suicide, a kind of εὐλογος ἐξαγωγή [fitting departure from life], in case a man sees that his continuing to live will be a reproach to God. For since they decided that the authority over our lives belonged not to us, but to God, they felt that it was the presumed will of God alone which might pardon the purpose to anticipate death. And they cite as an instance the case of Samson, who saw that the true religion was being derided in his person, and of Saul, who fell on his sword, lest he be an object of derision for those who hated both himself and his God, and lest his captivity bring about the servitude of his people. For they would have it that the latter recovered his senses after the shade of Samuel had foretold to him his death, and, although he knew that it awaited him if he joined battle, he did not reject it for the sake of his country and the law of his God; therefore he deserved eternal praise, on the pronouncement even of David, who gave his testimony to the proper conduct also of those who had buried Saul with honour.

Some also apply this principle to similar cases, basing their opinion upon the following argument: Inasmuch as no one can be obligated to himself, he who takes his own life cannot thereby do an injury to himself. And the fact that every one is obligated by the law of nature to preserve himself is due to the reason that he has been ordained by God to cultivate human society, which he may on no account forsake, like a deserter, or a soldier who leaves his place in the ranks; and therefore my obligation to preserve myself is a debt of mine, not to myself, but to God and 180 human society. (Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. xv, remarks that suicides are not guilty of injury against themselves, but against the state, and for that reason are branded with ignominy.) And so, if that relation to God and mankind be removed, it appears that a man is obligated to himself only through sensitive instinct, and since this does not have the force of law, whatever opposed it should also not be accounted a sin. And so they feel that they have a proper plea, being worthy certainly of pity rather than censure, who lay violent hands upon themselves, because they foresee, with a morally infallible certainty, that a death of suffering and disgrace will be inflicted upon them in a short time at the hands of enemies, and that it is of no advantage to the commonweal for them to die at the will of another; or because they see that others are threatening to inflict something upon them that will make them an object of aversion to other persons. Such are they, who, on foreseeing their death at the hands of a truculent enemy or a cruel prince, have preferred to hasten their fate so as to escape the torture and revilings, or the ignominious treatment of the executioner, or else to secure some benefit by such an action for their friends or family.

An instance of the last reason is given by Tacitus, Annals, Bk. VI [xxix]:

For people resorted readily to deaths of this kind from the fear of execution; and also because a man's property was confiscated, and burial was denied to him, if he was sentenced to death; whereas, if he took his fate into his own hands, his body was buried, and his will respected. So great were the benefits of dispatch! (R.)

It is clear from this illustration that the remark of Martial, Bk. II, ep. lxxx, is not always to be approved:

When Fannius from his foe did fly,
 Himself with his own hands he slew:
 Who e'er a greater madness knew!
 Life to destroy for fear to die!

For, as Aeschines, On the Embassy [181], says: 'It is not death that men dread, but a dishonoured end.' (A.) Other instances are those when women or modest boys have in this way escaped the violation of their chastity. See the account by Paul Warnefrid, Bk. XV, of Dugna, a woman of Aquileia. Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. VIII, chaps. xxiv and xxvii.

It is felt that such persons can give a plausible excuse for themselves. Since they faced a necessity so complete, and escapable only through some kind of miracle, they concluded that they had already been mustered out by their commander, and could assume the forgiveness also of mankind, for whom they were already as good as dead; it made no difference that they anticipated their death by so brief a period, so as not to experience torture and abuse, which might even drive them to some grave sin; nor does it seem right for spirits of quality to be condemned to the necessity of first submitting to abuse by another, and then laying down their lives absolutely in any way their enemy might see fit. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. I [xxx]:

Cato left this world in such a manner, as if he were delighted that he had found an opportunity for dying; for that God who presides in us forbids our departure hence without his leave. But when God himself has given us a just cause, as formerly he did to Socrates, and lately to Cato, and often to many others,—in such a case, certainly every man of sense would gladly exchange this darkness for that light: not that he would forcibly break from the chains that held him, for that would be against the law; but like a man released from prison by a magistrate, or some lawful authority, so he too would walk away, being released and discharged by God. (Y.)

Add Digest, XLVIII. xxi. 3, § 6; XLIX. xiv. 45, § 2; Quintilian, Declamations, iv; Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, V. i. 9, on Digest XLVIII; Grotius, On Judges, xvi. 30.

But these question we leave undecided. This much is clear, however, that those who interrupt the course of their life, either from mere weariness of the troubles common to life, or from disgust at the evils which would not have made them objects of the scorn of society, or from fear of trials which they might have borne with fortitude, and so helped others by their example, can offer no defence so valid that they should not be judged to have sinned against the law of nature. Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II, apparently thinks otherwise, but I cannot agree 181 with his conclusion.

But these can surely be cleared of the crime of αὐτοχειρία [suicide], who take their own lives because of some disease which has destroyed the use of their reason. Many, also, who rush into suicide are excused by the judicious, because of the magnitude of their consternation. Curtius, Bk. IV, chap. xvi [IV. xvii]: 'Consternation makes men blind to dangers greater than the danger which they seek to avoid.' (A.) Lucan, Bk. III [689–90]: 'Amid a thousand forms of death, that single end is an object of dread, by which they have begun to perish.' (R.) 'Death desired through fear' is a phrase of Suetonius, Nero, chap. iv [ii]. Add Michel Montaigne, Essays, Bk. I, chap. xvii; Digest, IV. ii. 14, § 3.

It should be observed, at this point, that it makes no difference whether a man die by his own hand, or whether he lead others in some way to cause his death. Thus Deianira says, in Seneca, Hercules Oetaeus [996]:

For though 'tis by thy hand that I shall fall,
'Twill be my will. (M.)

For whoever did not need to die here and now is not excused if he use the hands of another in securing death; since, of course, one is judged to have done himself what he does through another. And yet the man who lends his hands to such a deed may likewise associate himself with the crime. So we do not approve the following reflections of Florus, Bk. IV, chap. vii:

Who cannot but wonder that these wisest of men (Brutus and Cassius) did not use their own hands to dispatch themselves? But perhaps this was avoided from principle, that they might not, in releasing their most pure and pious souls, stain their own hands, but while they used their own judgement, might allow the crime of the execution to be another's. (W.)

For if it was wrong for them to end their life at that time, it made no difference whether they perished at their own hand or that of another. But if it was right, it is not proper to attribute a crime to their servants. And yet the passage of Florus may be illustrated by the following from Aeschines, Against Ctesiphon [244]: 'When a man kills himself, the hand that did the deed is buried apart from the body.' (A.)

But since we deny the absolute power of a man over his own life it is also clear that those laws are not approved, which either command or permit citizens to do away with themselves. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. lvii, tells of such a law among the inhabitants of Ceylon, whereby it was decreed: 'They have a law that they may live to a certain number of years, and when those are run up, they dispatch themselves by a strange kind of death, lying down to sleep upon a certain herb which kills a man painlessly.' (B.*)¹ Add Idem, Bk. III, chap. xxxiii, on the people of Megabara, a tribe of Troglodytes. So among the Ceans a law stated that those who had passed the age of sixty should take the poison aconite, so that there might be enough food for the rest, Strabo, Bk. X [xi. 3]; Heraclides, De Politiis.² Although Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. III, chap. xxxvii, gives as the reason: 'Because they realize that they are of no further use in advancing the interests of their state since their mind is already beginning to fail because of age.' Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vi, §§ 7-8. See Procopius, Gothic History, Bk. II [xiv], on the custom of the Herili, among whom those who were weakened by old age or ill health procured their own death, their wives also hanging themselves about the tomb of a husband who had perished in this way. On the Sardi and Berbicci see Aelian, ibid., Bk. IV, chap. i; on the Massagetae, Strabo, Bk. XI [p. 513], and Herodotus [I. 216].

WITH the preservation of oneself, which is commended to every man by his most ardent love of his own person and by reason itself, is connected also self-defence, or the warding off of evils which tend to a man's injury, and are threatened by another man. This defence is of two kinds: either without injury to him who is planning offence to us, or with his injury and death. Now no person in his senses will ever question whether the first is lawful and entirely without sin. But, regarding the second kind, some have raised objections, because by it a fellow-being in our likeness is injured or killed, with whom we are required to co-operate in cultivating a social life, while by his death apparently as great a loss is entailed upon the human race as would come from our own death. And also because greater confusion apparently befalls society if we repulse threatened force with force than if we avoid injury by flight, or, when that is impossible, calmly offer our body to the assailant.

Yet reason clearly shows, and the agreement of the wise as well as of the untutored adds its approval, that a defence of ourselves may be undertaken not merely in the first way, but also, when that is not possible, with the injury of him who is about to assail us. Of course man was created to maintain peace with his fellows, and all the laws of nature which concern other men have, as their first concern, the establishment and maintenance of peace. Yet nature at times allows the recourse to violence, when we cannot in any other way preserve our safety because of the aggression of another. Of course, the obligation to observe the laws of nature and the duties of peace is a mutual one, and equally binding on all men; nor does nature allow one man such a privilege above another, so that he can violate these laws against the other, while the other is bound to keep the peace with him. But an obligation lies upon both of them, and makes the exercise of the offices of peace a mutual duty. And so when a man, contrary to the laws of peace, undertakes against me such things as tend to my destruction, it would be a most impudent thing for him to demand of me that I should thereupon hold his person inviolate, that is, that I should sacrifice my own safety so that his villainy may have free play. Herodian, Bk. IV, chap. v: 'It is reasonable and necessary for a man who is about to suffer some dread event to defend himself rather than to accept it. Otherwise the victim of misfortune is accused also of cowardice.' But when he shows himself unsociable towards me, and makes himself unfitted to receive from me the offices of peace, all my interest turns to securing my own safety, and inasmuch as it cannot be secured without injury to him, he has only himself to blame, since he drove me to such necessity. Horace, Satires, Book II, sat. i [44-5]: 'Let no one ever attack me when I desire peace. But for him who rouses me ("Better not touch me!" I cry loudly) he shall weep for it.' (W.) Were it otherwise, all the benefits which nature or our labour has given us would have been conferred in vain if they could not be defended by force against the person who assails them; and honest men would be exposed as an easy prey for the wicked, if they should never meet the latter with force.

183 Therefore, to forbid the use of force in self-defence, so far from conducing to peace, would mean the end of mankind. Nor, indeed, should it be thought that the law of nature, instituted as it was for the safety of man, favours such a peace as would cause his immediate destruction, and bring about anything but a sociable life. Add Grotius, Bk. I, chap. ii; Bk. I, chap. iii, § 3.

2. It is not entirely clear whether a violent self-defence, and one that entails the injury or death of the assailant, may be an obligation as well. We are not concerned with soldiers or the guards of travellers, who, in killing enemies or thieves, defend their country as well as themselves, or undertake the protection of those who have been committed to their care; they can be included in the line of Seneca, Phoenician Women [294]:

To many men art thou refusing life,
If for thyself thou dost refuse to live. (M.)

But we are concerned with those who are moved to self-defence only by their own peril. An illustration of this is to be found in Plutarch, Phocion [xxxii]:

When Phocion was assailed for letting Nicanor go and not detaining him, he said that he had confidence in Nicanor, and expected no evil at his hands; but in any case, he would rather be found suffering wrong than doing wrong. Now, such an utterance as this might seem honourable and noble in one who had regard to his own interests alone; but he who endangers his country's safety, and that, too, when he is her commanding general,

Now there are some who would carry this command so far that it could not be abrogated even by civil law, maintaining that the man who allows himself to be killed when he could have defended himself, can be condemned on the same score as if he had killed himself. See Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 3. And this is something like the instance in Sparta of the Ephors punishing a certain Sciraphidas, because many men had injured him. Plutarch, Instituta Laconica [chap. xxxix, p. 239 c]. Also the author of the De Principiis Justi et Decori, p. 33 [Velthuysen], inclines to the same opinion. His argument runs that, in addition to other factors working to the preservation of man, we have within us a quick sense of grief, a burning desire for revenge, and hands adapted to injure others and defend ourselves. Since these have not been given us for naught, it is to be assumed that it is God's will that we use them for our preservation. Therefore, if I do not fight with my hands, even to the extent of killing my assailant, it is the same as if I had of my own will cut them off. Although he confesses farther on, p. 118, that this law of self-preservation is not of so binding a nature that there may not arise some cases which either excuse a man from obeying it, or else allow him to be a law unto himself.

To us it seems necessary to consider, first of all, whether it is of any great concern to others that the person who is attacked survive, or whether, as a matter of fact, he apparently lives only to himself. We hold that in the former case the man is obligated to secure his own protection by every means possible, but, in the latter case, we maintain that it is only permissible for a man to defend himself even to the death of his assailant, especially if the life of the latter is of advantage to many, and there is a likelihood that, if he meets his death in rascality of this kind, he runs the additional risk of eternal damnation. Of course the magnitude of the impending terror may not allow so careful a scrutiny of the merits of individuals, and consideration need scarcely be taken, least of all by the man who will be damaged by another's fury, of a peril into which a man brings himself, and from which he can disengage himself at his pleasure. Isocrates, Against Callimachus [39]: 'Is it not absurd for him in this crisis to ask you to pity him, when it is a situation which he himself controls, into which he puts himself, and the risks of which he can even now avoid?' Libanius, Declamations, xxiii [viii. 10]: 'For what a man would not have suffered, were he not in the wrong, this he has done to himself by virtue of having been the first to do wrong.' And yet that such an act, from which so great evils come to another should be considered a duty and its omission regarded as a sin, does not seem to be a proper balance, especially since the old saying may be used also in this connexion: 'A man may renounce his privilege, provided it can be done without injury to a third person.' This principle 184 is stated in the following way by Quintilian, Declamations, vii [4]:

It is in the nature of all benefactions that they do not impose a necessity but bestow a power. Whatever has been devised to honour some one ceases to be a privilege if you force it upon him. Run through the full list of rights, if you please; nowhere is the law so solicitous as to extort from us that which it affords us.

3. But if accurate knowledge is to be secured on the question, how self-defence should be limited, and how far it may properly be carried, we must, before everything else, distinguish as to whether he who defends himself is in a state of nature or in a civil state, since it is held within far narrower bounds in the latter than in the former. Now this distinction has not been carefully enough observed by many writers, and so they have made some generalizations upon innocent self-defence, which are true of only one of the above states. But after it has been clearly shown what right there is in a state of nature, it will be perfectly obvious to what extent, and on what grounds, this right is restricted in commonwealths.

Now the following is a good rule of prudence: 'A wise man should try every means before arms.' For inasmuch as every battle has some element of chance, a man when threatened by another with injury would do better to try the safer means of escape, before he came to open conflict. Libanius, Declamations, i [iii. 24]: 'First to endeavour to ascertain what is right by the use of reason, and not to leap to arms, does more become a man.' Thus if I can cut off my would-be assailant's avenue of approach so that he cannot reach me, it would be foolish of me to grapple with him when I do not have to. And if walls and gateway can protect a person, it is imprudent of him to present his breast to the foe. Terence, Eunuch [761]: 'When you can provide against a danger, it's silly to let it come near you.' (S.)

Furthermore, it becomes a prudent man to bear a slight injury with patience, if it can be done conveniently, and so to yield a little from his right, rather than to expose oneself by an untimely defence to greater peril, especially if that be demanded which may be easily repaired or compensated for. Plautus, Amphitryo, Act II, sc. ii [703-5]: 'You but cross a Bacchante when the Bacchic frenzy fills her, and you'll make the crazy thing crazier still, and she'll hit you all the more: humour her, and she'll call it quits after one blow.' (N.) Idem, Truculentus [768]: 'If you thump a goad with your fists, your hands are hurt the most.' (R.) Martial, Bk. VI, ep. lxiv [6]: 'Have pity upon yourself, and do not, like a furious dog, provoke with rabid mouth the fuming nostrils of a living bear.' And it is also my judgement, that the man who comes to some sort of agreement with a person over a matter of ten gold pieces, which the latter owed him, acts more wisely than the one who endeavours to secure the sum by a troublesome lawsuit, especially if fifteen gold pieces have to be paid the lawyers as the price of their eloquence. Martial, Bk. VII, ep. lxiv [65]: 'Wretched, infatuated man! does any one continue at law for twenty years, Gargilianus, who has the option of losing his suit?' Theocritus, Idylls, xxiii [xxii. 180]: 'And in such sort, I ween, a great strife is like to end in but little loss.' (E.) Especially is this true, since 'Hard it is to rid oneself of strife with them that are stronger than ourselves', (S.) Pindar, Olympian Odes, x [39-40]; and 'even when men strive, indeed, fortune doth not show herself until they reach the final goal'. (S.) Idem, Isthmian Odes, iv [31-2]. So the greatest praise should be accorded to what Isocrates says about himself, De Permutatione [27]: 'It was my policy never to do an injury to others, and in case I received an injury from them, not to seek redress through the courts, but to settle the matters in dispute with their friends.' Lucian, Eunuchus [1]: 'For truly it is absurd for philosophers to sue one another, when they ought, no matter how important the matter was, to settle their difficulties with one another in peace.' Add Digest, IV. vii. 4, § 1. So also the remark which was applied by Polybius, Excerpta Peiresciana [XL. v. 12], to the Achaeans, 185 after they had been in a short battle, often holds in other cases: 'Had we not perished quickly we should not have been saved.' Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xiv:

Reason often counsels patience while anger counsels revenge, and we, who might have survived our first misfortune, are exposed to worse ones. Some have been driven into exile by their impatience of a single contemptuous word; have been plunged into the deepest miseries because they would not endure the most trifling wrong in silence, and have brought upon themselves the yoke of slavery because they were too proud to give up the least part of their entire liberty. (S.)

Add also Stobaeus, Anthology, xix. To this applies the explanation given by Grotius, Bk. I, chap. ii, § 8, on the meaning of Matthew, v. 17, although others would maintain that this saying applies to men who are under oppression and have no access to justice. Cf. Lamentations, iii. 28-30. And yet in a strong state a person is expected to demand recompense for his injuries before a judge (Leviticus, v. 1), not for the sake of revenge (Leviticus, xix. 17-18), but with the intent to uphold justice and the laws of his country, and so that scoundrels may find no gain or pleasure in their evil deeds. Lysias, Against Theomnestus, chap. i [x. 2]: 'For I regard it as illiberal and highly litigious to bring a man into court on a charge of calumny.' Heraclides in his Politics [18]¹ is the authority for the existence of a law among the people of Cyrene, whereby 'The ephors should bring the litigious and malicious to court, and then punish and disfranchise them.' Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xxv: 'If a man then listens like a stone, what advantage has the slanderer.' (M.) Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxxii: 'It is the part of a great mind to despise wrongs done to it; the most contemptuous form of revenge is not to deem one's adversary worth taking vengeance upon. [. . .] 'That man is great and noble who like a large wild animal bears unmoved the tiny curs that bark at him.' (S.)

But the injured party does owe such restraint not so much to the one who does the injury, since the latter, so far as he was able, has broken off all relations of humanity with him, as to his own security and peace of mind. And so, when any one, stung with wrath or pain, has exceeded these limits, he does no injury to the aggressor, but is held only to have acted to excess and unwisely.

However, when my safety cannot be attained by these means, and made entirely secure, the affair must be decided by blows. Under such circumstances, if the other party persists in doing any injury with malice aforethought, and is not led by remorse at his evil design to the desire to return to open and peaceful relations, it will be proper to withstand him even to his death. And even if he does not directly seek my life, suppose he only want to belabour me with blows, or deprive me of some non-vital member, or merely rob me without touching my body, nevertheless, after he has broken the peace with me, and I have no longer any security that he will not burst forth from such beginnings to greater injuries, I may, in order to repel this injury, take even extreme measures. For by his avowing that he is my enemy—and this is the case when he attacks me with injuries and shows no signs of repentance—he gives me, so far as he is able to, an unlimited freedom of action against him. Antiphon, Orationes, xi [4 B 3]: 'The aggressors deserve not the same but greater and more numerous penalties.'

There are, to be sure, some who do not approve the term 'unlimited freedom' of resisting, because 'the right of defence and of resisting an injury has never been a natural one, save with respect to that order and its safety, to which a social nature has assigned the first place in securing its end. For to the natural right of resisting there is this exception'—unless the social order is violated by resisting—'for which nature herself has the first and highest concern. And so, if this precaution were not observed, society would become unsocial, not being maintained by a concern for necessary and natural order.' See Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iv, § 2.

But it is by no means asserted that a liberty of this kind, i.e., to resist by any means possible, should be allowed in absolutely every case 186 —since many considerations may arise which would forbid the injured person going to any extreme—but that the person who began the injury has no ground for complaint, if extreme measures are taken against him. And surely life would be most unsocial, if, among those who live in a state of natural liberty, any limit were set on their freedom to resist. For what sort of a life would I lead, if a man might always continue to lay on me with moderate blows, and I were not allowed to stop or repulse his villainy by any other means than threatening him with death? Or if a neighbour could persist in vexing me, only, it is true, by plundering and devastating my fields, and we had no right to kill him in driving him off? For since the social attitude has as its aim the safety of all, no such laws should be framed as would make it necessary for any very retiring man to be always miserable, whenever it suited some scoundrel to break the law of nature. And it would be absurd for social life among men to be based upon the necessity of bearing injuries. Therefore, the man is a fool and the ignorant betrayer of his own safety, who spares an enemy, persisting in being such and carrying on hostilities, and prefers to die to no purpose himself rather than to destroy another. For the law of nature has willed that practice of gentleness and humanity towards an enemy only to the extent that, if he shows that he is moved by repentance, to be willing seriously to desist from injuries to me, and if he makes good the damage, and gives assurance that he will not give offence in the future, I should spare and pardon him, and after peace has been restored, should meet him half-way in exercising the offices of peace. Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. II [711 ff.]: 'But if he ask you to be his friend again and be ready to give you satisfaction, welcome him.' (E-W.) For nature has forbidden among men, under the stigma of cruelty, pure revenge, which has no other object than the suffering and death of the aggressor. It follows, therefore, that the remembrance of wrongs should, so far as possible, be effaced. And this is the point of the account given by Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [xxxiii] of how the Thebans were brought to trial before the Amphictyonic Council, for setting up a bronze trophy after their victory over the Lacedaemonians, the grounds being, that 'it is unfitting for Greeks to set up an eternal monument of their quarrels with Greeks'. For it was the custom to make their trophies only of wood, so that they might not endure a long time. Add Florus, Bk. III, chap. ii, towards the end. Seneca, Hercules Furens [362 ff.]:

If everlasting hate
The hearts of men should feel, if fury dire,
Once in the heart conceived, should never cease;
If prosperous men must ever fight to rule,
And those who fail obey because they must:
Then never-ending wars would nothing leave. (M.)

But men in a natural state cannot only repel some danger in the present, but, after it has been thrust off, they can also proceed against their aggressor until they are satisfied that they have nothing to fear from him in the future. Now in the matter of this security, the following observation must be made: If any one, after injuring me, is at once led by remorse to ask forgiveness, and to make amends for the damage,

I am obligated to be reconciled to him, and I may not properly demand any further security from him than a renewal of his promise. For the fact that he repented of the act of his own accord, and voluntarily came to seek his pardon, constitutes a sufficient proof of his full intention to do me no further harm. But when repentance has been wrung from a man by force, and he has been brought to seek forgiveness only after his powers of resistance have been exhausted, his mere promise appears to be slight security. Therefore, with such a man, either his power to do harm must be taken from him, or some other restraint must be laid upon him, so that in the future he may not be an object of fear to us, since his malice, once expressed and not properly reformed, has made him an object of constant suspicion.

4. But that which is lawful for those who live in natural liberty, and who secure their safety by their own strength and on their own judgement, is by no means allowed those who live in states, especially in relation to their fellow-citizens. For they are required so to restrain a violent self-defence against citizens, be they such permanently or temporarily, as to make use of it only when time and place do not 187 allow them to seek the aid of a magistrate in order to avert that injury by which their life, and something as precious as life, or some irreparable good,¹ are put into instant peril. And yet even then one may only repel the danger, while revenge and security that there will be no repetition of the offence in the future, are left to the decision of the magistrate. For although laws are otherwise supreme in states, and, as Cicero, On Laws, Bk. III [xviii], says: 'Nothing is so contrary to law and right [. . .] as to carry anything by violence and agitation in a sound and constitutional government,' yet only in a case of this kind, and 'when arms are raised are they silent, and do not expect themselves to be waited for, when he who waits will have to suffer an undeserved penalty before he can exact a merited punishment'. (Y.) [For Milo, iv.] Add Gellius, Bk. IV, chap. xiv; Quintilian, Declamations, xiii [11]: 'For this reason we received officials and laws from our ancestors, namely, that no man should be the avenger of his own grievance; and if private revenge is going to repeat crime, endless occasions for wicked deeds would confute themselves.'

By such principles as these it is easy to settle the questions, which are raised by writers at one time or another, as to the degree of innocent self-defence.

5. Some have raised the question, whether an assailant may be repelled in a way that involves his death, who had intended not to attack me but some one else, and who had no evil intent upon me. On this point Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 3, lays down the fundamental principle, that the right of defence primarily and per se arises from the fact that nature commends every man to himself, and that therefore he cannot avoid making every endeavour to secure his own safety, but not from the injustice and sin of him by whom the danger is threatened. And so the innocence of my resistance is established by the fact that the other man had no right to attack and kill me, and I was under no obligation to meet death without resistance. Furthermore, since the love of self far surpasses all other considerations in such a situation, a man, when exposed to equal danger with another, if he follows the law of nature cannot do other than look out for himself rather than for another; and since I do not deserve the danger brought on me by another, it is for that reason less odious that the damage turn back upon its author.

After this much has been established it is easy to decide the particular cases which can be given on this score. For if a madman, or some one excited by nightmares, or a lunatic (such men as are said to walk armed through the streets at night), should threaten me with death, inasmuch as he has no right to attack me, and my life is quite properly my own foremost interest, there is no reason why I should place my safety second to his. But this, of course, is based on the supposition that I was able to avoid the threatened danger in no other way, a point which is not so carefully observed in the case of those who attack me with evil intent. The same can be said of the man who, while acting with good faith in the capacity of a soldier, makes the mistake of attacking me as an enemy. For since an enemy could also resist him why should I, who am not at war with him, be expected to offer him my throat? And it is a witness to his imprudence that he forces a friend to take the guise of an enemy, when he should have known against whom he had to make war. The same rule can be applied in the case of the man who was going to lie in wait for his enemy, and falls upon me by mistake. For why should I, because of the aggressor's error, be put into a worse condition than some other person against whom he perhaps had good reason to be angered? In fact the aggressor is guilty of breaking the Lex Cornelia de Sicariis.¹ For whatever error there was in the person, there was none in the undertaking, and he had the desire and made the attempt to commit murder. Add Digest, XLVII. xviii. 18, § 3; Grotius, Sparsio Florum, on Digest XLVIII. viii. 14.

6. As a guide for their exercise, cases of innocent defence commonly require a danger that is at hand, and, as it were, right upon one, and they do not allow a mere suspicion or uncertain fear to be sufficient cause for one person to attack another. Indeed, on this point, no entirely accurate distinction is made between natural liberty and civil status. For although in both the so-called point of danger is only intelligible with some latitude, nevertheless, to those living in natural liberty, a far greater range is allowed, in which to exercise a violent defence, than in the case of those whose safety is encircled by the protection of states.

Now since we are obliged by nature to cultivate peace with others, it is assumed that every one will meet that obligation, unless he is shown by clear signs to be contrary minded, and unless it is clear that he will not obey sound reason, which urges him to this course. But since a great part of mankind is prone to break this obligation, whoever cares for his safety will early surround himself with innocent means of defence, as, for instance, block up the passage before those who plan hostile acts, store up arms and like munitions to repel an attack or deliver an assault, find allies for himself, carefully observe the undertakings of others, and take similar precautions. For that state is properly considered wise which thinks of war even in time of peace. And although for the innocent a great defence has been established in divine providence, yet it is idle for the man who sinks into sluggishness, and takes insufficient thought for his affairs, to expect interventions from heaven on his behalf. Nay, even we who live in commonwealths, where our property is protected against thieves and ruffians by the secure sanction of penalties, hold it a fault of the head of a household if he fails to close the doors at night and to make fast his chests and closets. So the Romans used to seal with their signet ring even the most ordinary utensils against the thievery of their servants, although they had over them the power of life and death. See Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II, chap. i.

Now although no real injury is done another by such uses of defence, still, if I am to attack another under the name of my own self-defence, signs are required, forming a moral certainty, of his evil design upon me, and intention of harming me, so that, unless I anticipate him, I may expect to receive the first blow. Among these signs, whereby I secure the right to use force on my own volition, there should by no means be included a man's mere power, unusually outstanding and far above our own strength, especially when it has been increased by his own proper industry, or the kindness of providence, with no oppression of other men. It would be inhuman malice to envy one the resources he had gained in such a way, or to work for their destruction. And certainly it is crude reasoning for some to insist that he who has the power to harm us also wishes to; therefore, cut him down without any further reasons, if you value your safety. Surely such a principle destroys every kind of social life among men, and those who are quoted as authority for it are either unfit to be listened to, or else they are writing of innocent precaution, or of such as have given sufficient proof of their design to do harm. And to the saying of Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. XI, letter xxviii: 'Why, even slaves have always been free to fear at their own will rather than at the behest of another' (S.), is opposed the no less acute remark of Vibius Crispus, in Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VIII, chap. v [15]: 'Who has given you permission to be so much in fear?' (W.) And Cicero himself says, in the oration, For Tullius, as quoted by Quintilian, Bk. V, chap. xiii [21]: 'Who has ever laid down such a maxim, or to whom could it be permitted without danger to the whole community to kill a man because he says he is apprehensive of being killed by him?' (W.) Nor should the sin committed by one man or another be used as a rule of conduct. Add Alberico Gentili, De Jure Belli, Bk. I, chap. xiv. Yet, since a man may make a wrong use of his power, innocent precautions, as they are called, should be taken early.

But even if a person shows the desire as well as the ability to work harm, still even this fact gives me no immediate reason to proceed against him, if he has not yet put his purpose into action against me. For because a man has harmed others is no sufficient proof that he will also harm me, especially since special reasons, which are not to be found in my case, may have incited him against others. And an injury done to another does not give me as yet a sufficient reason to attack the aggressor, so long as the injured person, as well as the aggressor, are bound to me only by the ties of humanity. Although it may well be that I am under a special obligation to the injured party, when, for instance, I had agreed upon his plea to lend him my aid. Indeed, it most highly accords with the nature of social relations, for one person, although visited with no injury, to be able to agree to add his strength to that of another, in order to ward off from him an unjust act of violence, although he is also united by the common bond of humanity with him from whom the wrong arises. For with those who have no concern in the matter, the receipt of an injury should always solicit their sympathy or aid, and the infliction of an injury their disapproval; since the position taken in Exodus, ii. 14, obtains only in a civil status. But if there be added a well-grounded suspicion that the man, after making away with another, will also turn upon me, and employ his first success to the advantage of his next attempt, I should make all the greater haste to answer the call of the victim, since his preservation makes secure my own safety. And a man is wise if he strives to put out a fire in his neighbour's house, lest, when it has burned down, the fire pass to his own dwelling. 189

And, indeed, when it is established by clear proofs that a man is intent upon doing us some injury, even though he has not yet made any open attempts to do so, those who live in natural liberty shall be at once allowed to undertake violent self-defence, and anticipate the obvious wrong, provided there be no hope that, when he has been approached as a friend, he will put off his evil intention, or that such an appeal will be detrimental to our own interests. For no one is obligated to wait for or to receive another's attack, so that he may base the justice of his violent defence upon the plea of necessity. And so, in such circumstances, that man should be regarded as the aggressor who makes the first move to employ violence upon another, or who was the first to conceive the plan of harming another, and prepare himself to put it into execution, although the other, on observing his preparations, may have used dispatch, and done away with him while he was delaying his plans. For self-defence does not require one to receive the first blow or only to elude or ward off the blows which are aimed; but he also is entitled to the claim of self-defence who anticipates a person that is still planning offences. Demosthenes, Philippics, III [17]: 'For whoever contrives and prepares the means for my conquest is at war with me, before he casts a dart or draws the bow.' (K.) Thucydides, Bk. VI [xxxviii]: 'For the thoughts of our enemies must be punished before they have ripened into deeds. If a man does not strike first, he will be the first struck.' (J.) Procopius, Persian War, Bk. II, chap. iii [50]: 'For they break the peace, not who may be first in arms, but they who may be caught plotting against their neighbours in time of peace. For the crime has been committed by him who attempts it, even though success be lacking.' (D.*) Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [III. xv]: 'One must not only look upon those people as enemies who fight against us by sea or by land, but also those who are prepared¹ for either kind of warfare.' (Y.) Add Alberico Gentili, Pleas of a Spanish Advocate, Bk. I, chap. ix; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. IX, tit. iv, chap. 6.

7. But, as a matter of fact, an equal licence is by no means allowed those who live in states. For they can always repel of their own accord an invader, when their concern is with a stranger, but they cannot attack him while in preparation, or seek revenge after he has inflicted an injury, without orders from their sovereign, lest the state by chance be embroiled in an untimely war. And the same rule is to be observed with far greater care in regard to a fellow-citizen. For I am under no circumstances to attack the latter, if I hear he is preparing to injure me, 190 or if I find him making fierce threats, but he should be haled before our common sovereign, and made to give bond to keep the peace. If he refuses to do this, then it will be proper for me to secure my safety in the same way as if I were living in a state of natural liberty. And so those moralists are highly absurd whom Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 5, quotes to the effect, that 'A man can be lawfully killed if it has been ascertained that he has formed a plot, or is preparing an ambushade, or that he is putting poison in our way, or that he is making ready a false accusation and false evidence, and is corrupting the judicial procedure'. (K.) Nor is their absurdity in any way relieved by their added restriction, 'if the danger cannot be otherwise avoided, or it is not sufficiently clear that it cannot be avoided,¹ since, indeed, a little delay may point the way in many instances to a number of means of escape, and to many chance happenings, while many a thing can occur between the cup and the lip. They must surely suppose¹ a civil state, since unjust sentences, accusations, and testimony can be found only in a state. But if we give citizens, in resisting such things, the right to inflict death, what need will there be of a magistrate? Nor, as a matter of fact, is a man in any danger of being condemned if he can prove that a calumny has been invented against him. But if a person cannot satisfactorily prove all this, and chooses none the less to have recourse to slaughter, he will in no wise escape the penalty of the Lex Cornelia. But if a man is being actually attacked by force, and is reduced to such extremities that he is unable to call the help of a magistrate or of other citizens, then he may, in order to ward off from himself the onslaught of his assailant, go to any lengths against him, not, however, with the intention of securing revenge for the injury by his death, but only because his own life cannot be snatched from its present peril without killing him. And so, after the danger is avoided, it will not be allowable for him to pursue his assailant, and to cut him down in flight. See Digest, XLIII. xvi. 3, § 9.

8. From all this it is evident that in states the time for making an innocent defence is set within very narrow bounds, and even reduced to a point, yet not without some latitude, in which a slight excess is scarcely noticed by the judge. And so, although a discerning judge may easily reach a decision on the innocence of the defence, from the circumstances of each case, yet it seems possible to lay down the general rule that the beginning of the time at which a man may, without fear of punishment, kill another in self-defence, is when the aggressor, showing clearly his desire to take my life, and equipped with the capacity and the weapons for his purpose, has gotten into the position where he can in fact hurt me, the space² being also reckoned as that which is necessary, if I wish to attack him rather than to be attacked by him. For instance, if some one rushes at me with a drawn sword, and there is sufficient evidence that he wants to cut me down while I have no sure place of refuge, but am armed with a gun, I have a right to fire at him while he is still at some distance, and cannot yet reach me with his sword, lest I should be unable to use my weapon if he got too close. And the same is more true of bows and similar weapons, which are of no use in too narrow a space.³ Also, if a man rushes up with the intention of killing me, armed with weapons of shorter range, while I have one of longer range, I am not expected to wait until he comes within a space where he can reach me with his weapons, but before he reaches

³ [For spacium read spatium.—Tr.]

that point I will be allowed to receive him with my weapon. This is what the Roman law calls 'to meet a danger in time, which is held to be better than to seek revenge after its consummation', Code, III. xxvii. 1. And this space¹ of time for innocent defence lasts until the aggressor has been repulsed, or has retreated of his own accord, either 191 because he has been struck with repentance at the very moment of his deed, or because his attempt has miscarried—supposing his sword has been broken, or his gun has missed fire, or he has not hit his object—so that for the moment he is no longer able to do any damage, and we have a chance to betake ourselves to a place of safety. Because vengeance for an injury done, and a guaranty against the future, is the business of the judge. See Digest, IX. ii. 45, § 4.

Whatever citizens of a state run over this space of time in killing their aggressors cannot free their defence from all blame. And so there is no sense at all in the statement of Baldus, as given by Sichardus, on the passages from the Digest just quoted: 'If any one should even say to me, "When I meet you again, I am going to kill you," I am able to take his life without penalty, either at the time he makes his threat, or when it is most convenient for me.' For although I am not expected to wait until he tries to fulfil his threat, still there is another way, in a state, whereby I can and should protect myself from death, even when it is well known, from his previous record, that he is not over-precise in carrying out his threats. And this last condition is added by some in order to modify the opinion expressed by Baldus.

9. The statement, which some add here, that 'the killing of a person in self-defence is excusable only if the danger could not be avoided in any other way', should be interpreted not too strictly, but with some latitude which is allowed to the excited state of one's mind, usually brought on by the imminence of so great a danger. Such a state does not permit a person to survey all the ways of escape with the same care as is his who is free from danger, and enjoys a calm mind. And just as it is rash to descend from a safe place in order to meet a man who is threatening or challenging you, so, if a man attacks me in an open place, I am not expressly obligated to flee, unless there chances to be a place of refuge at hand to which I can retreat without danger, nor am I bound always to retreat. For thereby my back must be turned to him, and a misstep furnishes an added danger, while when once you have been thrust back a step it is not so easy to gain it again.

Nor is my defence faulty because I did not interrupt some undertaking which was enjoined upon me by my duty, or was within my liberty. So, for example, if I slay a man who attacks me, while I am in the street, and about my own business, I am by no means blameworthy, because I would not have run into any danger if I had remained at home. For of what use would be the sanctity of the public security, or our liberty, if they could not be utilized because of unseen perils with which another may threaten us in his knavery?

The following remark of Theodore Balsamon, Commentaria in Canones . . . et in Epistolas Canonicas, canon 43, is certainly absurd: 'Whoever commits murder in defence of his person shall not suffer the punishment for homicide if he killed his assailant because the latter had given him a mortal wound or some similar hurt; but he shall be held guilty of murder if he dispatched his aggressor after he had received but a slight and curable wound.' And they have displayed an idle interest who have concerned themselves so anxiously with the question, 'whether an equality of arms is necessary for an innocent defence.' As if attackers always announce their assault beforehand, and what arms they will use, so that one may have time to get the proper arms! Or as if such defence should be carried on by the laws of gladiatorial combat, in which those who fight to the death in pairs for the sake of the spectacle that they afford, are armed with similar or equivalent weapons!

But it should also be mentioned, in this connexion, that a man cannot claim innocent defence as his plea if he has been challenged by another to a duel, since by putting in an appearance he is in a situation where he must himself die if he does not kill his opponent. For the laws forbade him to meet the danger. Therefore, in weighing such a case, no consideration is taken of the danger, while the man can properly be visited with the penalty for homicide as well as that which has been laid down only for those who engage in a duel.

10. The further question is often raised, whether it is lawful to kill a person who intends not to take one's life but only to mutilate one, 192 when his attempt cannot be repelled in any other way. This question can safely be answered in the affirmative when it concerns the natural state, for nature has commended the integrity of our members to us with so tender a sense that we cannot avoid protecting it in every way possible, and the mutilation of any part of our body, especially a more noble one, is regarded as not much less of a loss than that of life itself. Nay, by such a mutilation life itself is often endangered, and it cannot be always so clear whether the man will not go to farther lengths against me. A further point is, that the man who thus threatens me is my enemy who, so far as in him lies, has given me full licence against him. Moreover, in a civil state, laws scarcely seem to bind citizens to such non-resistance that they should allow themselves to be mutilated rather than go to the farthest extreme in repelling another's violence, especially since this patience seems too much for man's resolution. Surely it would be too much to demand it in favour of a malicious aggressor. But the prosecution for such an injury, when once received, is to be left to the magistrate.

11. On the same plane with defence of one's life is held by practically all people that of one's chastity, which may properly be preserved even to the death of its violator. Such great favour is accorded chastity, because its preservation is held to be the greatest glory of women, while their weakness is an added consideration which must be defended by every possible means against the baseness of foul-minded men. Quintilian, Declamations, cccxlix: 'You forced a girl to an injury than which war has nothing more severe.' And since legislators in states might properly inflict capital punishment upon the debauchers who use force, they saw fit also to allow all virtuous women to defend, even to the death of their violator, that which once violated cannot be recovered. Among the Hebrews, as Selden, Bk. IV, chap. iii, tells us, such indulgence was shown to the defence of one's body and chastity, that not only might the person attacked repel the assailant to his death, but also a second party might defend the innocent person, and even kill the assailant, and this not merely if a person's life was in danger, but even if the assailant were seeking to commit sodomy, or to assault one's betrothed. See Law of the Visigoths, Bk. III, tit. iii, chap. 6: Constitutiones Sicularum, Bk. I, tit. xxii. For this reason the decision of Gaius Marius was highly praised, because he freed, and crowned as well, a soldier who had killed Marius' own nephew, a military tribune, when he made improper advances to him. Plutarch, Marius [xiv, p. 413]. Plato, On Laws, Bk. IX [p. 874 c]: 'Any one who does violence to a free woman or a youth shall be slain with impunity by the injured person or by his or her father or brother or sons.' (J.) Augustine, On the City of God, Bk. I, chap. xviii, says: 'The purity of the body is not lost so long as that of the mind remains, even though the body suffer violence,' (add Gratian, Decretum, II. xxxii. 5. 1, 4; Plautus, Amphitryo [1142]: 'She has done naught to merit thy reproach: my power was on her.' (N.) Seneca, Hippolytus [735]: 'No circumstance but will can make impure.' (M.)) But it does not follow from this that violent debauchers cannot be repelled by any means at one's disposal, just as it does not follow that, because a pious man, after death, is translated to a happier life, he should not oppose a highwayman with all his might.

Here we may well note, however, that, as Lysias, Orations, i [33], says, by Attic law the man who seduced a woman by persuasion was more severely punished than he who used force. He adds as the reason:

For those who achieve their purpose by means of violence, the Athenian law thought, would be hated by their victims; but those who use persuasion so corrupt the minds that wives become addicted to them rather than to their own husbands, and they control the whole household, and make it impossible to tell whether the children are sons of husbands or of adulterers.

193 Libanius, Declamations, ii. 193 [iv. 71]: 'It is much more wicked to persuade a woman to unchastity than to force her to it by violence.'

12. There is also a famous question, whether the danger of receiving a box on the ear, or a similar affront, gives the right to kill the offender. Now Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 10, thinks that it 'does not offend expletive justice'. His position is as follows: Inasmuch as expletive justice is violated, when something to which a man had a complete right is not given him, or something is done him which he had as complete a right not to receive, he who is killed, because he threatened to box another's ears, cannot complain that expletive justice has been violated in his case. For whoever injures another has in himself no longer any right to keep the most extreme penalties from being visited upon him by the other party; or, in other words, he gives the injured person the fullest right against him, although other considerations may often prevent a person from using his right to the full. Nor is it possible for others to urge, as an objection, that equality which should otherwise be observed in justice. For equality prevails chiefly in the exchange of commodities, and the distributions of what belongs to several. But ill deeds, which are mutually exchanged as if war prevailed, are not generally referred in detail to equality, nor need they be. And the statement of Grotius, that 'the way of killing in war should be patterned after the civil custom and manner of reparation and restitution', has the limitation 'in so far as this is possible', and so this moderation does not arise from any right, which inheres in the foe, but from the generosity and virtue of his opponent. Grotius adds further: 'Charity as such does not obligate us to swallow¹ such an insult in favour of the offender,' although² 'the teaching of the Gospel does not permit that an injury³ of this nature be repelled by such violent means.'

Now we have shown above that, in a natural state, a person cannot be expected to endure even a moderate injury, and especially a repeated one, without using extreme means to repel it. It is told of even the most upright king that he avenged by a war of annihilation an insult offered to his ambassadors. 2 Samuel, x. 4 ff.

But there is grave doubt whether to kill a man in repelling a box on the ear may properly be permitted in states. To be struck on the ear is, indeed, a very great offence, the reason apparently being that among many peoples of Europe that is the treatment of servants or of those who are subject to some menial restriction. Therefore it is the custom in many places to give those who receive the right to carry arms, or who leave the rank of apprentice, a box on the ear, so that they will be reminded of their former estate, and recognize that from then on such treatment no longer befits them. Therefore a box on the ear involves the greatest indignity, as if one who bears arms were unworthy to do so or is not to be reckoned among free men. But it is to be noted at this point that such a blow does not appear to be an insult unless it is given before a person has prepared himself to receive it, for it is a mark of servants, and those still unable to carry weapons, to have to offer their face to blows. Therefore, it will not, properly speaking, be a blow of this kind if men in a quarrel strike one another in the face, or if one is hit in the face while his guard is up. And so it is scarcely clear how a man who is bearing arms, and has them ready for his defence, can receive such a blow as an insult.

Furthermore, it cannot be that a man's honour is touched by an affront of this kind, for one's honour would surely be in a precarious state, if it lay exposed to the whim of any impudent fellow. And whatever contempt is to be found in such an act, can easily be removed or compensated for by the magistrate, in imposing a heavy fine on the offender, and making him show in public some marks of respect to the man whom he has affronted. As to the reputation for bravery, which the common sort feel injured by such an affront, especially if offered to soldiers, such reputation is not maintained only by a private sword-bout, or some man-to-man affray. For that man is sufficiently brave 194 who maintains with all his might the station assigned him by the state, and there are opportunities to show one's bravery far more splendid than those that come by losing control of one's anger, contrary to reason and the laws of the state, or by running the risk involved in useless fights. But if, as often happens, the sword is suddenly drawn at such an affront, and the man with whom the injury began is badly wounded, or killed, in the ensuing struggle, it is reasonable that a relatively light penalty be imposed on the other person. But the position maintained by some should by no means be allowed, namely, that it is not only right, in avoiding a box on the ear, to kill a person, but that the second party can even kill the first in order to recover his honour, if the man has fled after the blow was given. See Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit.

But it should be added that, although things ought to be measured by the judgement of wise men, and not by that of the mass of mankind, still, if in any state deep disgrace attends any special kind of injury, those who inflict it upon others should be visited with the most severe punishment, since not all men have enough strength of mind, nor will the standing which many have in a state permit them, to be an object of contempt and ridicule in the eyes of a majority of the citizens. And so I do not see how the magistrate can have the right to be angered at any who maintain, in a time-sanctioned manner, the regard accorded them by the crowd, when they have experienced in addition such injuries as greatly detract from their esteem in the public mind. And hence the magistrate who would forbid duels and combats of individual citizens must enact the most severe penalties against those who give another a cuff on the ear, or give him an insult to which especial disgrace attaches in the state. For the custom of civil life does not support the refinement of Grotius, to wit, that, since 'honour is an opinion of excellence, and he who endures such an injury shows himself excellently patient, it follows that he increases rather than diminishes his honour'. See Acts, xvi. 37.

13. From what has been said, it can be understood whether one who is attacked by another is required to flee, if possible, and so the killing of the assailant is not lawful, unless every means of flight has been cut off. Here it is clear that in a state of nature no right belongs to the assailant, by which the other man is required to avoid his attack by flight. For even when flight is preferred to a combat, it is not for the sake of the attacker, but because it seems more convenient for the person attacked; 'feet are the weapons of hares' says Oppian, The Chase, Bk. IV [35]. Therefore, since commonwealths in their relations to one another are in a natural state, no one would maintain that when, for example, one king unjustly attacks another king, the latter is obligated, if possible, to take to flight, lest he kill some of the attacker's troops, if he offers resistance.

But in civil governments flight is to be preferred at all times, if it be possible, to the killing of the aggressor. There is, indeed, no disgrace in such a flight, nor is it unworthy even of a military man, since it is not resorted to because of cowardice, or neglect of duty, but because reason finds no ground for a display of bravery in such a case, if a citizen, from whom a magistrate can easily make me secure, has to be killed unnecessarily. But we have added that recourse must be had to flight, if it be conveniently possible. For it cannot be believed that a man must always turn his back to his assailant, or retreat before him, since the former course exposes him to wounds, and by the latter, danger threatens him in a misstep, while once we have turned, we are more exposed to dangers; and when a person has once begun to flee, if perhaps he has no further space¹ left for retreat, or his assailant runs more rapidly than he, he cannot so easily take up a position to meet the charge of his adversary. Therefore, when there is no place of refuge near, to which one can safely withdraw, a man who opposes his breast to the assailant, rather than lay himself open to his blows by flight, has not overstepped the bound of innocent self-defence.

Finally, Grotius, loc. cit., properly censures those also who claim that 'a man may properly be killed if he has said something about us 195 which may be held to have injured our standing among upright people'. As if, should he say what is false, there is no better way to wipe out the stain made by his calumny, or, should he advance what is true, crimes should be kept hidden by committing other crimes! How much better is the counsel of Plato, On Laws, Bk. IX [p. 872 c]:

If any one kills a slave who has done no wrong, because he is afraid that he may inform of some base and evil deeds of his own, or for some similar reason, in such a case let him pay the penalty of murder, as he would have done if he had slain a citizen. (J.)

14. Now the above conclusions are very easily deducible from reason. But there are those who raise some scruple at this point, on the ground of the ordinances of the Christian religion, maintaining that, although it is permissible to kill a man who has no right to threaten your life, nevertheless more praiseworthy will be the conduct of the man who prefers to be killed rather than to kill. The reason for this is that, if the man is killed while committing a mortal sin, he incurs the danger of damnation; and that it does not seem to accord with justice for an injury against us to be repulsed by a greater one against another.

Now although the solution of this difficulty is the task of others, still those who wish to raise the question should bear in mind that there is no leisure in a time of such consternation, or in the heat of a struggle to the death, for one to examine with some care considerations of such a nature, since all his thoughts are centred on how his impending death can be avoided. Furthermore, the man who is attacked is not always so well prepared that he does not feel that he needs some time¹ to compose his spirit and adduce reasons for his conduct; in other words, 'that he may collect his baggage before he journeys forth from life', as Varro, On Farming, Bk. I, chap. i, puts it.

Furthermore, it hardly seems probable that I ought to be more concerned about the soul of another man than he is about my own. And so, if he threatens my life without concern for his own soul, why should I ransom his soul at the cost of my most precious possession, and an irreparable one as well? Pliny, Letters, Bk. II, ep. x: 'It is not altogether prudent in any man to expect from others what he will not do for himself.' (B.) This is especially true when it is not certain whether he will escape condemnation anyway even if he is not killed at this time. And it is generally accepted that no concern is paid to a danger into which a person rushes at his own fault, and from which he can extricate himself whenever he wishes. And in this case no danger, at least for the present, threatens his soul, provided he stops attacking me in this wilful fashion. Surely, moreover, that opinion gives a greater advantage to villainy than to piety, for by it a man is made, as it were, inviolable; since upright men would always be forced to offer their throats to villainous robbers, lest the latter, if resistance be offered, run the risk of eternal damnation. Compare Grotius, Bk. I, chap. ii, § 8, and chap. iii, § 3.

The saying of the Saviour, whereby we are commanded to 'love our neighbour as ourselves' seems capable of explanation, not so much by the degree of love, as by its sincerity, in that no one gives himself a false or counterfeit love. And the expression 'as thyself' seems to be a kind of proverbial expression, referring to a sincere and strong love. See 1 Samuel, xviii. 1, 3. But it is by no means to be inferred that, if love for oneself and one's neighbour cannot be satisfied at the same time, the former is to yield to the latter. See 2 Corinthians, viii. 13; Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, Bk. III [xxix]:

There is something excellent in this, and no less just than true, that we love those who ought to be most dear to us as well as we love ourselves; but to love them more than ourselves is absolutely impossible; nor is it desirable in friendship that I should love my friend more than myself, or that he should love me so; for this would occasion much confusion in life, and break in upon all the duties of it. (Y.)

Nor does it follow from Exodus, xxiii. 4, 5, and Deuteronomy, xxii. 4, that charity for one's neighbour should take precedence over our own advantage. For you cannot by any means conclude that, if our ass also has fallen into a ditch, we should help out another's ass rather than our own; or that we are bound to aid him, when the business 196 which must be neglected in rendering such assistance is more important than the ass itself. And besides, it may well be questioned whether a person who assaults one in the manner described may come under the designation of a neighbour. See Luke, x. 29 ff., where by a neighbour is understood every man who has need of our help and whom we have an opportunity to assist.

Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. VI, chap. xviii, criticized Cicero because he had said in his On Duties, Bk. III [xix]:

Oh, how he marred (says Lactantius) a simple and true sentiment by the addition of two words! For what need was there of adding these words, 'unless provoked by injury'? . . . He said that a good man would inflict injuries if provoked. Now he must necessarily lose the name of a good man from this very circumstance, if he shall inflict injury. For it is not less the part of a bad man to return an injury than to inflict it. For from what source do fightings and contentions arise among men, except that impatience opposed to injustice often excites great tempests? But if you meet injustice with patience, than which virtue nothing can be found more true, nothing more worthy of a man, it will immediately be extinguished, as though you should pour water on a fire. (C.)

Now as unnecessary combats, which could well be avoided, often arise through the unwillingness of the injured person to submit, so also wickedness is not always cured when submission is made. Nor does the virtue of patience, recommended so highly to Christians, constitute an obligation to undergo any and all kinds of injuries. He who strictly defends himself does not do it directly in order to injure another, but to preserve his own life, while it is not the man who repels a wrong, but the one who does it, that inflicts an injury. It is one thing to maintain an innocent defence, and another to plan an inhuman revenge. The latter can be considered as great an offence as to undertake some injury, the former cannot.

Furthermore, those who maintain that it is more praiseworthy to be killed than to kill add this exception: 'Unless the person attacked is a more useful person than the attacker.' But surely, at a moment of such peril, there is scarcely time to concern oneself always with the fine distinction as to which person is the more useful to the larger number of persons, and whether those who are dependent upon me need my services more than those who are dependent upon my assailant need his services. And it is, indeed, quite certain that the man, on whom the safety of many depends, and whose duty it is to guard others from attack, should not give up his own life in sparing an unjust assailant, even though he should be a man of such equanimity as to feel, like Piso, that 'it is as grievous to kill as it is to perish', Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I, chap. xxix; for by his own death he destroys the safety of many. Such are they who accompany travellers as their guards; likewise princes, commanders of armies, and others whose death brings after it the destruction of many persons. To them apply the lines of Lucan, Bk. V [685 ff.]: 'Since the existence and the safety of so many nations depend upon this life of thine, and the world so great has made thee its head, it is cruelty to wish to die.' (R.) So also the words of the friends of Alexander in Curtius, Bk. IX, chap. vi [8]: 'What god can promise us long duration of this mainstay and star of Macedonia, when you so often greedily risk your person in obvious perils, forgetting that you are thus exposing to grave risk the lives of so many of your fellow citizens?'

But it does not follow from this that, if the safety of no one, or of but a few persons, depends upon a man, he may not rightly kill an assailant whose life is perhaps of concern to a larger number of persons. On this score an unmarried man, or one without children, would never be able to kill an assailant who has a family, for fear that the latter's children and wife should be left alone and in want. And if some regard for his own wife and children was unable to restrain such a man from committing a crime, why should another man be expected to alleviate their privation at the cost of his own life? Still, the conclusions of Plato, On Laws, Bk. IX [p. 869 v c], are worthy of consideration: 'A son, even in defence of his life, and when about to suffer death at the hands of his parents, is allowed by no law to kill his father or his mother, who are the authors of his being, but is commanded to endure any extremity rather than this.' (J.*) He adds a little further on [p. 869 c]: 'If 197 brother kill brother in a civil brawl, or under other like circumstances, if the other have begun, and he only defended himself, let him be free from guilt, as he would be if he had slain an enemy.' (J.) But the following law which he adds is to be charged against the defects of the age in which he lived [p. 869 D]: 'If a slave have killed a freeman in self-defence, let him be subject to the same law as he who has killed a father.' (J.)

15. It is clear from what has thus far been said, that a murder within the limits of innocent defence casts no blemish upon the perpetrator, and so incurs no penalty. Nor does it belong to the class of deeds for which, although wrong in themselves, human law, in consideration of the violence of human passions and anger, allows impunity, as a husband is allowed to kill an adulterer. See Digest, XLVIII. v. 20, 22, 24, 32, and Lysias, i, Pro Caede Eratosthenis, where he shows that the Attic law allowed the killing not merely of him who was discovered with one's wife, but even with one's concubine; and, indeed, whoever was caught with one's mother, sister, or daughter, as is shown by Demosthenes, Against Aristocrates [lvi], where the reason is given:

In defence of those for whom we fight with the enemy, to protect them from insult and indignity, the law allows us to kill even our own people, if they insult and outrage them contrary to law. For since there is no race of friends and foes, but it is their actions that make the one and the other, the law permits us to punish as enemies those who commit acts of hostility. (K.)

Among the Persians, if a man has killed his wife along with the adulterer, he receives a new garment as a reward, Olearius, Itinerarium, Bk. V, chap. xxii. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. IX, chap. i, § 13; Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, III. iii. 13 ff. on Digest XLVIII.

But if, therefore, somewhere any penalty or expiation has been laid upon those who have justly killed some one, it either has no relation to death inflicted in innocent defence, or it was introduced without reason; or else it was formulated to the end that it might be understood how great a crime it is to shed human blood in unjust murder, since even the justifiable taking of life seems to need some satisfaction. Philo Judaeus, Life of Moses, Bk. I [lvii], writes that Moses is said to have commanded the high priest to purify the men who had just returned from fighting with the enemy; for even though the slaughter of the enemies of one's country is according to law, still he who kills a man, even though justly in self-defence, and because he has been attacked, still appears to be guilty of blood by reason of his supreme and common relationship to a common father; on which account those who had slain enemies were in need of rites of purification, to cleanse them from what was looked upon as a pollution. (Y.*)

But the benefit of an asylum, which involved the punishment of temporary exile, does not seem to have served the man who had undertaken to save his life by killing his assailant, but only the one who had committed involuntary manslaughter, yet such as he could have avoided, had he shown due diligence. Numbers, xxxv; Deuteronomy, xix; 1 Chronicles, xxix. 3, has nothing to do with defence, while David seems to have been forbidden to build the temple, not so much because he had received any stain from the slaughters of war, as because he who had secured for himself so much glory from war should not deprive his son of the opportunity to gain fame by the achievements of peace.

The scholiast to Euripides, Orestes [820] [Homer, Odyssey XI. 109, etc.], says that it was an old custom among the Greeks, for those who had justly killed a person, to raise their sword after the act to the sun, in proof of their innocence, as if he who 'sees all things and hears all things' were called to be a witness to their deed. And yet these same persons were in need of some expiation, and were required to undergo a year's exile. An instance of such an exile is in Plato, On Laws, Bk. IX [pp. 865-6]; see Digest, XLIX. xix. 16, § 8, and Grotius, Florum Sparsio, ad loc. cit. In Athens, also, cases of murder, which a man maintained he had committed justly, were tried in a special court called the Delphinium, from the temple of Apollo Delphinus, as is told by Demosthenes, Against Aristocrates, and the scholiast to Aristophanes, Equites. Also among the Ethiopians, whoever had committed an involuntary homicide was exiled, until he had been purified by the Gymnosophists. See Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VI [v]. In Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. II [720 ff.], Aeneas says: 'It would be a heinous sin for me, just come from so bloody a war and from recent slaughter, to touch <the holy objects>, until I have washed¹ myself in a running stream.' (B.) In Canon 18 of the Council of Nantes, held under Pope Formosus,² the question is thus treated:

If any one by accident and without intention has committed homicide, let him repent for forty days on bread and water, and after this term let him be separated for two years from the public prayers of the faithful, and let him not communicate or offer; after two years let him offer in public prayers, but not communicate; after five years let him be received into full communion, but let the abstinence from meat continue at the discretion of the priest.

But not even this canon would be concerned with defence, and is perhaps more rigorous than is just. In the same way the matters in the Laws of the Lombards, Bk. I, tit. ix, chap. 19, and Capitularies of Charles, Bk. IV, tit. xxvii; Bk. VII, tit. ccxcv, it would seem, need not necessarily be applied to that homicide which is within the bounds of innocent defence, or, if they do, they stand properly convicted of too great severity. De Mornay, also, on Digest, I. i. 3, says that to this day judges in France most carefully observe the rule that defendants in trials of this sort are almost never acquitted without at the same time being condemned to make special contributions to the poor, or sometimes also Christian offerings for the soul of the dead person. This last seems to smack somewhat of superstition; although it is reasonable that the necessity for such a homicide should be a cause of grief to upright people.

16. Now the defence of one's life and limbs, as well as of one's virtue, as being irreparable possessions, has so much in its favour that it is free also from the restrictions of the positive divine law regarding the Sabbath (see 1 Maccabees, i. 32 ff.; Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Bk. XII, chap. viii). For those who thought otherwise are not without reason held up to ridicule by Plutarch, On Superstition, and by Agatharchides, as Josephus, op. cit., Bk. XII, chap. i, tells us. Add Grotius on 1 Maccabees, ii. 37. And so I wonder how the same writer, in his Against Apion [I, p. 1050 E], can feel that it was such a laudable thing for them to have set a lower valuation upon their own lives and their country's freedom than upon the observance of that law; unless you apply this judgement only to their intention.

Touching the defence of possessions, which are things that certainly can be restored, and are not all so absolutely essential to a man, the question may be raised whether extreme methods are to be employed in their preservation. For many would approve the words of Taxiles in Plutarch, Alexander [lix]: 'Why must we war and fight with one another, Alexander, if thou art not come to rob us of water or of necessary sustenance, the only things for which men of sense are obliged to fight obstinately?' (P.) Euripides, Suppliants [775 ff.]:

For the one loss is this
That never mortal maketh good again,—
The life of man, though wealth may be re-won. (W.)

The judgement and custom of all nations is clear on this question, since they allow a defence of one's possessions even to the death¹ of assailants. Nay, it is certain that most wars are fought so that others may be deprived, not of their lives, but of their possessions; and an enemy would cut a ridiculous figure if, in order to avoid being met with arms, he should maintain with all earnestness that he was come merely to carry off some property. Therefore, it is certain that to kill a man who undertakes to steal or destroy another's possessions involves no injury, even though such possessions cannot equal the life of a man. For in a natural state whoever threatens any kind of injury with evil intent becomes an enemy, and as such is protected by no law, inherent in him, against suffering the extreme consequences. And since another has no more right to take my possessions than to take my life, I also have no less right to defend them than to defend my life. Nay, since my life cannot be preserved without possessions, he who tries to deprive me of the latter, assaults the former as well. It is obvious also that civil society and the human race can in no way have security and peace, unless they have the power to ward off by extreme means 199 those who would carry off the things which men pursue with a very great love.

Now those who have perturbed themselves with great distress about this matter have rested their case on two hypotheses: first, that a just punishment should always be so nearly equal to the crime that the good of which the guilty person is deprived should be no greater than the injury or loss done the other party. It will be shown in another place that this is false. Second, that the damages done an unjust assailant in defence of oneself and one's property are properly speaking punishments, and so are managed according to the rules of vindictive justice. This likewise is false. For a punishment proceeds from a superior to a subject by reason of sovereignty, and its degree is set by a consideration of the public good. But defence is older than civil sovereignty and is found quite as much among peoples where no one has any sovereignty over another; while it is moderated by the instinct for one's own safety, and the necessity of preserving one's own possessions. But the natural licence of defence is markedly restricted among those who live in the same state, because the inner tranquillity of a state cannot continue if every one is granted the right to return hostilities for any kind of an injury. And so citizens may use violent defence only in so far as their natural liberty is not curtailed by the genius of civil society, as well as by civil laws. Now although a citizen may have been allowed, in beating off a fellow citizen who attacks him, to inflict greater harm than the assailant threatened him with (according to Demosthenes, Against Aristocrates [60], there was such a law in Athens whereby 'if any man resisting any unlawful seizure or violence shall immediately kill the aggressor, the law orders that the death shall not be punishable' (K.)); still the rule is that private citizens may not use extreme means in repelling injuries which are directed towards reparable things. For with little trouble and no confusion reparation can be secured by the exercise of public powers, but outside of states it can be secured from unwilling people only by means of war. And so there is no need for us to be so solicitous with Grotius, Bk. II, chap. 1, § 11, to balance off the object stolen against the life of the robber by favour toward the defender and hatred toward the robber. Unless we be willing to say with Boecler, ad loc. cit., that, since it is usually very difficult to decide in such a case what was within or beyond the law, it is not repugnant to nature to show indulgence and overlook a murder of this sort. It is, therefore, enough in states if a person does not overstep the bounds of defence set by civil laws. But if this has been done, it does not constitute an injury to the assailant, but merely an offence against the civil laws.

But if a person is killed in stealing a reparable thing, will that not be a sin against the law of charity? On this point we feel that there is only place for charity toward one who undertakes hostile acts if there is a lively expectation that by such means he can be moved to repent of his evil deeds and return to a life of peace. When this hope is shattered, he who spares an enemy is unfaithful to himself. But if reason persuades me that a possession, which is of little value, and therefore deserves no concern, should not be defended so zealously, let this not be out of any favour for the thief or robber, but because I would not go to so much trouble for a thing of little value, or because I would not seem too petty and avaricious.

17. At this point there should also be some discussion of that most famous law, as given in Exodus, xxii. 2, on the right to kill a thief who steals at night, but not one who steals in the daytime. This is like a law of Solon, which is thus stated by Demosthenes, Against Timocrates [cxiii, p. 735]:

If a man stole anything in the daytime of greater value than fifty drachmas, he might be taken off to the Eleven, and if he stole anything by night, it should be lawful to kill or wound him in pursuit or take him off to the Eleven, at the option of the party. (K.)

The reason for this law is given by Ulpian the Rhetorician [Scholia 200 to Demosthenes, Against Timocrates, cxiii, p. 735, l. 28]: 'For in the daytime a man can call for men to help him, but not at night.' Plato, On Laws, Bk. IX [p. 874 B]: 'If a man catch a thief coming into his house by night to steal, and he take him and kill him [. . .] he shall be guiltless.' (J.) The same law was written into the Twelve Tables [VIII. xii Bruns]: 'If any man commits theft at night and is killed, let his death be justified.' On this law Gaius remarks, Digest, IX. ii. 4. 1: 'The statute of the Twelve Tables allows any one to kill a thief who is caught at night, provided always the party gives notice of his intention with a shout.' (M.) Jacques Godefroy, On the Twelve Tables, observes that the last words, those about 'calling out', are an insertion of Tribonian. And that it was not in the Twelve Tables is proven by a passage in Cicero, For Milo [iii]: 'The Twelve Tables permitted that a nightly robber might be slain any way, but a robber by day if he defend himself with a weapon.' (Y.) M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. X [vi]: 'The law which permits a thief by night to be killed in any fashion whatsoever, does not speak merely of a thief who has been convicted, but simply of a thief in general.' Gellius, Bk. XI [xviii], where he tells how Draco assigned capital punishment for thieves, but Solon required only double restitution, adds that the Roman Decemvirs¹ took a middle course between the severity of the former and the leniency of the latter: 'They permitted a thief taken in the act to be put to death, if he either committed the depredation in the night, or if, when taken, he defended himself with any weapon.' (B.) The Twelve Tables required an outcry only in the case of the thief by day, when he defended himself with a weapon [VIII. xiii Bruns]: 'If men commit theft in the daytime, and defend themselves with a weapon, call on your fellow citizens and raise a cry. If they be slain then, let there be no penalty therefor.'¹ Compare Digest, IX. ii. 4, § 1, where in the same way the word 'equally' was interpolated by Tribonian. Although it is not unlikely, as Cujas, Observations, Bk. XIV, obs. xv, recognizes, that in the course of time, and on the authority of experts, this law was in part made less severe. And that is clear from Ulpian, Ad Edictum, Bk. V, whose words are preserved entire in Collatio Legum Mosaicarum et Romanarum, first published by Pierre Pithou. These laws in an abbreviated form are given in Digest, IX. ii. 5. Add Digest, XLVIII. viii. 9.

The reason for this change may have been that some persons would rush out of their houses and attack passers by, afterwards alleging that they killed them when they were in the act of robbery; or because there is not so good a chance to rob houses that are close together and well fortified, so that a robbery is scarcely possible without some negligence on the part of the householder. Compare Justin, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 6. And so Cujas, loc. cit., feels that this law of the Twelve Tables was no longer in force in cities and towns, but was maintained only in the country, basing his view upon Code, III. xxvii. 1. Although this last law does not concern thieves who endeavour to rob by stealth, but highwaymen and violent robbers, as is clear from the following reason: 'That they may find the death which they threatened, and themselves meet that which they were aiming at others.' However, this oft-quoted law is incorrectly explained by Sextus Caecilius, in Gellius, Bk. XX, chap. i [8], as applying to 'the treacherous violence of nightly plunderers'. (B.)

But the reason for the distinction between the robber by day and the robber by night seems to us to be mainly this: A robber by day may be caught, and the stolen property recovered, but this is not possible with a robber by night, when once he has made his escape from the building; nor can a man be recognized in the dark, nor, if he be, perhaps, recognized by one person, can he be convicted, while witnesses are not easily aroused from their beds. But in this statement that which seems to most people to cause the greatest difficulty is the assumption that, since the laws in question do not ordain capital punishment for robbers, it is absurd for greater licence against them to be allowed to private individuals than the highest civil authority has been willing to take to itself. We can reply to this that all the laws on the punishment of thieves presuppose that the thief is caught, and the stolen property is restored or compensated for. When this was done, they felt that a twofold, or fourfold penalty, according to the condition of their commonwealths, was sufficient. But it does not follow from this that, therefore, in a case where there would be no reparation, the laws could not allow citizens some greater privilege than that which was theirs in the condition of natural liberty. For legislators have not felt it necessary, in fixing penalties in states, to follow the privilege granted by the law of war in a natural state. Thus there are states where adultery is not a capital crime, and yet husbands are allowed to kill with impunity adulterers caught in the act. Nay, I suppose no one questions that, for those who enjoy natural liberty, an injury perpetrated or threatened to their bed is a sufficient cause for war, and every one knows what is the licence of war. And yet, upon the perpetration of adultery, the laws were not willing to extend the penalty for that crime to the point which the licence of war undertaken upon that score might allow. 201

You may apply to this question the point made by Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, chap. v, § 26. Since a civil magistrate often cannot take cognizance of offences of this nature they frequently go unpunished; and for that reason, whenever a penalty can be inflicted, it is made very severe, in order that the more boldness increases because of frequent impunity, the more it may be suppressed by fear of extreme punishment. But, as to the statement of the Roman law, that the thief by day may be killed 'if he defends himself with a weapon', it plainly means that I can kill a thief in order to protect my property, and not merely when he falls upon me with a weapon, but also when he endeavours to repel me with a weapon as I advance to take from him the stolen property.

18. In view of all this, it is clear that it is useless for some to advance, as the reason for this law about the nocturnal thief, that otherwise the crimes would go unpunished if the thief escaped in the night. Even in Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 12, there are some things which cannot be approved. He says: 'It was the desire of the legislators that no one should be killed for the sake of property merely.' (K.) We cannot deduce this from those laws which make mention of thieves who break into a house in order to make off with things secretly. Sometimes, indeed, in a night robbery it may happen that, in going to protect my goods, my life also may be imperilled. In such a case the murder of the thief is proper on a double count, while my innocence is not impaired on the ground that I apparently threw myself into the danger, by desiring to retain or recover my possessions. For I am engaged in a lawful and a practically necessary act, from which nothing can be imputed to me that happens through no fault of mine. But if a person were not allowed at all to kill another for the sake of his own property, I do not see how a man may be free from guilt who, without rashness, in defence of his property, threw himself into such a peril that he had either to kill or be killed. Just as a man pleads in vain for the indulgence of self-defence when, upon being challenged, he engages of his own accord¹ in a duel.

But a further reason which Grotius brings forward for this law does not seem to be sufficiently sound: 'That at night it is difficult to procure witnesses, and therefore, if a thief is found slain, it is easy enough to give credence to the man who alleges that he killed the thief in self-defence, especially if a dangerous weapon is found near the body.' (K.) Even if we concede that the Hebrew word can be taken as 'an instrument for cutting through', yet, if that was the reason for the law, it would have been clearer to have said, 'if he has been found with a weapon'. Although it does not follow that, if a thief has been discovered with a weapon, he therefore had designs upon the life of the man by whom he was killed. But it also does not follow from the law of the Twelve Tables that a day thief could not be killed, unless he had defended himself with a weapon; therefore, there is a presumption against a night thief that he did defend himself with a weapon. On the contrary, that law allowed a night thief to be killed 'in any manner'. In Digest, XLVIII. viii. 9, the words, 'if he was unable, while striving to save the article, to spare the thief without danger to himself', were added in later ages to the laws of the Twelve Tables. It cannot be shown that, before this addition, a man who killed a thief by night was guilty of homicide, even if witnesses were at hand by whom it could be established that the man who killed the thief was not in peril of his life from the intruder. The illustration of the maiden ravished in the fields has nothing to do with the case. For in this instance the law 202 expressly commands that it be assumed violence was offered her, but, in the case before us, nothing is found of any presumed danger to one's life. Nay, it is rather the way of thieves, not to fight, but to take to their heels. Yet we confess that, if a man catches a night thief, provided he can conveniently do so and, once his property has been saved, brings him before a magistrate, he acts far more generously than he who kills him when it was not necessary. Add also Groenewegen, De Legibus Abrogatis, on Digest IX. ii. 4, where he observes that the Dutch laws do not require that one should give notice of a night thief by raising an outcry. Compare Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VII, tit. ii, chap. 16; Law of the Burgundians, Addit. I, tit. xvi, chap. 1 and 2; Law of the Frisians, tit. v; Constitutions of Sicily, tit. xiii; Capitularies of Charles and Louis, Bk. VI, chap. xix.

19. The final question is, whether a man who was the first to commit an injury can rightly resist him who undertakes to secure revenge. Some answer this in the affirmative, for the reason that few men, who requite injuries according to their own judgement, take a revenge in proportion to the injury received. But we feel that the pronouncement should be made a little more precise. Now by the law of nature, he who offers another an injury is required to render satisfaction, while every one is expected to grant pardon for his offence to the man who entreats him and is repentant, after he has made reparation for the damage, and given security that he will not offend again. Quintilian, Declamations V [ix. 18]: 'The conclusion of hatred is always honourable; and, so long as hatred is nothing but the desire to do harm, a change of heart for the better has always something creditable about it.' Thus Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. I, § 7, commends in his own behaviour his readiness, 'To show oneself willing to be reconciled to those who have lost their temper and trespassed against one, and ready to meet them halfway as soon as ever they seem to be willing to retrace their steps.' (H.*) Add Idem, Bk. XI, § 8; Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxxiv; III. xxvi, xxvii, xlii. Thus among the Chinese, who hold moral philosophy above all studies, there is no one so cruel as to desire to revenge with death an injury done him, while whoever yields before another, and does not wish to hurt him, is considered a prudent and outstanding man. Neuhof, Descriptio Sinae, chap. i. Therefore he who refuses to make satisfaction, and resists one who asks for restitution, piles one injury upon another. But he who refuses the proffer of just satisfaction, and endeavours to secure vengeance entirely by arms, plans an unjust use of force and may properly be resisted. Compare Livy, Bk. IX, chap. i; Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 18, together with the remarks of Boecler, ad loc. An illustration of this point is the private combat described by Davila, De Bello Civili Franciae, Bk. XV, p. 1027.

CHAPTER VI

ON THE RIGHT AND PRIVILEGE OF NECESSITY

|--|---|
| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The kinds of necessity. 2. The basis of the right and privilege of necessity. 3. What right it gives a man over himself or directly over others. 4. What right it allows indirectly. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 5-7. What right it allows over the property of others. 8. What right the preservation of our own property allows us over the property of others. |

THE power of necessity is a phrase upon the lips of all men, because it lacks the restraint of law, and is understood to form an exception in all the rules of men, while it carries the right to do many things which, apart from it, were held to be forbidden. M. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxvii: 'Necessity is a powerful defence for the misfortunes of men.' Callimachus, Hymn to Delos [122]: 'Necessity is a great goddess.' Add the speech of Lentulus in Livy, Bk. IX, chap. iv. Whence this power arises, and how far it extends, is a matter worthy of very careful study, especially since some writers apparently attribute to it little or no efficacy in determining the morality of actions.

It should be observed, first of all, that Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II [lvii-lviii], makes a twofold division of necessity: that which is 'simple and absolute, which cannot be resisted on any account, and which can be neither changed nor weakened; and, secondly, necessity with limitations'. The latter, again, falls into three classes, as it concerns honourable conduct (which is very like the words of Pliny, Letters, Bk. I, ep. xii: 'The highest motive has for wise men the force of necessity'), or safety, or convenience. Of these three the first is the 'highest', the second 'close to it, the third, that of convenience, is of slight importance', and can never contend with the other two.¹ And although honourable conduct takes precedence over safety, yet now and then the latter can be preferred to the former if, in consulting for our safety, what for the present has been detracted from honourable conduct, may at some later time be restored by virtue and justice. When this is not possible, honourable conduct is to be preferred. Others would urge that whenever the necessity of safety is preferred to that of honourable conduct, it may be defended not so much on any ruling of right, and in any direct way, as on the excuse of human weakness, expressed by such words as indulgence, pity, and mercy; but the necessity of convenience has much less force whether for defence or excuse, unless the matter comes before a judge who has a greater regard for his own interest and prejudice than for right and wisdom.

But our first concern in this matter is to inquire what force the necessity of safety has to free some act from the obligation of general laws. Whether, in other words, we may sometimes do what the laws forbid, or neglect to do what they command, when, through no fault of our own, we are in such straits that we cannot secure our safety in any other way. Here it appears that whatever right, or privilege, or indulgence is allowed necessity proceeds only from the fact that a man cannot avoid straining every nerve for his own preservation, and therefore it is not easy to presume such an obligation to be resting upon him, as ought to outweigh the zeal for his own safety.

2. Of course no pious man can question the right of God, who is the absolute master of our life, and has but lent it to us for a while to lead at His pleasure, to lay upon us so strict a law that we should suffer death rather than depart from it one finger's breadth. Such a law was believed by the Jews, according to 2 Maccabees, vii, to be that on eating the flesh of swine. And this was entirely right, since the eating of swine's flesh was considered the same as a denial of the true faith. Had that not been the case, it would have been no sin, when there was no other food, to eat the flesh of swine, so as not to perish of hunger. But a civil power, as well, often lays upon a person such severe commands that a man should accept death rather than depart from them. The obligation of positive laws, however, is not always presumed to be so binding. For whoever passed these, or introduced among men particular ordinances, since they had as their purpose the promotion through these laws and institutions of men's safety or convenience, are supposed always to have had before their eyes the weakness of human nature, and how man cannot help avoiding and repelling whatever tends to his destruction. For this reason most laws, and especially positive laws, are understood to make an exception of a case of necessity, or to lay no obligation, when such an obligation will be attended by some evil, destructive of human nature, or too great for the common constancy of mankind; unless such a case is included expressly, or in the nature 204 of the matter. And so necessity does not cause a law here and now to be violated directly, or a sin committed, but it is presumed from the benevolent mind of the legislator, and from the consideration of human nature, that a case of necessity is not included under a law which has been conceived with a general scope. A passage bearing on this is Matthew, xii. 2, 4. Add Casaubon, Exercitationes ad Baronium, I, n. 9. The passage in Matthew shows that the substance and reason of that law does not command the presumption of such rigour that one should perish of hunger rather than eat the showbread. Palladius, De Re Rustica, Bk. I, chap. vi: 'Necessity keeps no holidays.'

However easily such concessions may be allowed in positive laws, it is a matter for further investigation whether they can be extended also to natural laws; especially whether what natural law commands or forbids to be done can be forborne in a case of necessity. Regarding the first question, the nature of affirmative commands requires that, in order for a man to be obligated here and now to the performance of some act, they presuppose the opportunity, matter, and ability necessary for an action; and these are always understood to be wanting, when something cannot be done unless I perish in the doing, for the casting away of love and care for oneself is classed among things which are impossible, and which surpass the ordinary constancy of men. Therefore, unless it is either expressly stated in a law, or understood from the character of the undertaking, that my life must be sacrificed rather than an act be neglected, affirmative laws are regularly understood to allow an exception for a case of supreme necessity, especially when a person was not to blame for falling into such a necessity. Consequently, I am not expected to give bread to a starving person, if I myself need it. See 2 Corinthians, viii. 13. Nor, if another is in danger of drowning, am I bound to draw him out, if I must perish in his place. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. II, chap. xv: 'I must give to him that wants, yet so that I do not want myself; I must help him who is perishing, yet so that I do not perish myself.' (S.)

But, as far as negative commands are concerned, this much is certain, first of all: No acts can properly be undertaken which tend directly to offend God; for instance, a man, to escape death, may not blaspheme or deny God, and renounce the worship of and obedience to Him. For, in view of the reason that God can certainly visit upon a man a far greater evil than natural death can be, it is highly probable that He will repay with some far greater reward the man who loses his life to God's glory. Carpyllides,¹ in Anthology, Bk. I [IX. lii. 5 f.]: 'Verily righteous men do not lose the reward of their piety.' It would be wrong to sin against the glory of God in order to avoid a lesser evil, although persons who give way before the pains of torture surely deserve compassion. But it should be observed, in connexion with those laws which cover the mutual duties of men, that there are certain precepts of natural law which presuppose some human deed or institution, that, as any one clearly recognizes upon a consideration of its end, should not be extended to a case of extreme necessity; and therefore the same exception also is in the law. It should, furthermore, be noted that a man cannot be said directly to have violated a law by some act unless the act is rightly imputed to him.

Now an act may proceed from a man in two ways, either as from a principal cause, or as from an instrumental cause. And the latter case again is of two kinds, either as it makes no motion, except such as is impressed upon it by the principal cause, and is opposed to its natural inclination, if it have such; or as it applies itself of its own and intrinsic impulse to perform some act, although the first cause impel and direct it. And so, if a man concur in some act in the second way, as an instrumental cause, the act may be imputed not to the principal cause alone, but to the man himself as well, as though it were his own act and had proceeded from him. But, if one concurs in the first way, the action will be imputed only to the principal agent, and not to the instrument. The further requirements for this case will be explained more fully below. 205

3. After these preliminary remarks, let us pass on to the special questions which are usually discussed in this connexion. Now it admits of no doubt that, although a man in general has no right over his own body, to destroy it at his pleasure, or to deform, or mutilate it, he will yet be allowed to cut off some part that is infected with an incurable disease, or that has been rendered useless by a wound, in order that his whole body may not perish, or that the well parts be not infected, or that the use of other parts be not impeded by some useless portion. It has been discussed above whether a supreme necessity allows some right over life, that is, whether a person may embrace an easy end so as to escape an ignominious death, or one that is attended with exquisite tortures. Let us now observe what right over others is allowed by necessity.

The use for food of the bodies of men, not slain by us, in cases of extreme famine, when all other means of sustenance are wanting, is certainly a thing deserving of every commiseration, but not in itself sinful. But it is hardly clear what judgement should be pronounced on those instances when, in times of famine, some among a number of men have been killed against their will, or upon selection by lot, since this involves a struggle between the law of homicide on the one hand, and on the other the gnawing of hunger, the stomach which has no ears to hear, and the fact that all must perish unless this saddest of all expedients is adopted. Homer, Odyssey, Bk. VII [216-17]: 'For nought is there more shameless than a ravening belly, which biddeth a man perforce be mindful of him.' (B. & L.) See 2 Kings, vi. 28-9; Deuteronomy, xxviii. 53; Lamentations, iv.¹ 10; Josephus, Antiquities of the Jews, Bk. IX, chap. ii; Jewish War, Bk. VI, chap. xxi; Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, chap. xl. Add also the story of the seven Englishmen who, when they were driven out into the open sea, and their food and water was exhausted, selected by lot one of their number who, to be sure, offered no objection, and killed him. With his blood and flesh they assuaged their intolerable thirst and hunger, and on coming to land were acquitted of homicide by a judge. Ziegler quotes this illustration from Nicholas Tulpius, Observationes Medicae, in his remarks on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 3. He feels that 'this was a heinous sin on the part of the sailors, in that they conspired to the death of one man, and, as it might have happened, to the death of themselves, and placed the peril of their bodies above that of their souls. Nor should any one of them have valued his life so little that he would do away with it to satisfy another's hunger. Nor should the others, in consideration of their stomachs, have shown such savagery toward their companion.' But it may be said in reply that it is too harsh to maintain that those persons have 'conspired to the death' of another, who feel that one person should be chosen by lot so that the rest, who would otherwise all perish together, might be saved. See Jonah, i. 7 ff. And so they needed to fear no peril to their souls by such an action. He holds his soul too cheap who throws it away without any such necessity. Nor can it be called cruelty when he who dies for the safety of all, suffers less agony in bowing his neck to the sword than the other does in giving the stroke.

I should like to have another case of this kind examined. In the event of shipwreck, if more persons leap into a boat than it can carry, and no particular person has any special right in the boat, shall not lots be cast to decide who shall be ejected? and may a person who refuses to abide by the lot be thrown overboard without further deliberation, on the ground that he is seeking the destruction of all? But we reserve our decision for the time being on such highly unusual examples.

4. A case of the following sort more frequently happens: where two men run into some actual danger to their life, from which both must perish, unless one of them does something, because of which the other, who would perish in any event, meets death a little sooner than he would otherwise. Or of necessity we indirectly throw in the way of another some peril of death or serious injury with the intention, not 206 of doing him any harm, but only of committing some act from which it is likely he will suffer harm; and yet we should much prefer to meet our necessity in some other way, and would lighten the injury to the best of our ability. We feel that just as an injury of this nature to another is not bound up with any sin, so he who experiences it should receive and consider it as a misfortune brought on by circumstances, for which he should bear no malice toward the person who did it. Some examples follow: If I, who can swim, should fall into deep water together with one who cannot, and he should grip me in his arms, as usually happens, while I have not strength enough to get both him and myself out, who could charge me with a fault if I thrust him from me with all my might, so that I may not perish with him, even though he could have been kept by me above the water for some few minutes? In the same way, when, in a shipwreck, I have seized a plank not large enough for two persons, and another person swimming toward me also wishes to get on it, apparently resolved to destroy me along with himself, apparently nothing prevents my using every kind of violence to keep him off. So also, when an enemy, threatening death, presses hard upon two men in flight, one of them may break a bridge behind him or close a gate, and so leave the other in immediate danger of his life, provided both cannot be saved together. Such a necessity frequently arises in war, so that a few must be left to their fate in order that the main body may be preserved. Arrian, Anabasis of Alexander, Bk. VI [xxv]: 'The care of individual persons was necessarily neglected in the zeal displayed for the safety of the army as a whole.' Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. IX [722 ff.]: 'When Pandarus beheld how their fortunes stood, what evil chance has changed the day, with all his might he backward rolls the gate on swinging hinge by his broad shoulder's strength, and many a friend excludes, and leaves them to contend as best they may.' (B.) The same author, in Aeneid, Bk. XI [883 ff.], tells how, when the Latin cavalry was defeated, 'Some shut the gates; nor dare to open to their friends, or within the walls receive them, although they beg and pray.' (B.) Compare Livy, Bk. XXVI, chap. xv, where the Thurians make an ignoble use of this excuse. Florus, Bk. II, chap. xviii, says of the Numantians: 'At last they determined to flee; but this their wives prevented, by cutting, with great treachery, yet out of affection, the girths of their saddles.' (W.) In the same way Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIV, [xxxii-xxxiii], criticizes it as a mistake of military tactics that, in the siege of the temple at the colony of Camalodunum, 'the veterans [. . .] did not remove their women and old men, reserving only the youth for their defence [. . .]'. (D.*) (Add Livy, Bk. V, chap. xl.) And by contrast he tells how,

Suetonius resolved, with the loss of one town, to save the whole province. Nor could the tears and wailings of those who implored his protection divert him from giving the signal for marching, and incorporating with the marching body those who would accompany him. Whoever stayed behind, whether from the weakness of sex, or the infirmities of age [. . .] fell beneath the rage of the enemy. (O.)

Yet, since such necessity was not yet upon him, Darius, in the account of Curtius, Bk. IV, chap. xvi [9], nobly refused to break down the bridge over the river Lycus, adding 'He had rather furnish a passage to his pursuers than leave other fugitives destitute of one'. (A.)

As an example of the first kind, suppose some one stronger than I pursues me intent upon my death, and, in a narrow passage through which I must flee, some one happens to meet me; if he will not make way when warned, or cannot do so for lack of time or space, I shall certainly have the right to hurl him to the ground and continue my flight, even though he be likely to receive some serious hurt from my blow, unless I happen to be under some special obligation to that person, so that I should of my own accord face danger in his place. But if the person who blocks another's flight should be unable to get out of the way, although warned, such as a child, or a lame man, whoever tries to leap or jump his horse over him, in preference to exposing his person to the enemy by any delay, will certainly deserve to be excused.

But the reason is obvious why the example, which some adduce, is not free from guilt: 'An officer, fleeing from battle with the enemy who are in pursuit, cuts down in the throng one of his soldiers who is in front of him, so that his own flight may not be delayed.' For the officer was strong enough to force a passage merely by his own momentum. Yet he will be excused if he happened to do some hurt with his weapons quite unintentionally. But if some one has blocked my path out of mere wantonness or lack of feeling, and refused to allow me some way to flee, I can knock him down directly as if he were an enemy, however much he may be hurt by such an act. Compare Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. V, chap. xvii, who is in no way opposed to our conclusions. But in general, just as every means to avoid danger to one's life enjoys great favour, so, on practically the same grounds, flight is defended or excused, although it be attended with some injury to those who are in the way, provided a person is threatened with some mutilation or other serious wound of his body. For whoever threatens such harm can be resisted by any means at one's disposal, and on the same grounds one's alarm excuses an unforeseen and unfortunate encounter, when danger is being avoided by flight.

5. Let us see, in the next place, whether the necessity of preserving our life gives us any right over the property of others, so that we are enabled to use it for our own advantage against the will of the owners, whether we seize it by stealth or by open violence. In order to answer definitely this question, it seems necessary to us to note, in a few words, the reasons for the introduction of different kinds of ownership, which are discussed in greater detail below. The most important advanced are, [1] that thereby the quarrels arising from the original community of ownership are avoided, and [2] that the industry of men is increased, in that each man has to secure his possessions by his own efforts. Certainly property was not distinguished with the purpose of allowing a man to avoid using it in the service of others, and to brood in solitude over his hoard of riches, but so that each man might be able to dispose of its use according to his pleasure, and that when he was minded to share it with others, he might at least have the opportunity to put another person under obligation to him. Therefore, after the introduction of the ownership of things, men were given the ability not only of carrying on commerce with signal advantage to all mankind, but also, after securing such means, of making a richer display of humanity and kindness to others, while before that time they could aid others only by their own personal service. See Ephesians, iv. 28.

Furthermore, such is the force of ownership, that a man is able himself to dispose of his property, even such as he is obligated to hand over. It follows from this, that a person may not himself lay hands at once on property owed him by another, but should demand of the owner that he hand it over to him of his own accord. If, however, the owner refuses of his own accord to meet his obligation, the power of ownership is by no means so great that property owed another may not be taken from an unwilling owner, through the authority of a judge in commonwealths, or, in a state of natural liberty, by the might of war. And although, from the point of view of mere natural right, a man is expected only on the basis of an imperfect obligation, in so far as it arises from the virtue of humanity, to aid another in the latter's extreme necessity, with property of which he himself has no such present need, yet nothing prevents this imperfect obligation from being strengthened by civil law into a perfect one. Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. vi, says that this was done by the Jews, where a man who had refused to give the alms which he should, could be compelled to do so by a court decision. Hence it is not surprising that they would not allow their poor to seize anything for their use from another, but only by their mere asking to receive from individuals, or the official collectors of alms. And so filching from another, even under extreme necessity, was held by them to be theft or robbery. But if such a precaution is not taken for the poor in some particular commonwealths, and if the obduracy of men of means cannot be overcome by prayers, while there is no means whereby a person may come to the aid of the man who is in want either of money or assistance, would you have him die of hunger? Can any human institution have such power that, if another neglects to do his duty toward me, I must perish rather than depart from the customary and usual manner of procedure? I should not feel, therefore, that a man has made himself 208 guilty of the crime of theft if when he has, through no fault of his own, fallen into extreme want of food necessary to maintain life, or of clothing to protect his body from the bite of cold, and has been unable either by entreaties, or money, or the offer of his services, to get others in easy circumstances, and even in luxury, to give them to him of their own accord, he should make away with them by violence or by stealth; and especially so if he intends to make good their value whenever a kindlier fortune may smile upon him.

It is idle to deny that such a necessity may arise. For let us suppose that a man is stranded in some foreign land without money, without friends, and unknown, because he has suffered shipwreck or had his money taken by robbers, or because, while he was abroad, his affairs at home had suffered a reverse. If no one be found who is willing to aid him in his distress and give him work, or if, as frequently happens, they should be led, by his elegant and undamaged clothes, to believe that he was seeking this assistance without good reason, must the poor man on this account die of hunger? It is true that, in Proverbs, vi. 30-1, whoever takes anything belonging to another in order to satisfy his hunger is called a thief, and is liable to punishment for theft. But it is clear to any one who examines the passage somewhat carefully that the thief meant there was by no means driven on by an extreme necessity, such as we presuppose, nor did he fall into such a state of starvation by the unkindness of fortune and without blame or laziness on his own part. For the context shows that he had a house and furniture sufficient for him to restore sevenfold, which he could have sold or pledged, had he set out to find a buyer or lender in times of plenty and peace; since it is not stated that the theft is supposed to have been committed in time of war, or because of the high cost of food. Furthermore, the man who had no further means of maintaining himself was supposed to sell himself into slavery. See Leviticus, xxv. 39; Selden, Bk. VI, chap. vii; Proverbs, xxx. 9, which last-mentioned passage is not opposed to our position.

Some advance the following as an illustration of this kind of necessity: A man in a foreign and unknown country is unjustly attacked, and there is no way of safety except by flight. Nearby there is a horse belonging to another person, which he apparently can find no way to return, since its owner is not known to him, and the horse must be taken a long distance away.

6. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 6, has undertaken to solve this difficulty in the following way: Those who first introduced the distinct ownership of particular things are understood to have added to it the limitation that the force of ownership, whereby others are excluded from the use of a person's own property, should expire, in case the other person cannot be kept alive without the use of the same; and so, in a case of such necessity, private property, without which another must surely die, is understood to revert to original common ownership. Or, in other words, when men first instituted distinct ownership, all individually entered into agreement to keep their hands off the property of others, except in so far as the owners allow them, with the reservation, however, that at the urge of extreme necessity any one's possession, without which a person's life could not be preserved, was to be used as if it belonged to all. For since written laws must be allowed that interpretation, which varies as little as possible from natural equity, the same must be done all the more in the case of customs which are maintained only by tacit agreements. And it is certainly just for every one to have the right to preserve his life with the means which at the time constitute his sole hope.

But in this theory there are matters which can be questioned. For if, under stress of necessity, any man secures the right to appropriate the property of others to his own use, as if it lay open to all, there appears no good reason why any man, if he is strong enough, may not take such possessions from their owner, even if the latter is straitened by an equal necessity. But this is not allowed by Grotius. Furthermore, certainly no restitution need be made of things of this kind, which I take as my right, on the ground that they are open to all; and yet Grotius requires such restitution. Also a distinction should be made between the case in which a man fell under such necessity through no fault of his, and that in which his own sluggishness and negligence are to blame. Unless such a distinction is drawn, a right is apparently given to lazy scoundrels who have fallen upon want through idleness, whereby they may appropriate to themselves by force what has been secured by the labour of others; and so, since their idleness maintains their want, they put the industrious under the necessity of maintaining against their will such a useless herd. All wise men agree that, just as those in distress through no fault of their own may properly be helped, so also the proper reply to lazy drones is that which the ant, as the fable has it, gave in the winter to the hungry grasshopper [Aesop, 401, &c.]. The remarks of Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms, [pp. 223 c and d, 229 d], are in point here: 'A pirate spoiling¹ the country, and when he was taken, saying, "I had no provision for my soldiers, and therefore went to those who had store and would not give it willingly, to force it from them"; Cleomenes said, "True villainy goes the shortest way to work."' (G.) Add Pandolfo Collenuccio, History of the Kingdom of Naples, Bk. V, p. 373. 209

Since, therefore, every property owner may make a distinction between those who are in straits through circumstances, and those who are in such a condition due to their own fault, it is quite clear that a property owner will have a right over his property even against a person who is in extreme necessity, to the extent, at least, of being able to decide whether such a person is or is not deserving of his pity, and so of having the opportunity to win the favour of the one in need by his opportune helpfulness. For it is agreed that among all people the greatest weight attaches to a kindness if it relieves extreme distress; while there is no ground for gratitude if a person does for another only what the latter might have taken by force on his own right, and as if it were coming to him.

And so, in my opinion, this matter is better explained on our theory, if we say that a man of means is bound to come to the aid of one who is in innocent want, by an imperfect obligation, which no one should, as a rule, be forced to meet; and yet the urge of supreme necessity makes it possible for such things to be claimed, on the same ground as those which are owed by a perfect right, that is, a special appeal may be made to a magistrate, or, when time does not allow anything of the sort, the immediate necessity may be met by taking the thing through force or stealth. For the reason why only an imperfect right is allowed, especially to such things as are owed on the grounds of humanity, is that thereby a man finds the opportunity to show that his mind is intent upon voluntarily doing his duty, and at the same time possesses the means to bind others to him by his kindness.¹ When any one considers such an attitude superfluous, must some poor fellow die of hunger because he cannot overcome by his prayers the inhumanity² of some man of wealth? Nay, rather, whoever refuses to show humanity should lose his property as well as his merit.

From what has been said, it is easy to see that there is some reason for the exception which Grotius adds to his thesis. For since only an unavoidable necessity allows one to use force in claiming what is owed by an imperfect obligation, it is obvious that every effort should be made to see whether a necessity can be avoided in some other way than by the use of force or stealth; for instance, by seeking a magistrate, promising restitution, when once the current of our fortune begins to move more gently, or by offering our services in exchange. In the second place, one cannot descend to such means when the property holder is under an equal necessity, for we assume that he is living in plenty. And this is a point, I think, which should be further stressed: A man ought not to be stripped of his possessions against his will, if it be clear that he will at once fall under the same necessity, if the possession in question passes to another. For, under such circumstances, every one's first duty is to himself. An interesting illustration to the point is that of Herodotus, Bk. VIII [cxi], when Themistocles demanded contribution of the people of Andros, relying upon two great divinities, 'Persuasion and Necessity', and they countered with two equally strong 210 divinities, 'Poverty and Inability'. The rule of the Jurisconsults, which Grotius here adduces, that 'when the cause of both parties is equal, the position of the possessor is the better', seems to have no connexion here; because judgement is returned for the possessor only when the right of the plaintiff is not yet established.³ But, in the case before us, there is no question about the right of the owner, since the only point raised is whether I am bound by the mere law of humanity to perish that another may be preserved. This no one would maintain. After all, the remark of Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. i [33], is clearly to the point of the matter: 'The only difference between us is that he claimed another's, and I, with superior justice, kept my own property.' (A.)

³ [For liquidem read liquidum.—Tr.]

In conclusion, we maintain that restitution should be made, if at all possible, in the first place, when the article taken was of great value, or else of such value that the owner cannot afford to give it for nothing. But if the article be of little value, and such as cannot burden a man's means, it will suffice if we show, when the opportunity arises, as if we owed him gratitude, that we would have been glad to be indebted to him for his kindness, if his stinginess had allowed. But for Grotius to claim that there should also be restitution is scarcely agreeable with his own hypothesis. For, if the right of original common ownership returns, when a case of necessity arises, so that any one may take back on his own right the property of another, no restitution need be made. But since restitution must be made, it is quite clear that the right of an owner over his property did not cease upon the necessity of another, but that he was obligated to grant it of his own accord to another gratis, or for some set sum, or in some other form of payment. But since the owner refused to do this, the right of necessity allowed another to seize the article, but under the very burden that the owner could lay upon the seizer; that is, that he lay him under an obligation, either of gratitude, or of making good the value of the object involved.

7. On this question others also are as greatly divided as are Grotius and myself. The gloss upon [Decretals, V. xviii] De Furtis, 10 [3] Cap. Si quis, takes the law to apply only to moderate, but not to supreme necessity. Diego de Covarruvias, Chapter Peccatum, II, § 1, n. 3, agrees on the whole pretty much with Grotius:

The reason why, in a case of extreme necessity, a man may, without incurring the guilt of theft or rapine, take the property of another in order to relieve his present necessity, is that such a condition renders all things common. For it is the ordinance of nature herself that inferior things be designed and directed to meet the necessities of men. Therefore, the division of goods which was introduced after the institution of natural law does not derogate from that natural reason, which ordains that the extreme necessity of men is to be relieved by the use of temporal goods.

He adduces a passage of Ambrose from Gratian, Decretals, Distinctio XLVII [viii]: Antonius Perezus, on Code [VI. ii] 3, adds the following grounds for the same opinion: A man is compelled by a superior force to act thus, nor is it presumed that the owner is unwilling, because he is supposed to agree to it, and to come of his own accord to the aid of a person in need, on grounds of humanity; and he does not seem, in his extreme necessity, to take a thing that belongs so much to another, but that belongs to all. Yet he should, when freed from the necessity of his want, make restitution for what he took.

Anton. Matthaeus, on Digest XLVII. i, § 7, feels that a distinction should be made between the crime and the penalty, and so he admits that a crime is committed under the stress of want, but he feels that because of the pressure of the necessity, the penalty should be forgone for the guilty party, or at least abated. He undertakes to prove, from the following reasons, that a robbery is committed in this case: A man, who takes another's stores in a time of famine, has it in his mind to make some profit. The reply to this is that a man scarcely seems to take another's property in order to make some profit, if in so doing he was undertaking to provide for his own extreme necessity, with the purpose and avowed intention of returning it as soon as he could. Furthermore, it cannot be called 'a fraudulent seizure of another's property' when the one party lay under an imperfect obligation to give the thing, and such a right reposed in the other that, in his present situation, he could take it in any manner most convenient to him.

- 211 The same writer throws out the further claim that 'no such violence can be offered a wise and good man as to induce him knowingly to stain himself with any evil, and, in cases of such a nature, in the words of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [v], "Every man should bear with his own adversities, rather than detract in the least from the prosperity of another".'¹

But it is easy, for one who is under no compulsion of necessity, to give the rein to specious philosophizing. See Oppian, On Fishing, Bk. III, lines 197 ff. Surely in a deed of this kind, as we have determined it, there is no greater disgrace than in the fact that sometimes distinguished men in time of famine are forced to descend to the use of vile food, proper only for animals. Nor is the increase and decrease of advantages concerned when, in order to prevent a person from perishing of hunger or exposure, some slight thing is taken from a man of means, or from some one who is not seriously inconvenienced by its loss.

He observes, in connexion with Digest XIV. ii. 2, § 2, that, although the general need requires that whoever threshes out his grain at home should bring it to the assistance of the public store, this is not, however, to be distributed to individuals, so that they may carry it off as they wish, on the ground that they have none, while others have more than enough. For this matter shall be conducted under the general control of officials.

But must a person die of starvation when there is no hope of assistance from an official?

Finally, there is no point to the addition which some make, to the effect that there 'is no dispensation in this part of the law'. For in what has already been said, reason enough was adduced why it should not be presumed that the law on theft should not be extended to the question before us.

8. In conclusion, a necessity that touches our own property apparently allows one the permission to destroy or to appropriate the property of another, but with the following restrictions: that the threatened loss to our property came through no fault of ours; that it cannot be averted in any more convenient way; that we do not destroy another's article of greater value for one of our own of less value; that we make good the value of the article, if it would not have been lost anyway; and, finally, that we bear a part of the loss, if the other's property, which now is sacrificed to preserve ours, would otherwise have been lost along with ours. This is the basis of the equity of the Lex Rhodia de Iactu, which provided: 'If merchandise is cast overboard to lighten the ship, that should be made good by a contribution of all which was given for all.' See the entire heading, together with the commentators upon it, and upon the laws of the sea. On the same account it will be lawful to cut ropes and nets on which my boat has been driven, if it can be saved in no other way. See Digest, IX. ii, 29, § 3. Yet even if this happened through no fault of mine, the loss is shared equally. Thus, if a fire breaks out and is threatening my house, I shall have the right to raze my neighbour's house, provided that those whose houses were saved in this manner make good the damage. For although Digest, XLIII. xxiv. 7, § 4, lays down the rule that when the fire has reached the house which was razed, the man who had this done shall be cleared of the damage, yet the general feeling tends more to equity (add Digest, IX. ii. 49, § 1), whereby, if a house is destroyed to save other houses from an approaching fire, the loss must be met by the neighbours whom the fire might have reached, even though it did not reach the house which they destroyed. For it would certainly be unjust for me to save my property by the destruction of that of another, and then he alone bear the loss while I go free. From the same principle the Roman Jurisconsults deduce the conclusions which are handed down under the head of damnum infectum, where the owner of a rickety bit of property, by which my property is immediately endangered, is compelled to undertake to make good the damage that may come from the fall of his building; and if he refuses to do this, I obtain by a praetor's edict the right to take over such a building. A similar case is that handed down by the interpreters of Roman Law, whereby, if a person has an estate entirely bounded by other lands, which form no part of his property, and has no entrance to it, the judge can compel the man's neighbour to give him an entrance, at least for some 212 consideration.

Now Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 10, deduces from the laws given above that one who wages a just war may guard a place in territory at peace with him, if the danger is not imaginary but real, that his enemy will seize the place and from there do him irreparable damage; provided nothing is taken which is not necessary for his precautions, for instance, he will merely secure the place, while its jurisdiction as well as its products are left to the sovereign, and provided, finally, he intends to hand back the place as soon as his necessity is past. To these conditions it should be added that the sovereign should first be warned that he may himself guard the place, the expenses for such an undertaking being offered him, or, if he prefers, he may render the place untenable for defence. Furthermore, if some expense has been incurred in fortifying the same place, the rightful lord is not bound to refund it, unless he has intended to go to the same expense anyway; nor should the expense incurred serve as an excuse for holding the place when the necessity is past, since the possessor in going to this expense had an eye only to the defence of his own territory, and not to the improvement of the place. But Boecler quite properly remarks on this passage of Grotius that it is established by the usage of all ages and peoples, that no one holds himself bound to allow another, even in fear of danger from an enemy, to occupy any place or citadel of his, if he can prevent him. And that, therefore, if another does so, it is for reasons which may very easily claim pardon, but not for such as can be defended in the name of natural law without the aid of the manner and passion of the orator. It may further be added that a suspicion could easily arise in the minds of the enemy that the sovereign of the place was secretly plotting with the other against him, and in this way the burden of another's war could easily be laid upon him. And even if the enemy is convinced that the place was seized against the sovereign's will, nevertheless, should he decide to drive him from it, the sovereign is exposed to the devastation of war, which one may without censure avoid in any way possible. And it is surely the height of folly for you to receive into your house more guests than you can later on conveniently get rid of, and to whom you must, whether you wish or not, play the friend; guests, too, who may be able, if the fancy so strike them, to show even you yourself the door.

THUS far we have shown what duties the law of nature enjoins upon a man toward himself, and how much freedom or indulgence it allows him in the preservation of his person and his property. We must now turn to those injunctions which concern the duties to be observed toward other men. These duties we divided above into absolute and hypothetical. Under absolute duties, which obligate all men even before the formation of any human institution, we allow, with all confidence, first place to these two: I. No one should hurt another; and II. If he has caused another a loss, he should make it good. This duty, indeed, is of all duties most inclusive, embracing all men as such; and the most simple as well, since it consists merely in the inhibition of action, except when there is a struggle between the reason and the passions, which need restraint at almost every turn, and among which not the last place is held by that over-weening love of one's own advantage. Nay, this duty is of the greatest necessity, since without it the social life of men could in no way exist. For if a man does me no good turn, and does not join with me even in the ordinary duties, I can still live in all tranquillity with him, provided he hurts me in no way. Nay, we desire nothing more than this from most¹ of mankind, mutual assistance being rendered only within a limited circle. But how can I live at peace with him who does me injury, since nature has bred into each man so tender a love for himself and his own possessions that he cannot help using all possible means to ward off the man who is about to do him harm? Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxxi:

It is a crime to injure one's country: so it is, therefore, to injure any of your countrymen, for he is a part of our country; if the whole be sacred, the parts must be sacred too. Therefore, it is also a crime to injure any man: for he is your fellow citizen in a larger state. What if the hands were to wish to injure the feet? or the eyes to hurt the hands?

As all the limbs act in unison, because it is the interest of the whole body to keep each one of them safe, so men should spare one another, because we are born for society. The bond of society, however, cannot exist unless it guards and loves all its members. (S.*)

Now not only those things which nature herself has immediately granted us, such as our life, our body, our limbs, our virtue, our plain reputation, our liberty, are guarded by this precept and ordered to be held, as it were, sacred, but also the strength of this precept is understood to extend to cover all institutions and conventions, whereby anything is secured for men, as though without it they would be useless. And so, this precept forbids that any possession of ours, no matter on what ground it is held, be taken from us, destroyed, damaged, or removed from our use, either entirely or in part. Although, of course, the same duty resides, as a matter of fact, in many affirmative precepts, by virtue of their preventing some one act by laying down what is opposed to it. How clearly the necessity of this law presents itself to the minds of men is apparent from Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xvii:

Ask any of those who live by robbery, whether he would not rather obtain what he steals and plunders, by honest means. The man whose trade is highway robbery and the murder of travellers would rather find his booty than take it by force; you will find no one who would not prefer to enjoy the fruits of wickedness without acting wickedly. (S.)

Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [v]: 'To take away from another, and for one man to advance his own interests by the disadvantage of another man, is more contrary to nature than death, than poverty, than pain.' (E.)

2. A further consequence of this command is: If any one has done another some hurt, and has caused him in any way some loss, which can properly be imputed to the aggressor, the aggressor must, so far as he can, make good the loss. For it is surely a vain thing to have given orders that a person receive no hurt, if, when such hurt befalls him, he must accept the loss at his own cost, while the man who offered him the hurt may enjoy the fruit of his injury in peace and without making restitution. 214 For men are so depraved that they will never refrain from hurting each other, unless they are forced to make restitution, nor will it be easy for a man who has suffered some loss to make up his mind to live at peace with another, so long as he has not received proper restitution.

3. Although the word damnum [damage] properly applies to things, it will be taken by us in a broader sense, so as to include every injury which concerns a man's body, reputation, and virtue. And so the word as we use it signifies any hurt, destruction, diminution, or seizure of something which we now possess, or the interception of something which we should have had by perfect right—whether it was given us by nature, or allowed us by the agency or law of man—or, finally, the avoidance or refusal of some act which a person was under a perfect obligation to perform for us. An illustration of this is in Quintilian, Declamations, xiii, where it is shown at length that a man, who covered the flowers in his garden with poison, from which his neighbour's bees die, had been the cause of his neighbour's loss. The argument which carries the case is as follows: Since all men agree that bees are roving animals, which cannot possibly be trained to get their food in any one place, therefore, wherever it is right to keep them, the neighbours of such a place are understood to be under a kind of liability or easement, whereby the bees are allowed to wander here and there without any one preventing them. Add Digest, IX. ii. 27, § 12; IX. ii. 49.

But it must be observed, at this point, that, inasmuch as a thing may be owed us in two ways, either by a perfect, or by an imperfect obligation, to which a perfect and an imperfect right correspond respectively, damage which another is bound to restore can be done us only in things owed under the first category, but not in things owed us under the second category. For since these last duties ought to be performed upon a kind of voluntary impulse arising from a man's good nature, and I have no faculty to force him to perform them, it would be improper to claim some injury if I had not been the recipient of such deeds, or to demand compensation for things which I could expect from another only by way of a voluntary gift. And just as I cannot count my own such things as I am but capable of receiving, so I cannot complain that I have suffered damage when such things are not forthcoming. The point is well stated by Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. V, chap. iv: 'A man does not take more than properly belongs to him, if he refuses pecuniary help from illiberality.' (W.) Therefore, the other, who receives no help because of this fault, does not have ἐλαττον, or any less. The same point is brought out in the speech of Cicero, For Gnaeus Plancius [iv], where he maintains that although a member of the family of the Laterani might outrank one of the Plancii, the people had it in their power to reject the former and give office to the latter, since a perfect right to hold such offices belonged to neither of them. He continues: 'This is the privilege of a free people, to be able by their votes to give or to take away what they please to or from any one.' (Y.) And yet, in the same passage, what the people ought to do is contrasted with what it could do, the word 'ought' being used for that less perfect obligation, whereby we are supposed to undertake the exercise of every virtue.

But Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 3, advises, in this connexion, that care be taken not to confuse¹ things which belong to a different subject. For if the voting body of citizens, which by virtue of its governing sagacity is expected to give offices to the most worthy, assigns some one person the power to select the officers in their name, and if this delegate selects unworthy men instead of worthy, the failing candidates cannot make complaint of any injury or any damage done to them. But the body of citizens has the right to demand from their representative a reason for his actions and compensation for the damage done the state by the election of an unworthy candidate. Likewise, even though a citizen, however well endowed he may be with the qualifications for some office, has no¹ right to it that will hold good against the state, he still has the right to run for it along with other candidates; and if some one obstructs his candidacy by violence or fraud, he will be entitled to demand a compensation, not, indeed, for the entire value of the office, but for the uncertain hope of it. 215

But, in determining the amount of damage, it should be observed that under that heading comes not merely the thing belonging to us or owed us which is damaged, destroyed, or frustrated, but the fruits as well which come from it, whether they have already been received—in which case they may already be estimated as separate items—or are only hoped for, provided the owner might have received them (see Digest, VI. i. 62, § 1); although the expenses, necessary to secure such fruits or profits, should be deducted, lest we become more rich at another's cost. But the estimate of expected fruits is raised or lowered, according as they are nearer to or farther from the time of their uncertain harvest. Thus a crop lost in the blade must be estimated at a lower figure than one that is yellow in the full head. Consideration will also be taken of the so-called civil fruits. For example, whoever burns a man's house must not merely rebuild it, but also make good the rent which would have come from it in the meantime. See Code, III. xxxii. 5. Add also Digest, IX. ii. 22, § 1; IX. ii. 23. Philo Judaeus, De Victimis, is the authority for the statement that, if a man had caused another some loss, and had repented of his deed, he had to restore the loss and add a fifth part of its value, by way of compensation for the person who had suffered the injury.

And it is also obvious that whatever loss results afterward from some damage, as by natural necessity, is considered one with the original damage. See Exodus, xxii. 6; Digest, IX. ii. 27, § 8; IX. ii. 30, § 3; M. Seneca, Excerpta Controversiarum, Bk. V, cont. v; Strabo, Bk. XII [ii. 8], gives an account of how King Ariarathes blocked the narrows through which the Melas empties into the Euphrates,² made the whole of the neighbouring plain a lake, and finding islands therein as big as the Cyclades, he lived upon them, playing like a boy. But the dam broke suddenly and all the water rushed out, and the flooded³ Euphrates carried off a great deal of land in Cappadocia, and destroyed numerous houses and estates, and did no small damage to the Galatians who inhabit Phrygia. For all this injury he was fined three hundred⁴ talents by the Romans, to whom the injured people referred their case for judgement.

Libanius, Progymnasmata [p. 12 D, Chriae, ii. 13]: 'That which furnishes the starting-point bears the responsibility also for all that follows.' Add Digest, IX. ii. 7, § 7; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VIII, tit. ii, chaps. 1-3, and tit. iii, chap. 3.

4. We have shown above, Bk. I, chap. v, § 14, in discussing the persons responsible for damage, the ways in which the deed of one man may be imputed to another. Nay, a man can cause damage to another not only immediately and of himself, but also through others. Damage, caused immediately by some person, can be imputed to another, who may therefore be called upon to make reparation, since he contributed to the deed of the former, either by doing [what he should not have done],¹ or by failing to do what he should have done. And such a person may be the principal cause, or stand on an equal footing with the performer, or be only an accessory and less than the principal cause.

Now in all these degrees of responsibility, it should be borne in mind that such persons are bound to make reparation for the damage, if they have in fact caused it, or have contributed in any way to the entire damage, or to a part of it. For it often happens, in the case of those who, by some participation or non-participation, contribute, in some way less than the principal, to the deed of another, that the man who caused the damage would have done so anyway, without their participation or non-participation, and so their connexion with the affair was in a way superfluous. In such a case, although their intent and effort constitute a crime, yet since no part in the present damage
 216 came from them, no compensation can be demanded of them. But no attention is paid to those who maintain that, even if such men had not given their assistance and advice, there would still have been no lack of others who would have lent their services to the deed, and so the damage would have been done anyway, even without their participation. For it is a sufficient answer that their assistance made some real contribution to the cause of the damage. Nor would such other persons have been guiltless if they also had put their hands to the deed. And so it seems that we can lay down the following rule about those persons who are or are not under obligation to offer compensation for a damage: When a man has contributed no actual assistance to an act from which damage has resulted, and did nothing beforehand to cause such an act, while he has received no gain from it, he will not be obligated to make compensation, even though he may be guilty of some sin from the mere occurrence of the act. After this it will be easy to determine just what persons are obligated to make compensation. Thus who would deny that they, who find satisfaction in the calamities of others, brought on by the injuries of other men, and even cast them in their teeth, are to be accounted sinners? See Psalms, cxxxvii. 7. Yet who would maintain that such people should make reparation for the damage? The same conclusion is to be drawn concerning people who, upon the performance of some base deed, praise, excuse, or defend it in public, provided their conduct does not interfere with securing compensation for the wrong; or concerning those who, before the deed is done, pray for its success, or, while it is being performed, rejoice in secret and give it their approval. For the words of Cicero, Philippics, II. xii [29]: 'What is the difference between a man who has advised an action and one who has approved it? or what does it signify whether I wished it to be done, or rejoice that it has been done?' (Y.) are not a serious statement, but this is only a reply made to refute the idle objection of some other person. Even if it had been made in all seriousness, it could not be extended to an obligation of reparation. And so a wrong application is made of Cicero's words by Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVII [xi], when he says of the praetorian prefect Probus:

He never desired any defendant or servant of his to do an unlawful thing, yet if he found that any of them had committed a crime, he laid aside all consideration of justice, would not allow the case to be inquired into, but defended the man without the slightest regard for right or wrong. (Y.)

For he added boldness to their sins by giving them confidence in so powerful a patron, and thus put an obstacle in the way of their making reparation for their damage. [Thus there is here something more than simple approbation, or an excuse for the evil which they have done to others.]¹

As to those who give counsel, it is certain that a man must make reparation, if he points out the way to inflict some damage. But if a person only gives some general advice, for instance, that one try a hold-up or robbery, or if he give his approval to something already decided upon, as nowadays the timid counsellors or flatterers of princes do, he should by no means be required to make reparation. Compare Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus Prolegomena, chap. i, §§ 7-9.

Finally, it should be observed, regarding those who concur in another's villainy by failing to do what they should, that they are bound to make reparation for their omission, only if they omitted what they were under a perfect obligation to do, not what was dictated by the law of charity and humanity. For since I cannot yet claim the things that are owed me on this score as my own, so I cannot seek reparation for them, if they are not fulfilled, no matter what is said to the contrary by Ziegler, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 9.

5. But if several persons have concurred in an act, from which damage has resulted, the order to be followed in furnishing reparation will be that those shall be made primarily responsible who by their authority, or by some other means amounting practically to pressure, gave the impulse to the deed. See Digest, IX. ii. 37 pr.; IX. iv. 2, 3, 4 pr.; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. VII, tit. iii, chap. v; VIII, tit. i, chap. i. For in such cases the perpetrator of the deed, or whoever put his hands to it, will be only the instrumental cause. But whoever undertook a deed without duress shall be held primarily responsible, and secondarily the 217 others who contributed in any way to the deed; but on condition that, if reparation has been made by the first party, the latter are free from reparation (but not from punishment). But suppose the same act has been performed by several persons, who, as causes, are in the same class, shall each of them be held for the whole amount, or only for their equal share? On this point Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvii, § 11, gives as his opinion: 'The others, who have caused the act, are individually responsible for the whole loss, if the whole act has proceeded from them, though not from them alone.' (K.) This is quite obscure, unless it is simplified by an illustration which, we feel, will suit his meaning, such as the following. Three men set fire to a house at the same time. The entire act of burning the house seems to have come from each of them—yet not from each alone—since the house would have burned just the same if only one of them had applied the torch. But if several men come to blows with another, one of them wounding him on the head, a second breaking an arm, a third gouging out his eye, they will not be held individually responsible for the entire injury, but each one for so much as he himself did. Yet often, on the escape of one of the party, those who are caught bear the entire cost, especially when there was an agreement among them to commit the felony.

The matter will be clearer if we distinguish between divisible and indivisible acts. The latter are those which are participated in by several persons, but in such a way that the whole act would have resulted from the agency of one person, and no set part of the act can be assigned to the individual participants; such are a fire, the breaking of a dike, and the like. For the damage resulting from the act would have followed, even if only one of the number had put his hands to the task, and so precisely what part of the fire or flood came from each person cannot be determined. If several persons associate in an act of this kind, each of them will be held for the entire cost, in such a way that, if all of them are caught, each of them shall pay an equal share of the damage; but if only one should be seized, and all the rest escape, the entire cost may be demanded of the one. Moreover, if some of those caught have not the means to pay, the entire sum shall be required of those who have. Furthermore, reparation for damage differs from the exaction of a penalty, in that, if one man pays it, the rest are set free, since it is not just for the same damage to be compensated for twice, although this is often done as a punishment; while it is common for the entire penalty to be inflicted on every man who concurred in the same deed. A case of this kind is in Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. VII, chap. vi [2]: 'Let a thief pay fourfold what he has stolen: Two thieves stole in company ten thousand sesterces; forty thousand are demanded from each; they represent that they ought to pay only twenty thousand each.' (W.) In this case it seems that the judgement should go against the thieves, since, by the Roman laws, a charge of theft, whether twofold or fourfold, concerned only the exaction of punishment. Institutes, IV. v. 3; Digest, II. i. 7, § 5; II. i. 8; XLVII. vii. 6 pr.; XLVII. x. 34. Add Digest IX. ii. 11, §§ 2, 4; IX. ii. 51, § 2; ibid., XLIII. xxiv. 15, § 2; XLVII. ii. 21, § 9. Hotman, Quaestiones Illustres, qu. 33.

6. Now when we injure any one, or inflict upon him some damage, this may be done either with evil intent and deliberate design, or by some fault of ours without any clear purpose, but still with some negligence on our part, whether of greater or of less degree; or, finally, by mere chance, in which case the injury cannot be properly imputed to us. Lysias, Orations, xxx [xxxi. 10]: 'No one experiences a misfortune voluntarily.' But, among some peoples, attribution is made not only of such losses as are caused by others with our assistance, but also of such as came, with no positive influence of ours, from our servants, flocks, and beasts. See Exodus, xxi. 28 ff., 33 ff.; and Grotius, ad loc. Now there can be no question that a man, who has caused some damage with evil intent, should be held to compensation, and that so strictly that everything which results from his act should be included. They also should make reparation who, without any clear purpose, cause damage by negligence which they could easily have avoided, since it is not one of the least requirements for social life that we act circumspectly, so that our manner of living cause no apprehension in others, or be more than they can bear. And one is often under a special obligation to take the greatest forethought. See Digest, I. xviii. 6, § 7; I. xviii. 14; IX. ii. 27, §§ 9 at end, 29, 34-5; IX. ii. 27; IX. ii. 29, §§ 2-4. According to Deuteronomy, xxii. 8, the Jews felt there were equally good reasons for forbidding a man to have broken stairs¹ and vicious dogs. Even the slightest degree of culpability may be enough to cause the necessity of reparation, provided the nature of the undertaking is such as does not allow the most scrupulous care, or the guilt of him who receives the injury is no greater than is his who inflicts it, or the great confusion or circumstances attendant upon the undertaking prevent accurate circumspection, such as when a person, brandishing his sword in the heat of battle, wounds the comrade at his side. Thus, in Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. III, chap. xlv, the Pythian priestess made the following reply to a young man who stabbed his comrade while attempting to cut down a thief: 'Thou didst slay thy comrade in defending him; his blood hath defiled thee not, but thy hands are purer than they were before.' Add Epictetus, Enchiridion, chap. xxxix, and Simplicius, ad loc. ca. fin.; Digest, IX. ii. 44, IX. ii. 52, § 4, and the commentators upon these passages.

But it is clear that reparation cannot be made in a case of pure chance, when, of course, no one's fault enters in. For when I have done nothing that can be imputed to me, there is no reason why I, who did some damage against my will, should atone for its evil consequences, any more than should he who was affected. Add Digest, IX. ii. 5, § 2; IX. ii. 7, § 3. But should some poverty-stricken man, in a mere accident, be injured by a man of means, it will be seemly in a person of such station to confer some kindness upon the poor man.

Now Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxvii, § 21, feels that suits for damage done by a slave, or loss inflicted by an animal, have their origin in civil and positive law, since the owner, being not directly to blame, is by nature not concerned in them. But other writers maintain that such suits are entirely in agreement with natural equity, even though natural law does not specifically require them. Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 936 c D]:

If a slave of either sex injure anything, which is not his or her own, through inexperience, or improper practice, and the injured person be not in part to blame, the master of the slave who has done the harm shall either make full satisfaction, or give up the person who has done the injury. (J.)

A very early illustration of the same principle is found in Sextus Aurelius Victor, De Origine Gentis Romanae [vi], where Evander gave over his thievish servant Cacus to Recaranus-Hercules for punishment because he had stolen the latter's oxen. But the reason why the owner of an animal should bear the damage, rather than the one who was hurt by the animal, even though the latter had stirred up the beast to act contrary to its disposition, and the owner was free from blame, is apparently this: The institution of ownership does not take precedence over this law of compensation for damage. And so, since I had the right, when property was still held in common, to seek compensation for an injury, by any means at my disposal, from any animal that had hurt me, it is understood that this right was not taken from me when the title of property became divided. Furthermore, since the owner gets profit from his animal, while I suffered loss from it, and compensation for damage receives more favour than the acquisition of profit, it is plain that the owner of the animal can be called upon to make good the damage done by his beast, or, if the worth of the animal does not equal the loss, to give it up for punishment.¹

The same principle applies all the more in the case of a slave, since such a person is by nature liable to furnish compensation for any damage he has done. But since he has no property wherewith to make compensation, and his body belongs to his owner, it is surely right for his master either to make good the loss, or to give over his slave.

Especially is this true, since licence would be given the slave to injure everybody at his pleasure, if compensation for damage could be 219 secured neither from him who owns nothing, not even his own person, nor from his master. Nor would it be any satisfaction for the injured person if the slave's owner should punish him most severely with stripes and imprisonment. See the commentators on the Roman Law, on Digest, IX. i, and ad Legem Aquiliam; also Constantin l'Empereur, Baba Kama; Capitularies of Charles, Bk. III, chap. xlv; as well as Digest, XXXIX. i. But there can be no doubt that the owner should pay for the losses caused by his animals of their own fault, or upon his inciting them, whether his beast has hurt another because of its natural and customary ferocity, or caused a person some loss in following its common instinct. For the owner should not have kept such animals, or else should have had them confined, so that they could not cause damage.

But a general rule should be laid down on reparations, namely, that, if the damage was done from malice, compensation for it does not obviate the necessity for punishment. See Digest, XLVII. ii. 48. Although the voluntary payment of reparation, as a certain witness of remorse, lessens the offence not a little. Luke, xix. 8. There is a passage worthy of our notice in Michael Glycas, Annals, Bk. IV [p. 587 ed. Bonn], on Michael the Paphlagonian:

The emperor Michael all his life long lamented his sin against Romanus, endeavouring to appease God by good works, founding monasteries, and showing kindness to all those who were in need. Now all this would have availed had he thrown away the crown for the sake of which he had done the wrong, had he divorced the adulteress, and as a private citizen deplored his sin. But he did none of these things; he kept Zoe as his wife, held fast to the crown, met the expenses of his good deeds from the public and general revenues, and thought to obtain forgiveness thereby. He conceived of the Deity as both foolish and wicked, in trying to buy forgiveness with the money that belonged to other men.

Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 4: 'There is as much difference between giving something and restoring what had been taken away, as there is between the beginning of a benefit and the end of an injury.' To illustrate this we will subjoin some examples which are given by Grotius, loc. cit.

7. An unjust murderer is bound to meet whatever expenses, if any, were incurred for physicians, and to give to those whom the slain man had supported, from a duty possessed of the force of a perfect obligation, such as his parents, wife, children (but not needy persons whom he maintained out of generosity), as much as they had hope of having by way of support, due consideration being given not only to the ability of the dead man, but also to his age, as well as to that of the dependants. The manner of computing the support is shown in Digest, XXXV. ii. 68. But we can scarcely admit the position of Ziegler, on Grotius, loc. cit., when he maintains that consideration should be taken of the fortune which the dead man might have amassed, had he lived longer, on the ground that he would have left a richer legacy to his dependants. For such a fortune, beside being uncertain, cannot be considered as now among our possessions, and the future lies open to losses as well as gains, nor can it be definitely determined how much of that fortune the dead man would have consumed.

Now an unjust murderer is one that kills a man who had a right not to be killed, and who, therefore, in his death, had an injury done him. This right, in view of the fact that nature enjoins¹ that man be a social animal and² abstain from mutual injury, belongs, by general consent, to every man. But a man may, so far as in him lies, renounce this right, at least so that he may be harmed by certain persons; and this he may do tacitly or expressly. A man makes void such a right tacitly when he attacks another man without a just cause. For since the other person is justified in using any means at his disposal, in order to repel such an attack, he who is hurt, when his unjust assault is being repelled, has no one to blame but himself. A man also expressly renounces the same right when he engages in war with another after formal declaration. For it is the law of war that one may go to any length in order to 220 destroy one's enemy. An illustration of this is in Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [p. 233 F, xxxiv]:

Two boys fighting, one wounded the other mortally with a hook. And when his acquaintances, just as he was dying, vowed to avenge his death and have the blood of him that killed him: 'By no means,' he said; 'it is unjust, for I had done the same thing if I had been stout and more speedy in my stroke.' (G.*)

Add Digest, IX. ii. 4, 5, 7, § 4; Ibid., 51, § 1. And although in that war some sin may possibly be committed against charity, yet such a violation alone will not obligate one to the payment of any compensation.

There can be no compensation for the life of a free man, and even if there were, there is no one to whom it can be paid. For his life does not belong to his nearest of kin, it is merely to their interest that he be living; and so, if the value of that interest be given them, they cannot demand a compensation for his life. It is different with a slave, since he belongs entirely to his master, and is bought and sold like other commodities; he has his value, and on his death there is one who may demand it on his own right. If it seems overly harsh and inhuman for a slave to have a value like cattle, the reply will be made that the value is placed not on his person, but on the amount of services which can be secured from him.

Those are likewise bound to render compensation for damage who kill a person wantonly, which is as heinous as evil intent. See Digest, XLVIII. viii. 4, § 1, and Godefroy, on Digest, IX. ii. 10. Likewise, those who commit murder by their own fault, and without proper consideration, illustrations of which are in Institutes, IV. iii. 5 ff.; so also if a soldier is practising with his arms in some place other than that set apart for the purpose, and kills some one; or if a countryman should do the same in a place where soldiers regularly practise. For if a person is accidentally struck by a soldier in such a place, the soldier will go scot-free, because it is the man's own fault that he was there, and the soldier was about his duty. Add Digest, IX. ii. 9, § 4, and Antiphon, Orations, vii [Tetral. II. iv]. Likewise, if a pruner of trees cut off a branch near a public road or a street, and killed a slave passing by, and did not give warning. If he gave warning, and the slave did not heed it, the pruner is blameless; as is the case if he killed a person away from the road and in the middle of a farm, even if he did not give warning, since a stranger had no right to be in such a place. Digest, XI. ii. 31; add Law of the Burgundians, tit. xlv. Likewise, if a doctor has abandoned a stricken man, or through malpractice has given him deadly drugs. See Pliny, Bk. XXIX, chap. i; Law of the Visigoths, Bk. XI, tit. i, chap. 6. Likewise, if a multerer because of lack of skill or strength was not able to keep his mules from killing a person—provided that he of his own accord applied for such a position, but not if he was forced into it, and had called attention to his lack of skill and strength. Add Digest, IX. ii. 5, § 3, Ibid., 7, §§ 2, 5, 6, 8; Ibid., 8, 9 pr., § 3; Ibid., 11 pr., 31, 52, § 2; compare c. 8. 9 ff.; 10, *De homicid.*¹

In the Koran, chapter On Wives, a Mohammedan who has in ignorance killed another of his own faith is commanded to make good to his relatives the entire loss which they have sustained, and to redeem one Mohammedan from captivity. It is probable that those who were given a place of refuge by the divine law, Numbers, xxxv; Deuteronomy, xix, were also obligated to a like compensation, since the man whose axe-head slipped from the handle is not entirely free from guilt, as he should have fastened it more securely. But we cannot understand how it agrees with the state of orderly civil society for the avenger of blood to be allowed to kill with impunity such an involuntary murderer, if he were caught outside the place of refuge; unless we conclude that this indulgence was made to the vengeful nature of that particular people. Compare Tacitus, Germany, chap. xxi; Homer, Odyssey, Bk. XV, line 272.

8. Whoever has mutilated another shall likewise be held for the 221 expenses incurred in curing the hurt, and for the difference between the amount which the person maimed now earns, and the amount which he used to earn. Compare Digest, IX. ii. 13 pr.; IX. iii. 7. Worthy of note in this connexion are the Jewish laws, which are cited

They compute the damage as follows. Suppose, for instance, the assailant has put out a man's eye, cut off his hand, or broken his leg, they consider a man as if he were a slave to be sold in the market, and estimate how much he was worth before, and how much now. For they felt that, if the difference between the position and status of individual men were taken into consideration, there would be no fixed standard of valuation, for in view of the different life callings, and the diversity of individual status, the person injured might be always advancing some reason why he could enlarge to some extent his damage or the injury to his body, and always demanding an increase in the compensation for it. And so they wanted all injured persons on this score to be valued like slaves, whose worth could not be questioned. Thus, for example, if a person worth fifty shekels before the injury could afterward be sold for only thirty, the guilty party paid twenty shekels, the amount to which the injured person had decreased in value.

Regarding pain they said that, for instance, if a man had burned another with a spit or a nail, be it only on the finger-nail, where there is no blister, they reckoned how much a man of that condition would have wanted, in order to be willing to undergo such pain. For you might easily find a man of wealth and easy ways who could not be induced for a great sum to bear even so slight a pain; while you might find that a poor man of good physique and hardened to toil would not for ten pence draw back from a great pain. In estimating the pain they proceeded as follows: They conceived, for example, that the king had ordered that a man of such a position have his hand cut off, and then they reckoned how much such a man would give to have his hand removed by some easy application, rather than cut off with a single blow. This was the amount the guilty party had to pay the injured one on the score of his pain. Compare Digest, XLVII. x. 5, § 1, where, since between beating [verberatio] and striking [pulsatio] the distinction is made that the former is to strike one with pain, and the latter without pain, it apparently follows that even pain can have a valuation.

Regarding the cure their practice was, if any pustules appeared after the cure had been effected, and they were caused by the wound, the man who delivered it was liable for the expense of healing them; but if they were not due to the blow, he was free. If the wound healed and then broke out again, the assailant was responsible for its further cure. It might be added that the offender was obligated only if the wound opened of itself, but not if it opened through the fault of the victim or malpractice on the part of the physician.

In setting the allowance for cessation from work, which the victim suffered because of the wound, they considered the injured person as if he were a watchman of cucumbers. The learned men of the Jews developed the point more fully in the following way: The injured man had already received compensation from his assailant for the wound on his body, as well as for the pain inflicted. And so, suppose he had lost his foot or hand, they maintain that they have no concern with what wages he would have made if he had still had his hand or foot, but since he has already been compensated for his hand and foot, they undertake only to reckon what damage he suffers, because of the continuance of his handicap, in regard to his occupation, which he could have continued, if well, even though he had lost his limb. Therefore, they conclude that the maimed person can get for each day of his sickness the sum of money he would have drawn daily from watching a cucumber patch. But since it makes some difference whether a person, on losing the use of his hand or foot, is disabled for a while from the wound, and later on, after recovery, is as whole as before, and whether he completely loses the limb itself, Maimonides advances a more subtle 222 method of fixing the cost of inactivity by the employment of specific instances. If a person does not lose a limb, but is only made ill and confined to his bed, or if his hand merely swells and he finally recovers, the other man shall reimburse him for each day of his inactivity according to what a worker draws from the trade from which the injured man is withdrawn. But if the aggressor has crippled him, or cut off his hand, after the worth of the hand has been paid, or the damage made good, for his period of inactivity they regard him as a watchman of cucumbers, and, after reckoning the daily wage for such an occupation, and how many days he was ill, they compute the sum and this is paid him. Likewise, if a man has lost a foot, they regard him as a watchman at the gates of a city; if he has lost an eye, as a grinder at a mill, and in the same way they reckon similar cases.

Finally, in atoning for disgrace, all estimates must be based on the position of the man who causes it, and of the man who suffers it. For it is far more grievous to suffer disgrace from a common man than from a nobleman, and what is a slight affront to a humble person may be most bitter to a distinguished personage. Here we should note, in passing, certain reservations upon the place in which the disgrace occurs: If a man, in falling from a house, hurt a passer-by, and at the same time disgrace him, for example, by knocking him with the impact into the mud, he shall be held responsible for the damage, but not for the disgrace.

Thus far from the laws of the Jews. The same matters are taken up in Digest, IX. iii. 7, and Digest, IX. i. 3. Here it should be noted that the statement, that no valuation is put upon scars and disfigurement, should be restricted to free men alone. For since the luxury-loving Romans put a great value upon comely slaves, there was ground for compensation if a man disfigured a slave of that kind by wounds. Nay, it is quite right to set a valuation on the disfigurement by wounds of the face of a virgin, or of an unmarried woman, since beauty of face often takes the place of a dowry. And in general a disfigurement is, indeed, very unfortunate, since it makes us displeasing to others, and exposes us to the jests and slights of fellows of the baser sort; except that scars from wounds in war are covered with a mantle of repute for valour. See the case of M. Servilius in Livy, Bk. XLV, chap. xxxix; add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. V, chap. xxiv; Digest, IX. ii. 13 pr.

But it should be carefully noted, in connexion with compensation for mutilation, that the limb itself is not appraised and valued, since it is a thing not to be measured in terms of money, but the loss that arises from the impaired or lost use of the limb, is made good, with consideration of different times, men, and faculties. When a judge is taking cognizance of these considerations, he must compare the different members, with an eye both to their uses and the pain involved in each. Boecler, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. i, § 6.

9. The illustration of an adulterer and adulteress, who are obligated not merely to relieve the husband from caring for the illegitimate offspring, but also to compensate the legitimate children, if they suffer any loss from such children sharing the inheritance with them, belongs to cases which give damage to others indirectly, and as a consequence of an act. For otherwise adultery does not directly concern monetary damage. On cases of this kind Ziegler, on Grotius, loc. cit., § 15, notes that it is quite right for the husband to be freed from the task of providing for the illegitimate offspring; but that there is some question whether the legitimate children should be compensated for a loss which they experience from such children sharing in the inheritance. For the question concerns only the inheritance of the mother's estate, in which illegitimate children cannot share, except as the law prescribes. Therefore, when the civil law summons illegitimate along with legitimate children to the inheritance of the mother's estate, the damage comes from the law and not from the adulterer.

To these points it may, perhaps, be added that illegitimate children are not obligated for reparation to legitimate ones, because the latter have not a perfect right to the estate of their living parents, and 223 that only from the violation of a perfect right does the necessity of compensation arise. In the same way, a parent does no injury to his children if he marries a second time, although their hopes in the inheritance may thereby be considerably diminished.

But, as a matter of fact, the preceding example of adultery is apparently derived, first, from the terms of civil laws upon the succession of illegitimate children to their parents' estate, and, second, from penal laws aimed at those convicted of adultery, and it is entirely correct to maintain that the reparation mentioned above is owed by adulterers, even though undetected, both to the husband and to the legitimate children. For the children surely had a right that no other man than the lawful husband of their mother should beget co-heirs with them—a right sought for them by the purpose of the marriage pact. By the same pact, also, it was the husband's right not to maintain, as his own, even at the expense of his wife's dowry, the fraudulent offspring of another.

10. Whoever has deflowered a virgin by violence or deceit is obliged to compensate her to the amount to which her hope of marriage has been lessened by the loss of her honour. For indeed the flower of virginity is the equivalent of no small dowry. A fine passage on this is in Apuleius, Apologia [92]:

A beauteous virgin, even though she may chance to be utterly destitute, is still provided with an ample marriage portion; for she brings to her new husband the winning nature of her disposition, the charms of her beauty, the first fruits of her maidenhood. The very recommendation itself of virginity is rightly and deservedly esteemed¹ by all husbands. (A.)

It is, therefore, only just, that whoever has stolen the honour of an unwilling maiden, should at least so freely recompense her that she can find a husband by the generous size of her dowry. Although the most convenient solution is for the debaucher to marry the maid, unless there is a difference in their rank, or some other obstacle. See Exodus, xxii. 16–17; Deuteronomy, xxii. 28–9. However, if a maiden willingly agrees to such open wantonness, she has only herself to blame. But, as a general thing, there is a presumption of greater blame attaching to the man than to the maiden. Still, if a man entice a woman to share his couch by a promise of marriage, he shall be required to marry her. For one cannot object that pacts are invalid if entered into for a base end. For by natural law no interval is required between a promise of marriage and its consummation (see Tobit, vii. 10, 18), this being due only to civil customs and laws (see Gratian, Decretum, II. xxvii. 2. 39). Therefore, by the law of nature the following does not seem a base condition: 'You will be my wife if you immediately, as my wife, give me your body.' But even if there seem some impropriety in a hasty marriage of this sort, it is not judged sufficient to invalidate the agreement, because of the favour accorded marriage.

11. Thieves and robbers are required to return their stolen property, along with its natural increment, beside the damage sustained and the interrupted profit, even though they are in addition forced to undergo punishment on the score of their theft or robbery. For the injured person seeks compensation for his loss, and the good of the state demands punishment, which a judge certainly cannot lay to the injured person, with the result that the latter would thereby be forced to go without his own property. Therefore, it is absurd that in some places the judges keep the stolen property for themselves, ordering the injured person to content himself with the fact that the thief was punished. See Caroli V. Ordinatio Criminalis, art. 218. Add Digest, XV. i. 3, § 12; XLVII. ii. 56, § 1; XLVII. ix. 7 pr.

In the same way this further custom is not agreeable with natural law, that the injured person pay¹ the expenses for the punishment of the thief, since it is the official duty of the magistrate to restrain crimes with punishments. And if the necessary amount for this purpose cannot be secured from the person on trial, it should be met by the state, and not by the injured party, especially because from other fines a balance redounds to the public treasury. For example, if a state begins a war because some of its citizens were injured by a certain person, the expense of the war does not fall upon those alone for whose vindication the war is waged. But the matter is different if the judge has given the injured person the choice whether he prefers to receive back his property, or see the thief hanged. For if he has chosen the latter, 224 he has nothing further to ask for. But it is improper of the judge to give such a choice to the injured person, since the punishment of criminals is not owed to the whim of individuals, but to the public welfare.

But if the stolen property has been dissipated, Grotius, loc. cit., feels that the compensation should not be on the highest valuation, nor the lowest, but on the average valuation. Ziegler, ad loc., however, quite properly disagrees with this. For why should we show the thief such favour? And since I am justified in asking the highest price when I sell an article, otherwise not for sale, to suit some one's pleasure, why should I have to make some deduction for a thief who took an article against my will? Add Digest, XII. iii. 9; IX. ii. 2 pr.; XIII. i. 8, § 1. And in this case restitution is also owed by the thief or his heirs—yet not beyond the amount of the inheritance—even when the thief has paid for the crime with his life.

Nor is it at all unjust, or something very close to cruelty, to make the defendant, even after the infliction of the death penalty or of corporal punishment, pay the damage and any other losses. And only ignorance would allege in this connexion the trite maxim: 'Death pays all'; Novels, XXII, chap. xx. Death pays personal obligations, but not debts which cling, as it were, to possessions, and follow them into the hands of their new owners. Of such a sort is the debt to make compensation for damage.

The manner of settling other injuries is easy, and some of them will be treated below individually in their proper place. On the damage done by animals, called pauperies, the Roman Jurisconsults have discussed this matter at length on Digest, IX. i.

CHAPTER II

ALL MEN ARE ACCOUNTED AS NATURALLY EQUAL

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. A man should hold every other man his natural equal. | 5. How property is to be divided among mankind on the basis of equality. |
| 2. The nature of natural equality. | 6. One may sin against it by pride; |
| 3. Popular reasons for it. | 7. And by insults offered others. |
| 4. The consideration of equality makes men mutually helpful. | 8. Are there such beings as slaves by nature? |
| | 9. The source of inequality between men. |

IN addition to that love which every man cherishes for his life, his person, and his possessions, by which he cannot avoid repelling or fleeing before everything that tends to their destruction, there is to be observed, deep-seated in his soul, a most sensitive self-esteem; and if any one undertakes to impair this, he is rarely less and often more disturbed than if an injury were being offered his person and property. Although a number of factors unite to intensify this esteem, its prime source is, apparently, human nature. For indeed the word 'man' is felt to have a certain dignity, and the last as well as the most telling reply with which the rude insults of other men is met, is, 'I am not a dog or a beast, but as much a man as you are.' Statius, Thebaid, Bk. XII [555-7]:

Suffice it, noble Theseus, that with thee
They bore a manly form, a thinking mind,
And all the properties of human kind. (L.)

Now since human nature belongs equally to all men, and no one can live a social life with a person by whom he is not rated as at least a fellow man, it follows, as a precept of natural law, that 'Every man should esteem and treat another man as his equal by nature, or as much a man as he is himself'.

2. That this equality between men may be better understood, it 225 should be observed that Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 3, confines it to a parity of strength and other human faculties, with which mature men are endowed, and undertakes to show why, therefore, men have reason, because of their nature, to stand in mutual fear of one another. For he can inspire no terror in me whose powers do not extend far enough to do me harm.¹ And yet, although one man may be a bit inferior to another in strength, he may still, by the aid of cunning, agility, and familiarity with weapons, be able to inflict death upon even the most robust of men. Seneca, On Anger, Bk. I, chap. iv [iii]: 'No one is so low in station as not to be able to hope to inflict punishment even upon the greatest of men: we all are powerful for mischief.' (S.) And so, since death is the greatest of natural ills that can be produced by man, and any mature man can inflict it upon any other; and, furthermore, since those who can inflict equal things upon one another, are equals, and whoever can inflict the greatest evils, namely death, can likewise inflict equal¹ ones, it follows that men are by nature equal one to another. Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. X [376]: 'Their lives and hands are many as our own.' (B.) But when Hobbes adds that 'the inequality, which now prevails, has been introduced by civil law', in my judgement he has been caught napping. For previously he had spoken about the natural² equality of men's physical powers, to which it is erroneous to contrast that inequality which has been brought about by civil law, forasmuch as this latter affects not the physical powers of men but their status and condition. For indeed the civil law does not cause one man to be stronger than another, but only to take precedence over another in dignity.

Nor is Hobbes's meaning any the more clear when he asserts, Leviathan, chap. xiii, that the equality of the faculties of the mind is greater than physical equality. He says, indeed, that 'prudence is but experience, which equal time equally bestows on all men, in those things they equally apply themselves unto'. Yet we see one man surpass another in accurately observing the consequences to be drawn from principles, in skilfully applying what has already been observed, and in distinguishing the similarity and dissimilarity of cases. And so, of men engaged an equal length of time in the same undertaking, one excels in skill, while experience fails to compensate for the other's dullness.

Nor is the fact that men are so unequal in prudence due only to 'a vain conceit of one's own wisdom, which almost all men think they have in greater degree than the vulgar; that is, than all men but themselves, and a few others, whom by fame, or for concurring with themselves, they approve'.

For this disparity is to be observed not only when a man compares himself with others, but also when he compares other men in whose respective excellences he has no personal interest. Nor do we always favour one who agrees with us, but often the man whose career and success has commended him to us. And although one's love of esteem makes him indignant at any reflections upon his dullness and imprudence,

¹ [So Pufendorf. For aequalia he may have intended to write aeque minora, i.e., 'are equally able to inflict lesser ones'. Kennet's version is only a desperate effort to deal with a corrupt text. Barbeyrac (whose translation has been turned back into Latin in the edition of Frankfort and Leipzig, 1744) gives something like this, which better represents the meaning of both Hobbes and Pufendorf: Leaving out the sentence beginning 'For he can', Barbeyrac proceeds, 'For, says he, although one man may be inferior to another in strength, he may still, by the aid of cunning, plots, agility, and familiarity with weapons, be able to inflict death, so that any mature man can inflict upon another, no matter how strong and vigorous, the greatest of all natural ills. Thus, since those who have to fear equal ills from one another are equal, and those who can cause one another very great ills, can also a fortiori cause less, it follows that all men are by nature equal to one another.'—Tr.]

and greatly incensed at such as boast of their own prudence as being superior to that of others, yet it does not follow that no one, for that reason, ever concedes that some one else is more prudent than he. For suppose that out of the same danger one by his skill has come off whole, and another has been seriously injured, will not the latter acknowledge that the former showed greater prudence? But our equal liberty provides that the more prudent man may not, by a right of his own, challenge the mode of life of a less prudent one, unless the latter give his consent, especially if the latter acknowledges that he is satisfied with his own degree of skill.

But although equality of strength may result in a man's being unwilling rashly to insult another, since the issue may fall either way, when equal meets equal, and it is folly to undertake to plan some evil for another which will mean your own ruin, still it is another kind of equality with which we are now concerned. This is something that the 226 human race has every interest to keep intact in every way, and here also, as in other things, nature has shown her wisdom, in that she has not meted out with the same measure to all mortals the goods of body or mind, but that there exists a just harmony in the midst of that variety is due to the equality of which we are speaking. Indeed, just as in well ordered states, one citizen is above another in position or wealth, but all share equally in liberty, so however much one man may excel others in mental and bodily gifts, he is none the less bound to exercise toward them the duties of natural right, and he may expect the same of others as well, nor, for all his gifts, is he allowed any greater licence to injure others. Thus, however niggardly nature or fortune has been toward a man, he is not condemned on that score to share less fully than others in the benefits of the law. But whatever one man can claim or hope for from another, the same others can claim or hope for from him, other things being equal, and whatever law a man appeals to against another, he must under every circumstance admit against himself. Or, as Phaedruss, I. xxvii says, 'Every one ought to take it patiently, when his own example is turned against himself.' Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIII, chap. xxx: 'It is but just that a man should himself submit to that law which he has himself established.' Here also belongs Quintilian, Declamations, III: 'We must needs think that every one in passing judgement approves of that which he himself would have done in a similar case.' Seneca, De Ira, I. xiv: 'Nor does an honest judge render an opinion in his own case different from that which he renders in another's. Add Cumberland, De Legibus Naturae, ii. 7. Seneca, Letters, xxx, 'The prime part of equity is equality.' Euripides, Phoenician Maidens, 538 [535-8]: 'Better to honour, son, Equality, which knitteth friends to friends, cities to cities, allies unto allies.' (W.) Hence it is impossible to approve the following principle laid down by Cicero,¹ On Duties, III. vi: 'Therefore, the very law of nature which preserves and governs the interests of men, decrees undoubtedly that things necessary for living should be transferred from an inert and useless fellow to a wise, good, and brave man, who, if he should perish, would largely take away from the common good.' (E.) Therefore, one cannot approve the remark made in Michel Montaigne, Bk. I, chap. xxx, of that American [i.e. American Indian] who came from New France in the reign of Charles IX; when he was asked what was the most striking thing to be seen in France, he replied that among other things the most striking was that, although some were living in every luxury, and others were eking out their existence by begging from door to door, the latter did not attack the former and seize their possessions. For just as those who excel in the gifts of mind, body, or fortune should not disdain the less fortunate, so the latter should not envy the former, or undertake to destroy their property.

And this equality we can call an equality of right, which has its origin in the fact that an obligation to cultivate a social life is equally binding upon all men, since it is an integral part of human nature as such. But it should be observed that the bond of this obligation can be broken by special circumstances. Between obligations enjoined by a superior and such as come from a mutual agreement, there is this difference, that the latter cease to bind a man when the other party to them has broken his agreement, while the former still bind one to some undertaking, even if the other party has ceased to fulfil his duty; and this is true because that, wherein the other party fell short of justice, can be made up by the author of the obligation. But the obligation to exercise the duties of natural law toward others, although enjoined by the supreme will of God, agrees with an obligation arising from any convention in this respect: That when a man departs from it, he cannot demand any longer those duties from the other, and the other person has the further right to use force in making him render satisfaction. But the character of civil society has forced this liberty, which is inherent in a state of nature, to be limited in commonwealths.

227 3. Other reasons there are as well, highly plausible to the common eye, which aid not a little in meditating upon and illustrating this equality. Not the least of these is the fact that all mortals find their origin in a common stock. And so Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy, Bk. III [vi], scores the pride of nobles:

Why brag you of your stock? Since none is counted base,
If you consider God the author of your race,
But² he that with foul vice doth his own birth deface. (R.)

Another reason is that our bodies, fragile and an easy prey to a variety of accidents, are all of the same substance. So we are all conceived in the same manner, in the same manner is our substance formed in the depths of our mother's womb, and the same portal ushers the noble as well as the plebeian into the divine light of day. See Wisdom, vii. 5. Finally, we all journey to the same goal; 'Death with foot impartial knocks at the poor man's cottage and at princes' palaces.' (B.) [Horace, Odes, I. iv. 13 f.] 'We are all in debt to death,' says an unknown poet [Simonides] in the Anthology [X. cv]; and the bodies of all men return to the same corruption and dust. Claudian, Against Rufinus, Bk. II [473 ff.]: 'Hither come all the children of men whose life is ended; here there abide no marks of earthly fortune; no reverence is shown; the common beggar ousts the king, now stripped of his empty title.' (P.) Phocylides [III]: 'All the dead are equal.' Lucian, Dialogues of the Dead [X. xxv. 2]: 'Hades is a democracy; one man is as good as another here.' (F.) Cicero, On Laws, Bk. II [xxiii]: 'It is highly conformable to nature, to sweep away by mortality all the distinctions of fortune.' (Y.) Statius, Thebaid, Bk. X [712], speaks of 'titles lost in gloomy death'. (L.) Add Sirach, x. 9 ff.

Moreover, it is constantly emphasized by wise men that we are exposed to every kind of happening and to the sport of fortune; or better, that God guarantees to no man a stable and unshaken happiness and a continuance of his present state, but by the secret counsel of His providence He is wont to speed whom He pleases through various kinds of happiness. 'He can', yea, and often does, 'interchange the lowest and the highest; the mighty God abases and exalts the lowly.' (B.*) Horace, Odes, Bk. I, ode xxxiv [12]. Idem, Bk. II, ode xiii [13]: 'Man never heeds enough from hour to hour what he should shun.' (B.) Idem, Bk. III, ode xxix [49 f.]: 'Fortune, exulting in her cruel work, and stubborn to pursue her wanton sport, shifts her fickle favours, kind now to me, now to some other.' (B.) Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. III [525 ff.]:

This Nature orders too, and hence there springs
That various discord that is seen in things.
In one continual stream no fortune flows.
Joy mixes grief, and pleasures urged by woes,
In constancy in every part appears,
Which wisdom never trusts, but to thy fears. (C.)

Add Seneca, Consolation to Marcia, chap. xi. An excellent passage to the same purpose is in Seneca, Thyestes [597 ff.]:

He
Who wears a crown upon his brow,
To whom the trembling nations kneel,
[. . .] he, the king,

With anxious mind the sceptre bears,
 Foresees and fears the fickle chance
 And shifting time which soon or late
 Shall all his power overthrow.
 Ye, whom the rule of the land
 And sea has given o'er subject men
 The fearful power of life and death,
 Abate your overweening pride.
 For whatsoever fear of you
 Your weaker subjects feel to-day,
 To-morrow shall a stronger lord
 Inspire in you. For every power
 Is subject to a greater power.
 Him, whom the dawning day beholds
 In proud estate, the setting sun
 Sees lying in the dust.
 Let no one then trust overmuch
 To favouring fate; and when she frowns,
 Let no one utterly despair
 Of better fortune yet to come.
 For Clotho mingles good and ill;
 She whirls the wheel of fate around,
 Nor suffers it to stand.
 To no one are the gods so good
 That he may safely call his own
 To-morrow's dawn; for on the whirling wheel
 Has God our fortunes placed for good or ill. (M.)

Another passage from Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xix, also bears on this point: 'Epaphroditus had a shoemaker, whom he sold because he was useless; then by some chance he was bought by one of Caesar's officials and became Caesar's shoemaker. If you could have seen how Epaphroditus honoured him!' (M.*)

Many tenets of the Christian religion can be adduced to the same effect: That men are not judged the friends of God according to position, power, and wealth, but according to the sincerity of their piety; and, at the last judgement, in the assigning of final rewards and 228 punishments no attention will be paid to those things by which mortals here rate themselves above others.

4. From this equality as we have posited it, there flow other precepts, the observance of which has the greatest¹ influence in preserving peace and friendly relations among men. Now it is clear at the outset that, if a man wishes to avail himself of the assistance of other men for his own advantage, he must in his turn lend his own talents to their accommodation. 'Hand washes hand' is the old proverb. Surely a man considers others his inferiors if he demands that they labour for him while he himself always desires to be independent, and whoever maintains such an attitude cannot avoid offending others, and giving occasion to a breach of peace. It was a hardy reply of Caractacus, in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [xxxvii]: 'And if you Romans must needs lord it over the world, does it follow that all welcome your yoke?' (R.)¹ Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. III, chap. xxii [III. xxiii]: 'Nothing is done wisely which is useless and evil if it is done by all.' (C.) And just as surely as it implies a contradiction to draw different conclusions from things which entirely agree, so one cannot lay down different rules in exactly similar cases that concern myself and another. Nay, since every man knows his own nature best and the nature of other men, at least so far as concerns their general inclinations, just as well, it follows that he who decides one way in another man's right, and another way in a similar right of his own, is guilty of a contradiction in the very plainest matter, and this is evidence of a seriously disordered mind. No sufficient proof, indeed, can be advanced why something that I feel to be proper for myself, I should feel to be improper for others who are my equals, other things being equal. Thus, just as those men are best fitted for a social life who are willing to allow the same things to others as to themselves—as Horace, Satires, Bk. I, sat. iii [73 ff.], puts it: 'He who expects his friend not to be annoyed at his wens will excuse the other's warts. It is fair play that one who asks indulgence for shortcomings should give it in return.' (W.)—so those are plainly unsocial who, from a feeling of their own superiority, would have every liberty allowed themselves alone, overlook every fault in themselves, pardon nothing in others, and claim for themselves, although they enjoy no special right above others, honour before all other men, and a special share in things which are the common property of all. For just as in the erection of a building, a stone which, because of its angular and rough shape, takes more space than it fills, cannot be easily cut or shaped because of its hardness, and prevents the completion of the structure, is rejected as useless, so πλεονέκται [greedy men], who, in their miserliness, rob others of the necessities of life by keeping more than they can use, and who cannot be changed in their way, such is the stubbornness of their make-up, constitute a permanent menace and burden upon society. And hence the following is a generally acknowledged precept of natural law: One who enjoys no right peculiar to himself shall not claim more for himself than for others, but he shall permit others to enjoy the same right that he himself does. A tribune of the people speaks as follows in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VII [xli]:

Nor less supported are we by this unwritten and unenacted law of nature, when we request of you, fathers, that the condition of the people may be neither better nor worse than your own [. . .]. We look upon it as our duty to confer magistracies, precedence, and honours upon those among you who are distinguished by their virtue; but at the same time we think it reasonable that to suffer no injury, and to receive justice adequate to the wrong sustained, shall be equal and common to all those who live under the same government. (S.)

Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. III, chap. xxi: 'He who wishes to place men on an equality ought to take away [. . .] arrogance, pride, and haughtiness, that those who are powerful and lifted upon high may know that they are on a level even with the most needy.' (C.) Add Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxviii. And so the following words from Livy, Bk. III, chap. liii, abound in the deepest insolence: 'He is sufficiently and abundantly humble who lives in a state on an equal footing, neither inflicting nor suffering injury.' (S.) As if it were an unworthy thing that the privileges of nobility do not allow it to dispense with this most just law: What you do not wish done to you, do not to another! A similar case is the most arrogant satisfaction offered by the

On the principle presented above rests the compliment to Trajan, in Pliny, Panegyric [ii. 4]: 'He regards himself as one of us, and this very fact makes him all the more excellent and eminent. He is no less conscious that he is a man than that he is ruling over men.' For on coming to the throne he had promised that he would be such a ruler over his subjects as any of them would wish his ruler to be. The same spirit is seen in the remark of Galba to Piso, in Tacitus, Histories, Bk. I, chap. xvi: 'In distinguishing good from evil, the most effectual and compendious course is, to consider what you would approve or repudiate were you a subject and another the sovereign.' (O.) Seneca, Letters, xlvii [111]: 'This is the kernel of my advice: Treat your inferiors as you would be treated by your betters.' (G.) But from what has been said the following words of Lucan, Bk. V [340 ff.], seem an unbearable bit of insolence: 'Never does the care of the Gods thus lower itself, that the Fates should have leisure to attend to your death and your safety. On the movements of the great do all these things attend. Through a few does the human race exist.' (R.) This view is called a Gigantean state of mind by Bacon of Verulam, The Advancement of Learning, Bk. VII, chap. ii, 'whereby those great disturbers of the world are possessed, who seem to have no other end in life than that all men should be happy or miserable according as these disturbers themselves are their friends or enemies, and that the world should bear, as it were, their likeness; all of which is a veritable war against God.'

5. The same equality also shows how a man should act, if he has the task of adjusting right among several persons: He should treat them as equals and should favour no one above another, except in so far as some particular right belongs to a man. For if he fails to observe natural equity by favouring one man above another, he is liable immediately to scorn and injury from the person thus slighted, because he did not give him what was his right, and took away from the dignity accorded him by nature. Livy, Bk. XXXIV, chap. iv: 'For that that should not be lawful for you which is permitted to another, may perhaps naturally excite some degree of shame or indignation.' (E.) It follows, that, in case the thing to be distributed cannot be divided among several¹, it should, if possible, be used in common by those who have equal rights in it, on the understanding that if the quantity of the thing permits, they may use it as much as they wish. But if the thing does not permit this, they may employ it in a limited degree, and in proportion to the number of those who use it; for any other way of observing equality cannot be imagined. But if the thing can neither be divided nor held in common, its use shall either pass around in turn (Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. vi: 'The king, sensible that it was difficult to decide on their pretensions, and that a preference would be regarded by the rejected party as an injury, directed that they should carry him alternately' (A.)), or, if even this is impossible, and the equivalent cannot be given to the rest by one of the number, it shall have to go to one of them by lot. For in cases of this kind no more convenient solution can be found than the lot, because it avoids any suspicion of disdain, and takes nothing from the dignity of him who is not favoured. Proverbs, xviii. 18. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, §§ 15-18, where he divides casting of lot into arbitrary and natural. The former takes place with the consent of the contenders, who agree beforehand on a solution or outcome which they cannot control or foresee by any plan, and so such a lot in respect to men depends upon mere chance and the turn of fortune. Under natural lot he places first occupation, according to which a thing, that cannot be divided or held in common, goes to him who was the first to lay hand on it with the intention of keeping it; and primogeniture, by which all family possessions which can neither be divided nor held in common by several children, go to the eldest.

But if we desire to go a little more accurately into the matter, there is really no kind of lot but arbitrary. For there is no apparent reason why a solution, which no one can secure by his own ingenuity, should confer on any man a right that will prevail against his equals, 230 unless this right has been accorded the same solution by the choice and agreement of men. Therefore, a thing which is no one's property, belongs to the one who seizes it, because, when individual ownership of things was introduced among men, it is generally understood that men entered into a tacit agreement that, if there were any things not assigned to particular individuals, and the public weal did not demand that they be left in common for all succeeding generations, they should pass to the man who was the first to seize them. And thus even the right of primogeniture owes its origin to an agreement or constitution of men. For why, otherwise, should the other brothers, born of the same parents, be in a worse condition because of something which they were unable to remedy? And so Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xii, concludes: 'Brothers are equals except so far as they differ in years.' (W.)

Now the reason why the term lot is applied to these two rights is because they cannot be controlled or foreseen by human endeavour, and because to be passed over by them does not constitute any affront. But they will be treated more fully in another connexion.

6. An offence is done to this equality also by pride, whereby a person, for no reason at all, or else an insufficient one, raises himself above others, and looks down upon them as if they were not his equals. Descartes, Les Passions, art. 152, has well shown how far such conduct departs from true generosity or greatness of mind. After laying it down that wisdom consists in the main in knowing in what way and for what reason a person should esteem or despise himself, his argument proceeds as follows¹: The only just cause for our esteeming ourselves, proceeds from the proper use of our free power of choice, and from the control which we exercise over our will, since there is nothing, except such actions as depend on the will alone, for which we may with reason be either praised or blamed. Therefore, true generosity, which is responsible for a man esteeming himself as highly as he properly can, consists in a man's realizing that nothing is really his beyond this free disposal of his will, that he should be praised or blamed only for its proper or improper use, and that he be conscious of a firm resolution on his part to use it properly. Furthermore, those who realize and are conscious of this principle in their own actions, easily persuade themselves that all other men feel the same way about themselves, since there is nothing in all this which depends upon another. Such men, therefore, never despise others, and are ready to excuse their faults on the ground that they are due more to some error than to malice. Also, just as men who place no great value on wealth, honours, beauty, mental equipment, and learning, feel that they are little inferior to those who excel them in these lines, so, upon finding themselves thus endowed, they conclude they are not for that reason alone greatly superior to others whom they excel. And hence there is observed in generous men an honest humility, which consists in our reflecting on the weakness of our nature, and the mistakes which we may once have made, or may make again, that are in no way smaller than those which can be made by others; and so this humility prevents us from rating ourselves above any man, since we reflect that other men can use their free will, of which they have an equal share, just as well as we can. But those who have a good opinion of themselves for any other reason whatsoever, are filled not with true generosity, but with a swollen pride, which is always baneful, and all the more as there is less reason for such self-esteem.

And the most unjustified of all reasons for pride is that of being proud without reason, or, in other words, when a man feels that he has no merit in himself for which he should be esteemed, but thinks that glory consists in laying claim to it, and believes that the more of it men claim 231 for themselves, the more they actually possess. This fault is so absurd, that one could scarcely believe that there were men who would prostitute themselves to it, were there not so many flatterers who, by their empty praise, entice the more stupid among men into such pride. Pindar, Olympian Odes, ix [58-9]: 'Untimely boasting is in unison with madness.' (S.)

Not even if a man has attained honours and power has he reason to be proud. This is well illustrated by the words in which Menelaus expostulates with Agamemnon in Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis [337 ff.]:

Hast forgotten how thou fain wouldst lead the Greeks to Ilium's shore,
How to all men wast thou lowly, clasping hands of amity,
Keeping open doors for whoso of the folk would seek to thee,
Bidding all accost thee freely, challenging the modest heart,
Seeking by thy shifts to buy advancement as in open mart?
(Tacitus puts it in a word: 'In order to be emperor,¹ crouching like a slave.'
(O.) [Histories, I. xxxvi. 13].)

Ah! when thy power was won, thou changest all thy mien: no more Wast thou unto friends of days gone by a friend as theretofore,
[.] The noble-souled
Ought not, raised to high estate, to turn him from the paths of old, Nay, but more than ever loyal then unto his friends should be,
When his power to help is more than ever, through prosperity. (W.)

And one should keep before his eyes the passage of Lucian, De [Pro] Imaginibus [Imagines, xxi]: 'No one would envy a person who outshines him, if he sees that he takes his good fortune with a spirit of moderation.'

7. It is a more serious offence against this equality if a man expresses his contempt for others by outward signs, such as overt acts, remarks, grimaces, laughter, and any kind of insult, which often consists in giving some inappropriate or cheap gift. Add Digest, II. viii. 5, § 1; Matthew, v. 22. Such an offence is to be considered all the worse, in so far as the minds of others are moved thereby to greater wrath and desire for revenge. Many, indeed, there are who prefer to expose their life to danger, and to break the peace with another man, rather than allow an insult to go unavenged.² For it violates that possession in which the soul of man takes its greatest pride, and for which it has so sensitive an affection—his glory and esteem, in the preservation and vigour of which rests all the satisfaction of his spirit.

8. A further conclusion to be drawn from what has been said is that the old idea handed down from the Greeks, to the effect that certain men are slaves by nature, merits complete disapproval. This, if taken in so crude a form, is directly at odds with the natural equality of men. And so Strabo, Bk. I [p. 66], passes a wise judgement on those who advised Alexander to treat the Greeks as friends and the barbarians as enemies: 'It would be better to make such divisions accord to good qualities and bad qualities; for not only are many of the Greeks bad, but many of the Barbarians are refined.' (J.) It is, of course, clear that some men abound in such mental equipment that they not only can look out for themselves, but can also undertake the direction of others, while others through stupidity are incapable of directing even themselves, so that they do a thing badly or not at all, unless they are directed and urged on by others; and because nature has often endowed them with a strong physique, by it they can render signal services to the rest of mankind. When such men live under subjection to the authority of some more prudent man, they have, without doubt, found a status suitable to their mental equipment. Now if these men agree to some distribution of control, it is surely consonant with nature that the power to command should be conferred on the former, and on the latter should be laid the necessity of obedience, and this upon some basis agreed to by both. In this sense is to be taken the statement of 232 Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I [ii]: 'For he who can foresee with his mind is by nature intended to be lord and master, and he who can work with his body is a subject, and by nature a slave; hence master and slave have the same interest.' (J.) This is paraphrased by Daniel Heinsius in the following form:

Nothing is more agreeable with nature than that such things as are so fashioned by nature as to excel in prudence and mental attainment, and to foresee everything in the far distant future, should command and rule over all other things which excel less in such respects. While, on the other hand, those who are so born that they can carry out the commands of the more prudent with a vigorous and strong body, are fashioned by nature for obedience and service to the state. And so what is for the good of the master is also for the good of the slave, and the same usefulness and advantage belongs to each.

A similar thought appears in Apuleius, De Philosophia [II. xviii]:

It is better that a man who is neither by nature nor by industry prepared for a right way of living, should not govern but be governed; should be a servant and not a master; should on account of his own lack of control over himself be under the power of others; should accept the part of obedience rather than of command.

Yet it would be most absurd to believe that nature herself has, in fact, given to the more prudent rule over the more dull, or even any such a right, whereby the former can force the latter to serve them against their will. For if sovereignty is established in fact, some human agency must precede, and a natural aptitude for ruling does not of itself give a man the rule over him who is constituted by nature only for servitude. Nor can I, without more ado, use force in imposing upon another what is good for him. For men enjoy an equal natural liberty, and if they are to allow it to be curtailed, their consent must be secured, whether that consent be express, or tacit, or interpretative, or else they must have done something whereby others have secured the right to deprive them of their equality, even against their will. And so the remarks of Quintilian, Declamations, xiii [8], are entirely justified:

What has nature produced that is not free? I forbear to speak of slaves, whom the hard fortune of war has delivered over as prey to their conquerors, although they were born by the same laws, the same fortune, the same necessity. They draw breath from the same sky, and it was not nature which gave any of them a master, but only fortune.

Ulpian, in Digest, I. i. 4, observes that 'by natural law all men are born free'. This statement, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xxii, § 11, maintains, must be understood of liberty κατὰ στέρησιν [by deprivation] and not of the liberty κατ' ἐναντιότητα [by opposition], that is, that a person is not by nature a slave, for no person is free in the sense that he cannot become a slave.

This might be stated in another form as follows: Since nature made all men equal, and since slavery cannot be understood apart from¹ inequality—for although it is the part of a slave to recognize a superior, liberty does not require one to have an inferior, but it is sufficient if a man is not subject to a superior—therefore, all men by nature, antecedent to any act of man, are understood to be free. But natural aptitude, or the presence of such qualities as are necessary to a certain state, does not of itself put one in that state. For he who is worthy to rule, or fitted to lead an army, does not forthwith become king or general. Nor can that Lollius, whom Horace, Odes, Bk. IV, ode ix [34 ff.], describes, claim the fasces immediately on any right of his: 'He had a mind experienced in affairs, well-poised in weal or woe, punishing greedy fraud, holding aloof from money that draws all things to itself, a consul not of a single year.' (B.) For the account of Plutarch, Pelopidas [p. 290, chap. xxiv], that he held authority longer than the laws allowed, lest the sluggishness of his successors should ruin the state, is an exception to the rule. Add Cornelius Nepos, Epaminondas, chaps. vii, viii, and Livy, Bk. XXVI, chap. ii.

At this point we must explain the saying of Albutius in Seneca, Controversies, Bk. III, cont. xxi [VII. vi. 18]: 'No one is born free, no one a slave; fortune has assigned these names to individuals later on in life.' That is, so long as all men were equal, men could not be conceived as differing in respect of any such state as is opposed to that natural state of equality. But when those who had passed from that state were called by the special name of slave, those who retained that state were designated free men. The principle can be explained by an illustration. So long as there is no soldier in a state, all the citizens are rated in the same class; but when part of the citizens are assigned military duty, there arise the opposite terms of 'soldiers' and 'country-men', since no one could be called a 'country-man' before there was a 'soldier'. In this sense can be taken the statement, which Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. iii, quotes and then rejects: 'The distinction between slave and freeman exists by law only.' (J.) For had not slavery been introduced by human institution, the future state of men would have been uniform, and there would have been nothing to distinguish a slave from a freeman, since there would have been none of the former class. Just as it is stated in Institutes, I. v: 'Though we are all known by the common name of "man", three classes of men came into existence with the law of nations, namely, men freeborn, slaves, and thirdly, freedmen.' (M.) Although the statement of Aristotle may allow this explanation: The rights of liberty and slavery, as they are considered among men living in states, are defined by civil laws.

But there are also other considerations which demolish the crudely held belief regarding slaves by nature. For there is scarcely a man so dull as not to think that his manner of life is more correct and advantageous when directed by his own wish, than when directed by the command of another—a feeling more to be seen in whole nations, none of which is so abject that it does not prefer to be directed from within, rather than to be subject to others. And finally, since nature does not set up any actual government, while those servants by nature, as Aristotle calls them, are for the most part of good physique, there will be a battle, uncertain in its outcome, between intelligent men and these latter, in which the former can by no means assure themselves of victory.

A further point made by Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. i [I. ii], must also be rejected: 'Wherefore the poets say,

It is meet that Hellenes should rule over barbarians;
as if they thought that the barbarian and the slave were by nature one.' (J.)

Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis, [1400–1401]:

Right is it that Hellenes rule barbarians, not that alien yoke Rest on Hellenes. They be bondsmen, we be freeborn folk. (W.)

On such a score it would be easy to mark down as barbarians all peoples whose customs differ from ours, and attack them on this excuse alone. But it is clear that these ideas of the Greeks arose, partly because the Greeks enjoyed so great a degree of liberty in their democracies, while the Persians were firmly bound to obey a single man, and partly from a hatred which they exhibited towards the latter to a most unrestrained and unnatural degree. For this reason Isocrates, Panegyric [184] and Panathenaic Oration [163], calls the Persians the 'natural enemies' of the Greeks, and says that in their assemblies, before any business was begun, 'curses were pronounced upon citizens who suggested peace or friendship with the Persians'; and that the Eumolpids and heralds, in the festival of the Mysteries, from hatred for the Persians, forbade other barbarians as well, as if they were murderers, to join in the sacred rites.

But these ideas can be defended more easily, perhaps, if we say that Aristotle, in making some slavery natural and other slavery legal, meant that the former is when a dull but strong man is in slavery to one who is equipped with natural ability to direct, whereby each of them lives in a state advantageous to himself; but it is legal slavery when a bad turn of fortune, or the rank of his mother, forces a man of good mind and ability, through fear or the hand of the law, to serve a man who is his inferior. When this takes place, such a slave cannot help entertaining hatred towards his master. But when, on the other hand, a mutual comparison is made of the qualities which nature herself has created as suitable for each of the two statuses, a kind of friendship strikes up between the slave and his master. However, it must always be regarded as an established fact that a mere natural aptitude does not give the possessor of it a perfect right to impose servitude upon another, nor lay upon the former an obligation to assume it. 234

9. A few remarks should be made, at this point, on that equality which is a consequence of a natural state, and which we can call equality of power or of liberty. By this all men are recognized to be naturally equal, in so far as no one, apart from an antecedent deed or agreement of man, has any power over another, but every man is the governor of his acts or power. This equality was afterwards removed by a civil state, wherein, since one or more persons received the power to give orders to others, the rest were put under the necessity of obedience, resulting in the greatest inequality imaginable between rulers and subjects. But since one finds in a civil state, even among fellow citizens, inequality not merely in reputation and dignity (see below, Bk. VIII, chap. iv), but also in the power which one man has over another, it should be borne in mind that a part of that inequality is due to the status of head of a family [paterfamilias], which preceded the formation of a state, and the power, which, under this institution, they secured over their wives, children, and slaves, the heads of families brought over into states. This inequality, therefore, owes none of its origin to states, but is much older than they are, and so the institution of head of a family was not given by states, but was carried over into them, although here and there with considerable limitation and curtailment.

Now if any further inequality of power is found among citizens, it clearly arises from the highest civil authority, since whoever have entered a state, have transferred to those in supreme control all the power that they had over themselves, as far, of course, as was necessary for the nature of the state. And so, if any person had already transferred some of his power to another, before the formation of the state, such power is either destroyed by his entering the state, or else is subject to the final disposition of the state. But after a person has subjected himself to the supreme authority, there is no way whereby he can give another any of his power which will prevail against the right now secured by the supreme authority, since, were this so, one would have two masters, neither subordinate to the other, whom one cannot serve at the same time. Therefore, whatever inequality between citizens arises after the formation of states, owes its origin either to the public administration, whereby the supreme authority delegates to certain citizens the exercise of some special authority over the rest, or to some special privilege granted by the supreme authority.

But no inequality arises from a difference in wealth between citizens as such, except in so far as great wealth makes it possible actually to injure others, or to do them some good; and for this reason it has been the custom for poorer men to make furtive advances, in order to secure the favour of the more wealthy, and to submit themselves to them, either so that the latter may do them no harm, or else that they may confer on them some benefit. Compare Lucius Antistius Constans, De Jure Ecclesiasticorum, tit. iii. But this civil inequality conflicts in no way with those rules which we have already deduced from natural equality.

ON THE GENERAL DUTIES OF HUMANITY

|---|---|-----|
| 1. A man should advance the interests of another man. | 9. On admitting strangers. | |
| 2. Either indefinitely; | 10. On allowing a residence to foreigners. | |
| 3. Or definitely, by common humanity. | 11. On furnishing a market. | |
| 4. Lesser instances of the latter. | 12. Whether one is bound to buy another's goods. | |
| 5. On allowing passage through our land to other persons; | 13. On permitting marriages. | 235 |
| 6. Also to goods. | 14. Whether a person can be denied what is allowed to all men in general. | |
| 7. Whether toll can be demanded for passage. | 15. On beneficence. | |
| 8. On approach to a foreign coast. | 16. On a grateful, | |
| | 17. And an ungrateful mind. | |

It is, indeed, a little thing not to have hurt another, or not to have taken from him his proper esteem, which things do but remove any just reason for hatred. But some benefit as well must be conferred upon another, if the minds of men are to be united by a still firmer bond. A man has not paid his debt to the sociable attitude if he has not thrust me from him by some deed of malevolence or ingratitude, but some¹ benefit should be done me, so that I may be glad that there are also others of my nature to dwell on this earth. The mutual dependence and relationship which nature has constituted between men, demand the exercise of mutual duties. Seneca, Letters, xcv [51]: 'But what a small thing it is not to hurt the man to whom we ought to do good!' Plato has a fine passage in Epistles, ix [p. 358 A], to Archytas of Tarentum: 'Each of us is born not for himself alone. We are born partly for our country, partly for our parents, partly for our friends.' (P.) The same thought is thus expressed by Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vii]:

We are not born for ourselves alone, and our country claims her share, our parents, and our friends, their share; and, as the Stoics hold, all that the earth produces is created for the use of man, so men are created for the sake of men, that they may mutually do good to one another; in this we ought to take nature for our guide, to throw into the public stock the offices of general utility by a reciprocation of duties; sometimes by receiving, sometimes by giving, and sometimes to cement human society by arts, by industry, and by our resources. (E.)

Idem, On Duties, Bk. III [v]: 'To undergo the greatest labour and inquietude for the sake, if it were possible, of preserving or assisting all nations [. . .] is more in accordance with nature than to live in solitude, not only without any inquietude, but even amidst the greatest pleasures.' (E.) Add Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. VI, chaps. x, xi. Philo Judaeus, That God is Immutable [iv]: 'For all men will be deservedly miserable, who seek their own advantage alone, despising all other things, as though they were born for themselves alone, and not for numberless other persons, father, mother, wife, children, and the human race.' ¹ It was one of the maxims of the Gymnosophists, according to Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. II [31]: 'Not to neglect in its danger a soul when it had once entered a human body.' Libanius, Declamations, xix [xiii. 26]: 'When I use the word man, I mean compassion, I mean human kindness.' Add Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. V, chap. i. Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. III, § 4: 'All that is rational is akin, and it is in man's nature to care for all men.' (H.) Idem, Bk. IV, § 3: 'Rational creatures have been made for one another.' (H.) Add Idem, Bk. IV, § 4; Seneca, Epistles, xcv [52]:

We are members of a great body. Nature has made us all akin; we are formed of the same elements and produced to the same ends. She has implanted in our breasts mutual affection, and made us apt for social intercourse. She has constituted justice and equity. By her constitution it is more wretched to do an injury than to suffer one, and by her commands our hands are always ready to help. Let this verse be ever in our hearts and upon our lips: 'I am a man, and regard nothing as alien that concerns man' [Terence, The Self-Tormentor, 77]. Let us consider that we are born for the common good. Our human society is altogether like a vaulted stone roof, which would fall were it not held up by the natural thrust of stone against stone.

236 Add Bacon, Essays, chap. xiii. But how much more foul will be the sin of him who finds pleasure in the misfortunes of others, especially of the innocent, or of him who grieves at their successes!

2. Now the interests of other men are advanced by us either indefinitely or definitely, and this so that something is either taken or else not taken away from us. This comes about in the first way if a man carefully cultivates his mind or body, so that he may be enabled to better the interests of others, or if, by the quickness of his wits, he makes such discoveries as will render the life of man more orderly. They will discover the best way to render such service who take to heart the words of Columella, On Farming, Bk. XI, chap. i [27]: 'In every phase of life it is of the utmost importance that a man realize he does not know what he actually does not know, and seek ever to add to his knowledge what he was ignorant of before.'

From this it appears that those who fail to develop themselves by some honest occupation, sin against the law of nature, and are of no use to themselves and a burden to others, while they look upon their soul as only salt to keep their body from decay [Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, II. clx, after Chrysippus]—'ciphers only, fit for nothing but to eat their share of the earth's fruits' (W.) [Horace, Epistles, I. ii. 27]. To remove such people from the state, the Egyptians had the custom that all the inhabitants should give their names to a magistrate, stating at the same time by what occupation and manner of life each made his living. The man who returned a false report, or followed an improper calling, suffered the penalty of death. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii. A similar law among the people of Sardinia is recorded for us by Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. IV, chap. i. In this class belong also those who are satisfied with the fortune left by their parents, and think they have been freed from any accusation of slothfulness, since the industry of others has secured them the means of existence. On the same score, Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. VI [610-11], very properly assigns a place in Tartarus to those 'who in selfish greed brooded over gotten wealth, nor shared it with their own'. (B.) An illustration of the same thought is to be found in a law of the Milesians, that 'a man who had squandered the whole of his patrimony, should not be allowed funeral rites in his country'. (Y.) Diogenes Laertius, Democritus [ix. 39]. Such men are also described by Manilius, Astronomica, Bk. IV, [537 ff.]:

He wrongs his father and he cheats his son.
His race in vain with expectation wait,
For in himself he buries his estate.
So vast his gluttony, his lust so wild,
That he devours himself,¹ yet is not filled.
And while his appetite proceeds to crave
He eats his funeral and he spends his grave. (C.)

And so the Apostle gives as one of the reasons why every one should work: 'That he may have whereof to give to him that hath need.' Ephesians, iv. 28. Horace [Satires, II. ii. 103]: 'Why does any man who does not deserve' (poverty), 'want while you abound?'

Another class of men who belong here are those who, like swine, give pleasure only by their death. An anonymous poet in the Anthology has made fun at their expense [XI. 166]: 'All say you are rich, but I say you are poor, Apollophanes, for their use is the proof of riches. If you take your share² of them, they are yours, but if you keep them for your heirs, they are already some one else's.' (P.)

Nor, in my opinion, should we exclude from this type those useless burdens to the earth,³ who, under the guise of religion, labour with no other end than to distend their belly with much fat, and in their sluggishness devour the wealth stored up by the labour of others. On these Zosimus, although a pagan, passed a just sentence, Bk. V [on the year 403, chap. xxiii]:

These monks abstain from lawful wedlock, and fill cities and villages with swarms of unmarried human beings, useful neither for war nor for any other social need in the state. But from that time down to the present they have proceeded to make their own the larger part of the earth, and under the pretence of sharing everything with the poor have just about reduced all men to the level of beggars.

³ [The phrase is from Homer, Iliad, XVIII. 104.—Tr.]

Among such people you may also include the class of beggars among the Chinese, who butt each other around with their heads until¹ they are given something. On them see Neuhoſ, Legatio, pp. 267-8. High praise is given by Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 7, to a custom of the inhabitants of ancient Massilia, according to which Massilia 237 'used to shut its gates to all who seek to be maintained in idleness under the guise of religion, feeling that it ought to do away with such a false and specious superstition'. Add a letter of Erasmus to Servatius, found in the account of his life prefixed to the edition of his letters, London, 1642.

On the other hand, the greatest praise should always be accorded those who, by the quickness of their wits, have made useful discoveries for mankind, and have not kept such discoveries for themselves alone, but gladly made them the common property of others. For 'in the tomb, hidden worth differs little from cowardice' (B.), Horace, Odes, Bk. IV, ode ix [29-30]. Thus Vergil, loc. cit. [vi. 663-4], puts in the Elysian Fields those 'who by wise invention the life of man refined, and those who made their memory sweet and loved by deeds of kindness and of mercy'. (B.) And Servius remarks on these lines [on 663]: 'Those who have refined and adorned life by the invention of the arts. Now he means the philosophers, who have devised anything that serves for the enrichment of life.' Add Lucretius, Bk. V, lines 1 ff. And so the ancients admitted many men to the council of the gods, because they had made the life of man more advanced by useful inventions or beneficent institutions. On the reasons why Isis and Osiris gained divine honours among the Egyptians, see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chaps. 13-15. Add Idem, Bk. I, chap. xliii. Cicero, On Ends, Bk. III [viii]: 'We are urged by nature to wish to help as many men as we can, especially by instructing them and laying before them rules for wise living.' (E.) Add Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXV, chap. i. Seneca, Letters, vi:

I am glad to learn in order that I may teach. Nothing will ever please me, no matter how excellent or beneficial, if I must retain the knowledge of it to myself. And if wisdom were given me under the express condition that it must be kept hidden and not uttered, I should refuse it. (G.)

Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus [314]:

This is man's highest end,
 To others' service all his powers to lend. (S.)

And so our fullest approbation cannot be given to the epitaph of Similis, who, after retiring from the position of praetorian prefect under Hadrian, spent the last seven years of his life in the country: 'Here lies Similis, who existed through so many years, but lived only seven.' [Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio Cassius, LXIX. xix. 2.]

By the means just mentioned, and others like them, the interests of others are furthered in general and indefinitely, that is, we do not undertake to aid this or that person, but we give the products of our hands for the use of every man, as if they were the common property of all. But at this point the question may be raised whether, if, for example, a man has discovered a method of making gold or silver without much effort, and from a cheap and plentiful substance, he should publish his method. The answer must be in the negative, since, if such a secret were made common knowledge, the result would be the hopeless confusion of trade, states, capital, and practically every institution of civil life.

3. A man serves others more definitely if he grants certain men the use of something which could be of some use to him; and this can often be done without loss, trouble, or labour on our part. To have denied such a service, or given it grudgingly, is regarded as a piece of malignity and inhumanity worthy of censure. For a faculty of this sort, whereby we can be the cause of another's gain, without ourselves suffering any loss, is an idle thing, unless used when occasion demands, and turns to the opprobrium of its possessor. And it is entirely proper to compare such men with dogs which lie in hay that they cannot eat, and drive away with their fangs the oxen that would approach it [Aesop, 228]. And so, in the bestowal of such benefits, we base our argument upon nothing other than man or common nature. This is illustrated by the remark of Aristotle in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. V [17 and 21], when certain men reproved him for giving a dole to an unworthy person: 'I did not pity his character, but the man himself'; or, as others report it: 'I gave not to the man, but to humanity.' (Y.) Thus how inhuman it would be of me, if I did not want to keep something any longer, because I had more than I could use, or else its preservation was an inconvenience to me, not to prefer leaving it intact, so that it could be of use to others, rather than to destroy it! Although in war things are often destroyed which cannot 238 be saved, so that the enemy cannot turn them against us.

In like manner we should grant freely to others those things which are said to be of innocent utility (innocuae utilitatis). On such matters Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xvi], has this to say:

All communities of men consist of things which are of that nature which, though placed by Ennius under one head, may be applied to many. 'He (says that author) who kindly shows the bewildered traveller the right road, does, as it were, light his lamp by his own; which affords none the less light to himself after it lighted the other.' By this single example he sufficiently enjoins on us to perform, even to a stranger, all the service we can do without detriment to ourselves. Of which service the following are common illustrations: 'That we are to debar no man from the running stream'; 'That we are to suffer any who desire it to kindle fire at our fire'; 'That we are to give faithful counsel to a person who is in doubt': (In Plato, Theages [p. 122 B], 'counsel' is called 'a holy thing') all which are particulars that are serviceable to the receiver without being detrimental to the bestower. We are, therefore, to practise them, and be constantly contributing somewhat to the common good. As the means, however, of each particular person are very confined, and the numbers of the indigent are boundless, our distributive generosity ought still to be bounded by the principle of Ennius—'it nevertheless gives light to one's self'—that we may still be possessed of the means to be generous to our friends. (E.)

Idem, On Duties, Bk. III [xiii]: 'It is forbidden at Athens with public execrations, not to point out the road to one going astray.' (E.) From such things no one should be cut off, unless it happen that some monstrous deeds of his have warranted his being regarded as an abomination. Therefore, Plutarch, De Invidia et Odio [vi], tells us:

The Athenians therefore had so utter an abhorrence of those who accused Socrates, that they would neither lend them fire, nor answer any question, nor wash with them in the same water, but commanded the servants to pour it out as polluted; till these sycophants, no longer able to bear up under the pressure of this hatred, put an end to their lives. (G.)

Polybius, Excerpta Peiresciana, 142 [XXX. xx], tells the same story about Callicrates and Andronidas. Likewise in Athens no fire was lighted for men condemned because of certain crimes, nor were they allowed to join in banquets, or in the celebration of state worship, as we are informed in Dinarchus, Orations, Against Aristogeiton [II. ix]. Add Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus, lines 244 ff.; Euripides, Orestes, lines 46 and 513.

When Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xxix, says, 'Who ever called a hunk of bread a benefit, or a farthing dole tossed to a beggar, or the means of lighting a fire?' (S.), he does not deny that such favours should be willingly granted others, but he maintains that to think of laying a man under obligation by such trifles is impudent and base. For although such things are at times of the greatest value, yet they are so easily rendered that, even when enhanced by circumstances, no entry should be made of them on one's books. So Terence, Andria [330 f.], says: 'I don't think it's a gentlemanly thing for a man when he deserves no gratitude to put in a claim for it.' (S.) Nor can one deserve thanks for such gifts as are the object of the jest of Horace, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. vii [14 ff.]:

The manner in which the Calabrian host invites a guest to eat his pears; 'Eat some more, pray.' 'I have had enough.' 'But please take away as many as you like.' 'No, thank you.' 'They will be a welcome present for your boys if you will take them.' 'I am as much obliged by your generosity as if you had sent me away laden.' 'Well—as you please—if you leave them, they go into the pig-tub to-day.' The prodigal and fool gives away what he despises and hates. (W.)

4. Illustrations of these acts of common humanity are in a passage of Plutarch, Symposiasts, Bk. VII, qu. iv, where there is a discussion of the question, why the ancient Romans always left something on the table, and never put out their lamps. Among other reasons for this custom the following is advanced:

This custom is an instruction for kindness and good will. For it is not lawful for any one that has taken sufficiently to destroy the remainder of the food; nor for him who has supplied his necessities from the fountain to stop it up; nor for him that has made use of any marks, either by sea or land, to ruin or deface them; but every one ought to leave those things that may be useful to those persons that afterwards may have need of them. Therefore, it is not fit, out of a saving covetous humour, to put out a lamp as soon as we need it not; but we ought to preserve and let it burn for the use of those that perhaps want its light. Thus it would be very generous to lend our ears and eyes, nay, if possible, our reason and fortitude, to others, whilst we are idle or asleep. (G.) 239

Idem, Roman Questions [lxxv], on the same custom:

Or does the custom teach us that when we have enough and to spare of any necessary thing, as fire, water, or any other thing, we should not spoil it, but let all use it who need, and leave it for others when we no longer want it ourselves? (R.)

Theocritus, Idylls, xxvi [xxv. 5]: 'They say Hermes be the wrathfullest god in Heaven, an you deny a traveller guidance that hath true need of it.' (E.) Thus, in the Prometheus of Lucian, the hero accuses the gods of envy, since they were angered at his giving their fire to men, since 'fire becomes no less if one gives of it to another, nor is it extinguished if another takes its flames'. Another illustration is a law of Pythagoras, given in Diogenes Laertius [VIII. 23]: 'Not to destroy or injure a cultivated tree.' (Y.)

To this general class belongs the use of running water for drinking or washing. For although rivers can be either public or private property, yet simple humanity dictates that running water may be drunk or drawn from them by any one not an enemy. We prefer to state it this way, rather than to say with Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 12: 'Thus a river, viewed as a stream, is the property of the people through whose territory it flows.' (K.) To say that the same thing may be both private and common seems less fitting than that the use of some privately owned thing, on the law of humanity, should be allowed to all men. But to undertake to impute something, which is otherwise wasted and is replenished by a constant flow from the spring, is clearly a most sordid endeavour. Plautus, Truculentus [563 f.]: 'It is just as though a person should turn off a stream for himself from a river; if it is not turned off into a channel, still all that water would go into the sea.' (R.) Ovid [The Art of Love, III. 93-4]: 'Who would forbid light to be taken from another light presented? Or who, on the deep sea, would hoard up the expanse of waters?' (R.) This is the way to explain the speech of Latona to the Lycian country folk, Idem, Metamorphoses, Bk. VI [349 ff.]: 'Why do you deny me water? The enjoyment of water is a common right. Nature has not made the sun private to any, nor the air, nor soft water. This common right I seek.' (M.)

Now water and a spring can unquestionably become private property; and so the Israelites offer to purchase water for themselves and their beasts from the Edomites, Numbers, xx. 19; compare 2 Chronicles, xxxii. 3. Although when there is a copious flow, we should allow any one to use the scattering streams, provided it can be done without prejudice to ourselves. Add Genesis, xxvi. 20-2.

A law of Solon's in Plutarch, Solon [xxiii], should also be noted here:

Since the country was not supplied with waters by ever-flowing rivers, or lakes, or copious springs, but most of the inhabitants used wells which had been dug, he made a law that where there was a public well within a 'hippikon', a distance of four furlongs, that should be used, but where the distance was greater than this, people must try to get water of their own; if, however, after digging to a depth of ten fathoms on their own land, they could not get water, then they might get it from a neighbour's well, filling a five-gallon jar twice a day; for he thought it his duty to aid the needy, not to provision the idle. (P.)

Idem, De Vitando Aere Alieno [i, p. 827 D]:

Plato, in his Laws [844 B], permits not any one to go and draw water from his neighbour's well, who has not first digged and sunk a pit in his own ground till he is come to a vein of clay, and has by his soundings experimented that the place will not yield a spring [...]. But it must be lawful for them to take water from another's ground, when there is no way or means for them to find any in their own. (G.)

But it is not unusual for other duties of this kind also to be sanctioned by civil laws. See Leviticus, xix. 9-10; xxiii. 22; Deuteronomy, xxiv. 19-21; xxiii. 24-5; Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii; cf. Matthew, xii. 1. Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [845 A]: 'And if a stranger is 240 passing along a road, and desires to eat the autumnal fruit, let him, if he will, take of the fresh grape for himself or a single follower without price, as a tribute of hospitality.' (J.) By the laws of Lycurgus, a person at Sparta who was in want could make use of another's servant, animal, or food; Xenophon, De Republica Lacedaemoniorum [VI. iii-iv]. Add Law of the Burgundians, tit. xxviii, § 1; Selden, Bk. VI, chap. vi. A passage to the point is in Phocylides [24-6]:

Him that is without shelter take into thy house and guide the blind. Pity the shipwrecked, for voyaging is uncertain. Give thy hand to him that has fallen, and save the man who is solitary. [140 f.]: If a beast fall in the way, even though it belong to thine enemy, raise it up. A mortal that is wandering or lost bring thou never to shame.¹

Diphilus [frg. 62 Kock]: 'Do you not know what stands in the curses, if a man will not tell the right road?' Add Digest, XLVII. ix. 10. Quintilian, Declamations, V [vi]:

It was God's will for us to come to one another's assistance, and for each man, by rendering mutual aid, to protect his neighbour from what he himself was afraid of. This is not yet affection, nor the expression of personal esteem, but a sagacious fear of similar misfortunes, and a religious apprehension of common dangers. When another is starving each one pities himself. Thus, in a siege, a man shares his food; and thus one man's provisions have frequently met the wants of a whole company of fellow mariners. This also is the source of that affection which makes us cover with earth the corpses of men unknown to us, and however hasty our journey be, we never pass by any unburied body without performing to some degree this pious office.

5. Among these duties are reckoned by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 13, also that of allowing innocent passage over our lands, rivers, and such parts of the sea as have become subject to ownership, if any would use them for legitimate reasons; for instance, if a people has been forced to leave its own territories and is seeking a new home, or desires to carry on commerce with a distant people, or is seeking to recover by just war what is owed it, and even when they are established in another place and are hastening to bring succour to their motherland in her hour of danger. But these items require a somewhat extended consideration. It must, of course, be taken for granted that if a band, few in number and unarmed, wish to cross our territory, living at their own expense, a passage should be allowed them, in case they wish to use it for an honourable and necessary reason. But it is not so clear what should be said in the case of great hosts, since their passage may give us good grounds for apprehension, both from the hosts themselves, and from those to whose lands they are crossing. But Grotius, loc. cit., notwithstanding such apprehension, maintains that they should be allowed a passage, and that for this reason: Because it is understood that in the division of things, whereby primitive community was done away with, and distinct dominions of things were introduced, all reserved, as it were, such use of another's property as is required by any in need, and does no injury to its owners. Therefore, those who need a thing can demand by their own right such a use of it.

If this argument displease any one, it may be put more simply: By the law of humanity one man should grant another the innocent use of his property; and this use, under the stress of necessity, may even be claimed by force, since, indeed, its denial is caused by groundless timidity or malignity of mind. Although permission for this use should first be sought in a calm manner, and force should not be used before it is clear that the owner of the place intends to refuse the permission out of mere inhumanity, without any just reason.

According to Plutarch, Cimon [xvii. 1], when Cimon had led his army through the territory of the Corinthians, before first appealing to its citizens, Lachartus upbraided him: 'People who knock at doors, do not go in before the owner bids them.' (P.) In the same way Telephus, in Dictys Cretensis, Bk. II [ii], properly upbraids the Greeks, because, although they claimed¹ they came as friends, 'they had not sent ahead a messenger to announce their arrival'. In Livy, Bk. XXXIV, 241 chap. lxii, Masinissa,² 'when going in pursuit of Aphir, a fugitive from his kingdom, then hovering about Cyrene, with a party of Numidians, has solicited as a favour a passage through that very district, as being confessedly a part of the Carthaginian dominions.' (E.)

A further point is made that the mere fear of a multitude crossing a region is not reason enough for denying it passage, since the law of nature may be observed as well by many as by a few. And yet the same¹ law allows us to take security, from those who pass through, that they will either do us no damage, or else will compensate us for it. For it is an old saying that opportunity makes a thief, and that a man is short-sighted who admits so many men into his dwelling that they can turn and eject him. And there are not lacking instances of cities passing under the yoke, because they unguardedly admitted many armed men. This is all the more true because there are few generals who deserve the praise which is given Cn. Pompeius by Cicero, For the Manilian Law [xiii]: 'His legions arrived in Asia in such order that not only no man's hand in so numerous an army, but not even any man's footstep, did the least injury to any peaceful inhabitant.' (Y.) And so Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. I [vii-viii. 4], refuses the Helvetians passage through the Roman province, because remembering that the consul Lucius Cassius had been slain, and his army routed and sent under the yoke, by the Helvetii, Caesar did not believe [. . .] that men of unfriendly disposition, if granted an opportunity of marching through the Province, would refrain from outrage and mischief. (E.)

Different ways of taking security are proposed, as, for instance, those who request the right of passage are required to pass through without their arms—a thing you may scarcely require of armed forces, since to demand of such that they lay down their arms is almost the same as asking them 'to cut off their hands', as Florus, Bk. III [II], chap. xviii, writes of the inhabitants of Numantia. It would be easier for them to divide their forces and send them through in small bands, or to give hostages. For the precaution whereby the one who allows the passage would hire sufficient guards at the cost of the party crossing would appear to be too expensive, and requires a large amount of time.

Authorities add, furthermore, that passage should not be denied on the ground that it may be found in a more remote place and by a circuitous route, for if others would use the same excuse, it would be equivalent to refusing passage. And so it is enough if a passage is requested without evil intent, where it is shortest and most convenient.

Some, in order to establish a right of free passage, devise the theory that state highways are the common property of all men, and do not belong to the peoples through whose territory they run, as if such roads are parts of the frame of this earth, created by God Himself at

But there are not lacking good arguments to prove that, without some sort of agreement or concession, passage is not owed even by mere natural law, especially in case one has decided to cross our territory in order to make war on a neighbour of ours. For surely one neighbour owes it to another, who is his friend, or has done him some good turn, that he should refuse passage through his country to one who is going to attack him; provided he can prevent it without any great inconvenience to himself. And so the Gauls felt that it was a stupid and impudent demand made of them by the Romans, to propose that the Gauls, rather than suffer the war to pass on to Italy, should turn it upon themselves and expose their own lands to be laid waste instead of those of others. Since they had neither experienced good from the Romans, nor wrong from the Carthaginians, on account of which they should either take up arms on behalf of the Romans or against the Carthaginians. (S.) Livy, Bk. XXI, chap. xx.

Therefore, as a general thing, it is expressly stipulated in treaties that no passage will be granted our enemies. See the treaty of the Romans with Antiochus, in Livy, Bk. XXXVIII, chap. xxxviii, at the beginning; and with the Aetolians, in Polybius, Selections on Embassies, xxviii [XXII. xv. 3].

Nor does it meet the difficulty to say that passage should be granted, when the party is attacked in a just war, and should be denied, if threatened by an unjust war. For a decision on this point cannot always be made soon enough, and it is rash voluntarily to thrust oneself as a judge between two armed powers and make oneself a party to so great a quarrel. Besides, if free transit be granted, our own territory may become the seat of war. For what if my neighbour meet his enemy while he is still in my territory, and stop him there? I cannot see on what score that should be held against him, since he is surely not required to await him within his own borders, so that we may be relieved of his army. The safest course, therefore, would be, when it can be done without great inconvenience to ourselves, to deny passage and oppose it. But if we have not the strength to oppose it, or must ourselves, by such a course, be drawn into a serious conflict, it will be easy to excuse our agreement to our neighbour on the plea of necessity. The account of Plutarch, Lysander [xxvii. 3], is worthy of our attention. When Athens was in the hands of the Thirty Tyrants, the Thebans passed a law that, 'If any one should carry arms through Boeotia against the tyrants in Athens, no Theban would either see him or hear about it.' (P.)

Ziegler on Grotius, loc. cit., denies, as we do, that any one has a natural right of passage through another's territory, unless he has secured such by an agreement, just as no one can go through a man's farm, unless such a service has been agreed upon for such a farm. And this is all the more true if there be any plausible ground for fear. To illustrate the right as between individuals, you may have a right to walk through the yard of Titius; but if you pass through frequently carrying fire and faggots, so that there is danger that some damage may come to Titius' estate, Titius' fear does not, of course, take your right from you, but he may prevent your passing through with fire and faggots, and in that way your right of passing through in that particular fashion is taken away. But it should be observed, in this connexion, that a road or passage is not taken in our illustration as a continual service, but only as the temporary use of the property of some one else, which we were forced to take advantage of by some opportunity for profit, or by a necessity such as it would be inhuman on the part of another not to meet.

Illustrations can do little to settle this question. For it has always depended on a man's strength whether he demanded passage modestly or with boldness, or granted or denied it at the demand of another. In Plutarch, Agésilas [xvi], when the people of Tralles (called Troades in his Laconian Apophthegms) demanded of Agésilas, as a price for his passage, one hundred talents, and as many women, he laughed at them and said,

Why then did they not come at once to get their price. And so he marched forward and, finding them drawn up for battle, routed them and slew many of them. He sent his usual inquiry on to the king of the Macedonians also, who answered that he would deliberate upon it. 'Let him deliberate, then,' he said, 'but we will march on.' In amazement therefore at his boldness, and in fear, the king gave orders to let him pass as a friend. (P.)

But the illustration usually given is that of the people of Israel asking a passage through Edom, on the following terms: That they would pass along the main highway, they would not stray into the vineyards and cultivated fields, and would offer ready money for anything they needed. When the Edomites decided to prevent their passage with arms, they concluded not to attempt to force their way through, and passed by their borders in a more circuitous route. And although they touched some small portions of their territory, they passed through without doing any damage, although not a trace of humanity had been shown in denying them a passage. See Deuteronomy, ii. 1-4; Numbers, xx. 14. When the same nation sought an innocent passage of Sihon, king of the Amorites, he not merely refused it but came out armed against them, apparently beyond the borders of his own kingdom, and in this unprovoked attack was defeated, not so much because he refused the passage, as by way of punishment for so rashly provoking a war. Were this not the reason, the destruction of his nation would have seemed too great a revenge for merely not meeting a duty of humanity, since the Amorites were situated outside the promised land, the inhabitants of which God had, by a special dispensation, willed to destroy.

Nor is the answer, which some make, sufficient, namely, that 'if the Amorites wished their fear to be justified, they should not have repelled a person who offered fair terms, but should have discussed ways and means of bringing them into effect. But by breaking off relations of peace, as they did, they showed quite clearly that their mind was estranged from law and equity.' For by the law of all mankind a breach against merely the law of humanity does not deserve the severest penalties.

6. Regarding a matter of innocent profit, which is freely to be accorded every man, Grotius, loc. cit., goes on to say that merchandise should be allowed passage through our territory. But Ziegler accuses him of contradicting himself, because in § 13 he said that no man had a right to hinder any nation from trading with any other distant nation; while in the last paragraph of the same chapter he allows a nation to make an agreement with a distant one, to the effect that the latter will sell only to them certain products that are not produced elsewhere. Such an agreement would, of course, hinder others from trading with that nation.

But Grotius can be cleared, if we understand the hindrance in the former passage to be such as is attended with violence. Yet, on the whole, the matter is not entirely clear. For it is certain that the law of humanity does not obligate us to allow passage to any other merchandise than is necessary for the life of others. But I do not see how people who deal in merchandise that goes to furnish luxuries, or is traded in, not so much to meet the necessities of life, as to give great returns and satisfy avarice, can assert any right whereby they can claim that we owe them a passage through our territory. I confess that, in my opinion, it is scarcely possible to find a good excuse for any one desiring to deny a passage through the open sea, that is subject to our jurisdiction, to unarmed vessels, when going to a nation with whom he is at peace. And most of the authorities which are cited in such numbers by writers on our subject are concerned with this point. But there seems to be some reason for merchandise being halted in our territory, on our sea, or upon our rivers. For not to mention the possibility that such a constant passing of strangers may be at times prejudicial to our state, and give rise to suspicion, what is there to prevent citizens of our own state from securing the profit which strangers gather in passing through our borders? For surely we may favour the former rather than the latter. And although we meet with no damage, strictly speaking, if we grant a free passage to such goods, nor is any injury done us if another gets the profit which was also possible to us, yet since the third party has no right to exclude us from that profit, why may we not show our greatest regard for ourselves, and take that profit for our own? This can be done if goods passing between two peoples on our borders are allowed to go only through the hands of our citizens. And surely, unless this argument is allowed, I do not see how one can excuse the right of 'staple', as it is called, and other rights, whereby merchandise is stopped and brought to a certain mart, and exchange of wares is allowed foreigners not directly between themselves, but through the hands of the citizens of the place.

7. A further question seems to arise from what has been said: whether, namely, the law of humanity allows us to collect toll on merchandise that passes over lands, rivers, or seas, subject to our jurisdiction. For it seems clearly churlish to sell only for a price, a privilege which that law bids us to extend to every one. And yet the reason is perfectly obvious why some toll can be demanded on merchandise which passes over a land route. For damage is sometimes done the fields by the loaded wagons, and there is the expense of keeping 244 up the roads, while the lord of the country guarantees the merchants safety in their travel. Moreover, when bridges have to be built, there is obvious equity in tolls to cover their cost, just as, on the other hand, those who demand the toll are bound to take care of such bridges and to repair them. Thus Grotius, on 1 Kings, x. 29, observes that the horses which passed through Judaea on their way from Egypt to Syria, or to the Hittite, paid a large toll to Solomon for their passage, just as tolls were also paid for the passage of frankincense.

There is also no objection to tolls, when trouble has been taken to lessen the difficulty of travel by land, just as to-day canals are dug in certain places for the convenience¹ of travellers as well as of merchandise. Thus, if some one had in time past joined the Aegean and Ionian seas by cutting through the Isthmus of Corinth, he could surely have demanded a moderate toll of those who used it, in return for their being permitted a short and safe passage. Although even without such a canal Strabo, Bk. VIII [vi. 20], says:

The Asiatic and the Italic merchants found it most satisfactory to avoid the voyage to Malea, and to turn in at Corinth, discharging their wares there; where also the tolls upon everything exported from the Peloponnesus and imported into it by land, as it so happened, were paid.

Other writers add that the price of food in a country is raised by the passing through of a large number of people.

To such reasons for the equity of toll on land traffic this further one is to be added: That a state can demand at least a slight acknowledgement from the merchandise of foreigners, on the ground that it allows them, by the use of their territory, to secure directly from a third nation merchandise, from which its own citizens could secure a profit by claiming a right of staple.

Regarding the custom of taking tolls on rivers, it can be added that since rivers often do no little damage to adjacent fields by cutting away their banks and by floods, and must often be confined within levees, it is not unjust to demand, as a recompense for such damages, some slight contribution from those who, with no trouble to themselves, make a profit by the use of the rivers. It is forbidden, indeed, in Capitularies of Charles, III. xii, to 'take toll on rivers, where no assistance is given the travellers'; add Law of the Lombards, Bk. III, tit. i, law 21. But this seems to have been drawn up for the citizens of that state, and need not necessarily be extended to aliens as well.

It is more difficult to come to a conclusion about the equity of tolls demanded upon seas. Of course there is no question of their right to be collected, in order to meet the expenses incurred by the sovereign, in setting up marks to point out narrows or rocks, or in maintaining lighthouses to guide the course of ships by night, or in ridding the sea of pirates. But it is not so easy to defend the right to collect tolls upon grounds other than these, since the passage of unarmed ships is clearly a matter of innocent profit. However, the statement does not seem so pointless that a person should not be blamed if he makes a legal use of his own jurisdiction, and seeks a profit from his waters, just as others do from their lands; that since the man who enters another's territory becomes, for the time being, his subject, the ships of foreigners, on passing through our sea, can be compelled to give our citizens the first opportunity to purchase their wares. That if this claim be forgone, some other slight demand can be made in its place. And that although a right of staple cannot be set up in that sea, because the merchants, to whom those ships are bound, cannot sail to the place, nor do our citizens have the opportunity of bringing those people's goods in our ships to the sea, yet we should not incur odium if we are admitted to some little share in the profit, by reason of our not hindering the convenient passage of others through our waters.

But it must be confessed that, since the collection of tolls by sea is for some reason the object of much greater odium than the collection of the same for land passage, the former must be handled with more moderation and without suspicion of avarice, and it is easy¹ for one ruler or another to advance reasons why he may claim exemption from such tolls. For instance, if his lands touch both ends of the sea, or if all his 245 commerce with other nations, and for that reason the prosperity of his state, depend on the use of that sea. In such a case it would be unfair for him to be reduced practically to the condition of a tributary, because of the innocent use of a sea route, nor could he well be blamed if he should attempt, by any means at his disposal, to rid himself of one who is using so odious an excuse to oppress him. Nor can it be urged against him that other nations have agreed to such tolls, since their prosperity is not so closely bound up with the use of that sea, and so it is easy for them not to begrudge the sovereign of the sea a small share in the profit gotten by its use. Just as there is a great difference between the case of a man who asks a way through my farm, because without it he would spend a life of solitude, deprived of intercourse with men, and would be unable to market the products of his field, and that of the man who wants only to lay a kind of servitude upon another's land, merely for his own convenience.

These matters can be illustrated, after a fashion, by the story which some tell, of how the king of the Abyssinians once claimed tribute from Egypt on the score of the Nile, which, rising in his territory, is the cause of Egypt's fertility. And how, when the Mohammedans later seized that country and oppressed the Christians, a ruler of the same country tried to divert the course of the Nile into the Red Sea, but without success. We agree with others in feeling that this claim was unfounded.

Nor have such men as feel that the subject before us should be settled by conventions looked fully into the matter. For the question would still remain, what reason there was for entering into such conventions, and whether the sovereign of the sea can refuse passage to others until they make such conventions with him. Yet when a convention which lacks any such flaw as would naturally detract from its strength has been entered into, its terms should be observed, so that the merchants would not be able to refuse to pay tolls to which they agreed, and the sovereign of the sea would not be able to increase them at his pleasure. Add Boecler, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 14. Nicephorus Gregoras, Bk. IV, tells the story of how the Sultan of Egypt agreed with the Emperor of Constantinople, that Egyptian merchants might pass through the Thracian Bosphorus. When this right was first allowed, it seemed of little importance. But when in the course of time its nature and effect were seen, the traffic could not be stopped, since it had been strengthened and established by custom.

But if any nation holds the territory bordering the other shore of a sea, and so the sea is either common to both, or else lies between the borders of the two, even if but one of the nations, by agreement or concession, demands tolls from other traders, the other will under no circumstances be liable to tolls, since it is sailing in its own sea.

8. Under things of innocent profit, which as such should be accorded every man, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 15, also includes the right of all vessels to touch on a shore and stop there a while, for recuperation, or to replenish the water supply, or any other just cause. So Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. I [543 ff.], says:

What race of human beings is this? or what home of men is so barbarous as to allow this treatment? We are denied the welcome of the beach. They levy war, and forbid us to set foot on the edge of their land. If you disregard the human race and the arms of men, yet expect the gods, who remember the right and the wrong. (B.)

But in this connexion let it be observed that he had already declared: 'We have not come either to devastate with the sword your Libyan homes, or to carry your goods as plunder to our ships.'

This illustration shows that, if a man seeks admittance to a land, he must make his journey without injury, and in such a way that no peril and reasonable fear will be created for the inhabitants of the coast. And so Dido makes the wise response: 'Hardship and the infancy of my kingdom compel me to take such strict precautions, and to protect my frontiers in their whole extent with armed guards.' (B.)

Now it is well to find out whether the person comes as foe or friend, what appearance the fleet has, and the force which wishes to come to land. No less important is it to know whether the strangers are free from contagious diseases. Add Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXVI, chap. i. When none of these considerations stands in the way, just as it would be the greatest inhumanity to forbid an innocent landing, so, once that has been granted, the next step is to permit the erection of a temporary shelter on the shore, by which, of course, no damage is done to the shore, and our right over it not at all lessened. For there is reason why a man may not build a permanent structure on the shore without the permission of the state authorities, especially if it be to the disadvantage of others. See Digest, XLI. i. 50. 246

And simply because certain nations have agreements upon the right to approach shores and harbours, it does not follow that such an office is not an obligation from the law of nature. For it very frequently happens that many things, which are owed by some virtue that gives only an imperfect obligation, are sanctioned by civil laws and conventions. Furthermore, our statement is concerned especially with the case of a person putting in at a foreign shore against his will, by reason of a force too great for him, while the conventions which nations enter into on this point are concerned with regular intercourse. Therefore, in such cases there is nothing to prevent the exaction of some slight tribute. But in the former case it would be most disgraceful to want to charge up the cost of so slight a relief of another's misfortune. Yet according to Polybius, Bk. III [xxii], a treaty between the Romans and the Carthaginians was couched in the following terms:

Neither the Romans nor their allies are to sail beyond the Fair Promontory, unless driven by stress of weather or the fear of enemies. If any one of them be driven ashore he shall not buy or take aught for himself save what is needful for the repair of his ship and the service of the gods, and he shall depart within five days. (S.)

A second treaty [Ibid., xxiv] runs as follows: 'In Sardinia and Libya no Roman shall traffic nor found a city; nor shall he put in there save to take provisions and refit his ship. If a storm drive him upon those coasts, he shall depart within five days.' (S.)

9. Among the duties of humanity there is included the further one of admitting strangers, as well as of kindly providing travellers with shelter and hospitality. This duty was carried by not a few of the ancients almost to the point of ambitious ostentation, inasmuch as they conceived that from hospitality there arose a very sacred right of relationship and of friendship. Aristotle, Magna Moralia, Bk. II, chap. xi: 'But the firmest of friendships would seem to be that with a foreigner; for they have no common aim about which to dispute, as is the case with fellow citizens.' (S.) Homer, Odyssey, Bk. XIX [VI. 207-8]: 'For all strangers and beggars are from Zeus.' (L.) Idem, Odyssey, Bk. VIII [546]: 'In a brother's place stands the stranger and suppliant.' (L.) In Lucian, De Dea Syria [xii], among the sins for which mankind was destroyed in Deucalion's flood, there are listed these: 'They did wicked deeds, for they kept not their oaths, nor harboured strangers, nor received fugitives.' (H.*) Add also Plato, Laws, Bk. XII, where he lists the duties owed strangers. On the humanity shown strangers by the inhabitants of India, see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. xlii. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. IV, chap. i, gives the following law of the Lucanians: 'If a stranger comes at sunset and asks to be given shelter for the night, the man who does not take him in shall be punished and pay a fine for inhospitality.'¹ Add Law of the Burgundians, tit. xxx, § 1. On the ancient Slavs, Helmold, Chronica Slavorum, Bk. I, chap. lxxxii: 'If any one be found to have refused lodging to a stranger—and this 247 happens very seldom indeed,—it is permissible to burn down his house and all that he has, and the desires of all men unite to such an end.' Philo Judaeus, On the Life of Moses [I. vii], remarks that 'strangers, in my opinion, should be looked upon as refugees'. (Y.)

But if the duty of hospitality is to be an obligation of natural law, it is required that the stranger shall have an honourable or necessary reason for being away from his home. Furthermore, he should be an upright man, and one from whom no danger or disgrace will come to our house. He should also be unable to pay for lodging. And so when there were no public taverns, or they were vile affairs, considered unfit for an honourable man, there was greater reason for this humanity than to-day over the larger part of Europe, where they are found so well appointed both for comfort and display.

Although you may see inhospitality censured in almost every writer, as one of the earmarks of the inhumanity of uncultivated peoples, yet there is some question² whether one is obligated by natural law to entertain such persons in particular as visit other countries out of pure curiosity. The Spartans, indeed, thought this a sufficient reason for keeping foreigners out of their state, wishing to prevent the corruption and debasing of their ancient customs by contact with such sightseers. Practically the same attitude toward foreigners prevails among the Chinese. See Neuhoﬀ, Generalis Descriptio Sinae, chap. i.

But the answer of some to this is, that not everything with us is better or worse than the practices of foreign peoples. That if they have found any better thing, it would be foolish to scorn it merely because it is foreign. That it is characteristic of dogs to fawn upon the meanest of the household slaves, and to snarl at strangers, although they be the most eminent of people. That some sort of uncouthness and rusticity attaches to such as never set foot off their native soil. Thus, in Livy, Bk. XLI, chap. xxiv, a decree of the Achaeans, forbidding Macedonians to visit their country, is called 'a cursed neglect of the ties of humanity'. (M.) Periander says, in Plutarch, Convivium [vi, p. 151 A]: 'I cannot but commend the civility of those magistrates who give audience first to strangers and afterwards to their own citizens.' (G.)

It seems certain, in this connexion, that if our citizens in their travels are to meet a friendly reception by any nation, we cannot properly deny it a like humanity; while, on the other hand, it is impudent of those who exclude our citizens to demand that we receive theirs. But if any nation has no interest in visiting foreign peoples, there seems to be no law requiring it to admit those who come to it unnecessarily and without good reason. Just as no one holds that a man who has some unusual object in his house or gardens is under any obligation to admit all who wish to see it; but those who have been admitted should, by the rule of custom, regard it as an unowed kindness. And this is especially true, inasmuch as a suspicion may easily arise, which leads us to conclude that over-curious inspectors of our affairs should be kept at a distance.

Therefore, Franciscus a Victoria, Relectiones de Indis, Pt. V, § 3, does not win many to his position, when he discusses the adequate grounds on which the Spaniards felt themselves entitled to subdue the Indians. The first ground he makes that of natural society and communication, on which he formulates the following propositions:

I. 'The Spaniards have a right to go to those provinces and live there, provided, of course, that they do the natives no harm, and the natives cannot prevent them.' The answer to this is, that this 'natural communication' cannot prevent a property-holder from having the final decision on the question, whether he wishes to share with others the use of his property. Furthermore, it is crude indeed to try to give others so indefinite a right to journey and live among us, with no thought of the numbers in which they come, their purpose in coming, as well as of the question whether, in passing through without harm and visiting a foreign land, they propose to stay but a short time, or to settle among us permanently, as if upon some right of theirs. Moreover, whoever wishes to lay upon others such a requirement for hospitality, 248 ought surely be rejected as too severe an arbiter.

II. 'The Spaniards have a right to trade with them, and neither people can be prevented by their rulers from doing so.' On this point, those who feel that they are more moderate¹ and reasonable in their philosophy, are not as yet able to discover such a freedom of trade as rulers cannot limit for their subjects, if the well-being of the state demands it; much less such a one as thrusts foreigners upon us without our permission and against our will.

III. 'If the Indians have any rights common to citizens and foreigners, the Indians may not prohibit the Spaniards from sharing and participating in them, for instance, if other foreigners are allowed to mine gold, so may the Spaniards.' On this matter some feel that the point should be raised, first, whether a thing was allowed others as something owed, or as a free gift. For in matters which I am not under a perfect obligation to render to men, I can be more liberal to one than to another. Secondly, whether the later comers will use the same moderation as the former, who have used something with no detriment to ourselves; and whether they have in their mind no other purpose than had the others. Suppose I had given some one of my neighbours the privilege of entering my garden as often as he wishes, and of sampling my fruit; when later another man bursts in and decides to break down the trees, to expel me, and to make an uninvited stay in my garden, I will surely have the right to close my gate to him. Observe the reply which some Americans [i.e. American Indians] once gave the Spaniards. Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. III, chap. vi, p. 189. But let others settle this controversy.

Most writers feel that the safest reply to make is this: Every state may reach a decision, according to its own usage, on the admission of foreigners who come to it for other reasons that are necessary and deserving of sympathy. Only no one can question the barbarity of showing an indiscriminate hostility to those who come on a peaceful mission. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii. The admission of ambassadors rests upon reasons of a special nature. Add Ziegler, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 23.

But to expel without probable cause guests and strangers, once admitted, surely savours of inhumanity and disdain. See Livy, Bk. II, chaps. xxxvii-xxxviii. And yet Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. vii, and with him Grotius, loc. cit., § 19, deny that famine in a state is a 'probable cause' for expelling them. This we admit, on condition that there be means, straitened though they be, of preserving them along with the citizens, and that they once were, or may in the future be, of advantage to us. For Ambrose mentions specifically only the latter. But if we are under no obligation to the foreigners, and they must not perish upon being expelled by us, there seems to be no reason why citizens, out of consideration for them, should feel the pangs of hunger. See Suetonius, Augustus, chap. xlii; Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit.

10. Among this class of duties Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, §§ 16-17, also places the granting of permanent settlement to strangers who have been driven from their former home, and seek entrance into another. But such persons must recognize the established government of that country, and so adapt themselves to it that they may be the source of no conspiracies and revolts. Euripides, Medea [222]:

The sojourner must learn the city's wont. (W.)

So in Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. XII [192 ff.], Aeneas sets down among the terms of peace the following: 'My sire Latinus shall war control, and as a father-in-law shall hold the sceptre as his rightful due.' (B.) It belongs, indeed, to humanity to receive a few strangers, who have not been driven from their homes for some crime, especially if they are industrious or wealthy, and will disturb neither our religious faith nor our institutions. Thus we can observe that many states about us have grown immensely because they received foreigners and aliens with open arms, while others, who have repelled them, have been reduced to 249 second-rate powers.

But no one would be so bold as to assert that a great multitude, armed, and with hostile intent, should be received as if there were an obligation to do so, especially since it is hardly possible that the native inhabitants run no danger from such a host. Therefore, every state may decide after its own custom what privilege should be granted in such a situation. The state should consider well beforehand, whether it is to its advantage for the number of its inhabitants to be greatly increased; whether its soil is fertile enough to support all of them well; whether we will not be too crowded if they are admitted; whether the band that seeks admittance is competent or incompetent; whether the arrivals can be so distributed and settled that no danger to the state will arise from them. But when these people are worthy of our sympathy, and no reasons of state stand in the way, it would certainly be an act of humanity on our part to confer a kindness on them, that will not be too onerous on us, or the cause of later regret. If they are not, our pity should be so restrained that we may not later become an object of pity to others. Furthermore, since whatever is conferred upon such people we can impute to them as a kindness, it follows that they cannot seize for themselves anything they may want or occupy, as if they had a perfect right to it, or any section of our land that may be unused, but they must be content with what we have assigned them. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit.

These principles can be illustrated by the following instances: In Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. XI [316 ff.], Latinus makes the following offer to the Trojans:

There belongs to me by ancient right a piece of land close to the Tuscan stream: the Aurunci and the Rutulians till it, and work with the plough the stubborn hills, and the rugged parts for grazing use. Let all this district, with its lofty ridge and pines, be given to Trojan friendship. (B.)

On this passage Servius, drawing from the Origines of Cato, observes that that field contained seven hundred jugera. But he remarks that if Latinus is not to appear to have been liberal with another's property, the word mibi from the line above must be taken with the phrase 'the Aurunci and Rutuli till it'; for the Aurunci and Rutuli held that territory as tributary, or else their labour for the king consisted in cultivating it.

The same account is given at greater length by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [1vi ff.], according to which the Trojans, after ascertaining from certain¹ omens that fate had appointed this land for their home, began at once to build a city without securing permission, and seized the natives' iron, wood, and tools, much to their indignation. Aroused by this, Latinus moved against the strangers with his army, first expostulating with Aeneas, because, while he might have gotten as a friend whatever he asked for within bounds, since the natives were willing, he had preferred to break the law of nations, and to seize them by force, in a manner more suited to a knave than to an honest man. Aeneas, recognizing that his action was illegal, asks him to pardon what was already done, promises he will make good the damage in many ways, and leads forth his army against their enemies. And so the natives gave the territory to the Trojans, while they were helped in turn by the Trojans in their war against the Rutuli.

In Florus, Bk. III, chap. iii, the Cimbri ask of the Roman senate that 'the people of Mars would allot them some land as a stipend, and use their hands and arms for whatever purpose they pleased'. (W.) Furthermore, who could give away the property of others without injury? While to receive so powerful a nation seemed unsafe to those who had so many possessions that might excite the cupidity of needy men.

In Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. IV [vii. 4], the Tencteri and Usipetes claimed that 'they had come against their will, being driven out of their homes: if the Romans would have their goodwill, they might find their friendship useful. Let the Romans either grant them lands, or suffer them to hold the lands their arms had acquired.' (E.) To them Caesar replied [IV. viii. 2]: 'It was not just that men who had not been able to defend their territories should seize those of others; on the other hand there was no land in Gaul which could be granted without injustice, especially to so numerous a host.' (E.) Although there was still another hidden reason why Caesar was unwilling to have those peoples as such near neighbours. 250

In Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XIII, chap. lv, when the Ansibarii,¹ in want of a home, settled some territory across the Rhine which had been set apart for the use of Romans, they maintained with some reason:

Why leave so much land unoccupied for the flocks and the herds of Roman soldiers to be some day or other driven into it? Reserve by all means, he added, retreats for cattle, while men are starving: only do not prefer wastes and solitudes to a friendly population. . . . The earth has been given to mankind, just as the heavens have been given to the gods: lands not occupied are free to all. (R.*)

This last law Thomas More, Utopia, Bk. II, represents the Utopians as observing. To such arguments a softer reply should have been made than that returned by Avitus, which certainly was full of intolerable haughtiness: 'The commands of superiors must be obeyed. The gods whom they invoked had appointed, that to the Romans should appertain the sovereign disposal, what to bestow and what to take away, and not to allow any other judges than themselves.' (O.)

According to Flavius Vopiscus, Probus [xviii], the emperor Probus settled one hundred thousand Bastarnians on Roman soil, and these all kept their faith. But when he transferred likewise large numbers from other nations, that is Gepidi, Grauthungi, and Vandals, these all broke their word, and when Probus was busy with the war against the tyrants, they marched or sailed over almost all the empire, and did no slight damage to the glory of Rome.

Likewise, in Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXXI [iv], the Goths, leaving their former places of habitation out of fear of the Huns, ask of Valens that they be given a home across the Danube in Thrace, promising that they will live in quiet and furnish him aid, if the situation requires it. Soon other barbarians as well joined with them in asking the same favour, to whom Valens also gave permission, in the hope that he could get soldiers from them without great expense. But this policy soon ended in his ruin, as the author recounts, loc. cit., in detail. Add Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. IV, chap. xxviii.

II. Under this type of duties Grotius, loc. cit., § 18-19, also includes the obligation of allowing another to secure for himself, by purchase, labour, exchange, or some other form of legal contract, the things which add embellishment and comfort to this life of ours; and of not hindering him either by legislation, or illegal conspiracy, or monopoly. For a great advantage arises for all peoples from commerce, which makes compensation for the niggardliness, as it were, of the soil, which is not equally productive of everything everywhere,¹ and causes the product of one place only to appear to have a habitat in every land. Libanius, Orations, iii: 'God has not bestowed His gifts upon every quarter, but has divided them according to regions, so as to incline men to social relations by the need of mutual assistance; and He has disclosed the avenues of trade, with the intent to bring to all mankind the common enjoyment of those things which are produced only among a few.' So it is highly inhuman to wish to deny a native of our world the use of those good things which the common Father of all men has poured forth, provided that by this act the right which we have secured over them for our own personal ends, is not diminished. And so, as Plutarch, Pericles [xxix. 4], recounts, when the Athenians excluded the Megarians from all their markets and harbours, the latter complained that this was contrary to the 'common laws of justice'.

Yet such an assertion allows many restrictions. For we do not seem to be bound by any law to share with others, things which are not absolutely essential to human life, or minister only to its pleasures. And if we ourselves are threatened with a lack of such things, we are within our rights in keeping them for our own use. And so, if Joseph had seen that the Egyptians would not have a surplus of grain for their seven years of famine, he would have had a perfect right to forbid its export to other nations. Quintilian, Declamations, xii [4]: 'While we were selling to neighbouring states, and profits kept pouring in upon us from every side, we recklessly compromised the safety of the state, and famine laid hold upon us.' Also a law of the Athenians punished with death any of their citizens who transported grain for sale to any

We have a right, furthermore, to prevent other peoples from trading in such articles as are not absolutely necessary for existence, if our country thereby would lose a considerable profit, or in some indirect way suffer any harm. To illustrate, if some nation breeds beautiful horses, there is nothing to prevent it from forbidding the export of such as could reproduce the stock. For that country would lose a special distinction and source of profit, if such horses could be bred in other lands; while such animals minister more to luxury than to necessity. In Livy, Bk. XLIII, chap. v, upon the request of ambassadors from Gaul, 'permission was given to each of them to purchase ten horses, and convey them out of Italy'. (M.) In the same way in Code, IV. xli, a man is forbidden on pain of death to export to barbarians wine, oil, and any kind of arms. The reason for forbidding the first two items was the fear that they would be led by their enjoyment of them to attack the Roman Empire. For, as a matter of fact, Livy, Bk. V, chap. xxxiii, writes that Aruns of Clusium, to draw the Gauls into Italy, 'took wine to them'. Add Numbers, xiii. 14; Judith, x. 20.

Finally, there is no prohibition against a state favouring its own citizens above foreigners in the matter of exporting merchandise; for example, by taking larger tolls from the latter than the former, or providing that they have the right of purchase before foreigners.

12. But that a man is obligated to purchase the goods of another is not to be found, according to Grotius, loc. cit., § 20, in any law. For every man is by nature free to take or refuse to take a thing, and no man has a probable reason for complaint if some one else does not mind doing without his merchandise. This is the reason why we find in many places, both ancient and modern, a law against the importation of a certain kind of merchandise, either because the state may suffer some loss from its importation, or that our own citizens may be incited to greater industry, and that our wealth may not pass into the hands of foreigners. Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 847 B C]:

As to frankincense and similar perfumes, used in the service of the gods, which come from foreign parts, and purple and other dyes which are not produced in the country, or materials of any art which have to be imported, and which are not necessary—no one should import them; nor, again, should any one export anything which is wanted in the country. (J.)

Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. II [xv. 4], relates of the Nervii: 'Traders had no means of access unto them, for they allowed no wine nor any of the other appurtenances of luxury to be imported, because they supposed that their spirit was like to be enfeebled and their courage relaxed thereby.' (E.) And of the Suebi, Ibid., Bk. IV [ii. 2 and 6]: 'They do not import for their use draught-animals [. . .]. They suffer no importation of wine whatever, believing that men are thereby rendered soft and womanish for the endurance of hardships.' (E.)*

For this reason the position of Franciscus a Victoria is certainly false, when he maintains: 'The law of nations allows every man to carry on trade in the provinces of others, by importing merchandise which they lack and exporting gold and silver, as well as other merchandise, in which they abound.' But if I am satisfied with my own products, on what grounds can any one force upon me, against my will, those of another people?

Now the opposite rule, for example, when the head of a house is forced to purchase each year a certain amount of salt, arises from the power over his subjects which belongs to the prince, and such forced purchase takes the place of a tax. In the same way a ruler can command that, if his citizens wish to purchase something, they shall do so from a certain person. Such rules may rightly be sanctioned by punishments, in states where it is to the advantage of the commonwealth. In the same way subjects are very frequently ordered to be beforehand in 252 purchasing grain and other necessary things, even in distant lands, when there is danger of scarcity, as in the expectancy of a siege, or in order that the price of grain may be reduced. But there is certainly no reason to be adduced by which I may undertake to force a man, over whom I have no authority, to purchase my merchandise. For on what right may I claim such authority over the purse of another man, not my subject, that I may prescribe to him how much he should spend, and for what things, as well as how he should look out for his wants and pleasures? Nor can the fact that I am thereby losing some possible profit, be a reason for reducing the liberty of the other man. Or, if I was so intent on his contributing to my advantage, I should merit it by the bestowal of mutual kindnesses. But it would be inhuman and unjust to hinder a man, who wants to distribute among eager customers goods in which he abounds, from securing by exchange for his own use the necessities of which he stands in need. Add Boecler on Grotius.

13. Another duty like this is to permit foreigners, and especially neighbouring nations, to solicit and enter upon marriages among us, when there are not enough women among them. For example, in case a number of men have been expelled from one country and have settled in another, or a band of men undertake to found a new state. For it is not in the nature of most men to live without women, since, when the body's powers are unimpaired, celibacy is agreeable only to lofty souls, and to seek unnatural satisfaction for this desire is base.

Moreover, a nation of men alone is a thing of but one generation. On this ground many undertake to defend, or at least excuse, the rape of the Sabines, directed by Romulus, although the story is given under more than one form. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [xxx], says that Romulus wanted to secure the friendship of the neighbouring tribes by marriage, and, although he began with an injury, he nevertheless believed that from an act of this kind and an evil beginning, a close relationship could result after solicitude and love had atoned for the deed with the women themselves, and their relatives had been shown that it was done not to offend, but to meet the demand of necessity. Yet surely this is an absurd way to gain friendship. See the case of Segestes in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. I, chap. lv:

<His quarrel with Arminius remained,> fed by private reasons of his own: for Arminius had carried off his daughter, though already betrothed to another man. Hence Segestes hated his son-in-law; the two fathers-in-law were at open variance; and thus the ties that are wont to draw friendship closer between friends, did but add fresh fuel to their animosity. (R.)

Others have written, that the women were stolen in order to secure an opportunity to go to war with his neighbours—an unlikely conjecture. Still others suppose that there was a lack of women, and so Romulus was under necessity; that nevertheless he first sent around representatives to ask that they take no offence at mingling their blood and lineage with men like themselves, and that after they had been rejected with words of scorn, he had recourse to force and deceit. Furthermore, that at this time the custom of seizing virgins was generally followed, which Dionysius, loc. cit., for that reason calls 'an ancient Greek custom, and a method of contracting marriages of all others the most illustrious'. (S.) Add Judges, xxi. 22. And yet it rarely happens that women are not to be found who are perfectly willing to marry any men except such as should have to be blushed for and disowned.

Now to repulse such as seek our friendship by this means would surely be harsh dealing. For although to deny a woman as a wife is not in itself a cause of war, war often follows if to the refusal has been added insult. Thus the people of Rhegium replied to Dionysius, when he asked the hand of a maiden, that 'they would give him none but the daughter of the hangman'. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. cviii [XIV. cvii]; Strabo, Bk. VI [p. 258]. A similar instance is to be found in Paul of Venice, Bk. I, chap. lii. But it seems inhuman to wish to put our women at the service of the state, so that they may marry such as have nothing in themselves which may arouse affection; and especially so if to this there is added some difference of degree. Compare Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 21. The argument in Livy, Bk. IV, chap. iii, of Canuleius, 'We ask the right of intermarriage, which is customarily granted to neighbours and foreigners [. . .] and that we should be accounted men' (F.),¹ does not concern the question before us. For the plebeians were not suffering from any lack of women, but wanted to have the same right as the patricians. 253

But when there are plenty of women it is idle to seek marriages by force and war. 'You will find another Alexis, if this one scorns you' [Vergil, Eclogues, II. 73]. Also, civil laws which forbid marriages with foreigners, or between persons of different station, presuppose that every one can find a number of mates in his own station, and in general have as their basis, either that the splendour of certain families may be preserved, or that our own women may more easily find husbands, or that our wealth, or the accomplishments of our citizens, may not pass by marriage to other nations.

14. Finally Grotius, loc. cit., § 22, adds that a right common to all men, and so an obligation to perform some duty to all men, arises from the supposition that something has been actually allowed to all strangers in general; for in this case, if one man is excluded, a wrong is done him. The reason for this seems to be, that it is an insult for a man without a special reason to wish to exclude another from a thing which is open to all in general, since such a person is thereby no longer regarded as the equal of the rest. And so he concludes that, if, in some place, foreigners are allowed to hunt, fish, go fowling, gather pearls, inherit property, carry on trade, and negotiate marriages even when there is no lack of women, such rights cannot be denied any single people, unless they have committed some offence.

But such a claim does not appear entirely clear. For such a concession must be made either expressly or tacitly. A thing is conceded another either precariously, or else by way of an agreement or perfect promise. Now I do not believe that there ever has been or will be a case when a person has conceded a perfect right to every and all peoples, known as well as unknown, with no limitation and abridgement, a right not owed by natural law over something that belongs to himself. For one surely wants to know how much one is giving and to whom. But if a man has made some concession only to his acquaintances and friends, by means of agreement or precariously, a stranger who undertook to claim the same thing as his right would be branded as wicked and bold; while whatever things we grant only tacitly and by disregarding them, are by every rule considered to be under the nature of a precarious right, and can with all justice be recalled, when we change our minds, or the favoured persons improperly use them. Add Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit.

15. But a humanity, the lack of which shows a wicked malignity and baseness of mind, is surely of a very crude type. It is found in a much more lofty and splendid degree when a man of his own good will and bent, from his own generosity, or from pity for another man's condition, does something for him without return, at considerable cost or labour to himself, whereby the other is aided in his difficulties, or else some considerable advantage is rendered him. And such things are put in a class by themselves and called benefits, the degree and extent of which are governed only by the states of the giver and the recipient. Such acts afford men an opportunity to secure the greatest praise, if they have been properly meted out by a generous and prudent mind. For, as Pliny, Panegyric [xxxviii. 4], says: 'For an act is to be regarded as ambitious and boastful [. . .] and anything but liberal, if a good reason cannot be offered for it.'

Now on the bestowal and proper control of benefits, wise men on every hand give instructions. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xiv]:

Beneficence, which is the most agreeable to the nature of man, involves many precautionary considerations. For, in the first place, we are to take care lest our kindness 254 should hurt both those whom it is meant to assist, and others. In the next place, it ought not to exceed our abilities; and it ought to be rendered to each in proportion to his worth.

And, indeed, our first concern should be with those who merit some help at our hands, and our second for him who especially needs our help. The degree of relationship between men should also be observed, whereof the common tie of human society is the widest of all; wherefore [xvii]

more confined than this is that which consists of men of the same race, nation, and language. A still more contracted degree of society is that of relatives. The first principle of society consists in the marriage tie, the next in children; then follows the connexion of brotherhood, then that of cousins, in their different degrees, then marriages and alliances. But among all the degrees of society, none is more excellent, none more stable, than when worthy men, through a similarity of manners, are intimately connected together. (Idem, On Ends, Bk. V [xxiii]: In all honourableness there is nothing so eminent, nor so extensive in its operation, as the union of man with man, and a certain partnership in and communication of advantages, and the affection itself of the human race; which, originating in that first feeling, according to which the offspring is loved by the parent, and the whole house united by the bonds of wedlock and descent, creeps gradually out of doors, first of all to one's relations, then to one's connexions, then to one's friends and neighbours, then to one's fellow-countrymen, and to the public friends and allies of one's country; then it embraces the whole human race. (Y.)) [xviii]: But we are carefully to consider what is most necessary to each, and what every one could or could not attain even without us. Thus the relative claims of relationship and of circumstances will not always be identical. Some duties are owing to some more than to others. For instance, you are sooner to help your neighbour to house his corn, than your brother or your friend; but if a cause be on trial, you are to take part with your kinsman, or your friend, rather than with your neighbour. (E.)

It would be a long task to make excerpts from the chapters of Seneca, On Benefits. Notice should be taken of what Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. VIII, chap. vii, tells about the Pythagoreans urging their members 'not to take off any man's burden from him, but to lay on more'. The reason added is, 'as not countenancing sloth and laziness in any'. (G.) Although a better reason is that given in 2 Corinthians, viii. 13: '⟨For I say not this⟩ that others may be eased and yet distressed; but by equality.' Add Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxx, and from him Gratian, Decretum, I. lxxxvi. 14 ff. and II. i. 2. 6—7. Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. I [iii. 3]: 'In dealing with friends and strangers alike, and in reference to the demands of life in general, there is no better motto for a man than that: "let a man do according to his ability".' (D.)

Also the manner of bestowal adds much to the favour of a benefaction; if we confer it with a happy countenance, promptly, and with some accompanying sign of our good will.¹

16. The counterpart of beneficence is a grateful mind, by which he who is the recipient of the benefit, shows that he received it, is kindly disposed to the giver because of it, and seeks an opportunity to return its equivalent, so far as he can. For it is by no means necessary that a thing of the same amount and value be returned as was given, but often one's zeal and endeavour meet an obligation. Ovid, From the Pontus, Bk. III, el. viii [IV. viii 37]: 'But he who gives his utmost is lavishly grateful,¹ and that loyal service has reached its goal.' (W.) It is understood, however, that nothing need be returned to the man who falsely claims that he has conferred a benefaction. See Phaedrus, Bk. I, fab. xxiii. For I owe nothing to a man for pulling me out of a stream, if it was he that threw me into it in the first place.² Although wise men warn us that we should not be over careful in investigating what reasons impelled a person to do us some kindness, because such an inquiry may sometimes furnish the ungrateful with an excuse.

But the more likely benefactions are to win the minds of men, the more forceably the law of nature requires us to show gratitude. Surely we should not suffer a man who, trusting in our good faith, has anticipated us in some kindness, to be in a worse state on that account, nor should we accept a kindness, unless we purpose that the giver shall not 255 have reason to repent of his gift. For if we are, because of some reason, unwilling to be under a special obligation to some one, it was open to us to refuse the proffered kindness, although this cannot be done without arousing a suspicion of contempt, since the refusal of a kindness regularly carries with it a contempt for the thing voluntarily offered. And surely, if we were relieved of the necessity of returning a kindness, a man would be acting without reason if he strewed his favours about at random, and was the first to do a kindness which he foresaw would go for naught. On this score all beneficence and confidence between men would be destroyed, and with them would cease all benevolence and any voluntary assistance, nor would one undertake to gain the favour of others. Compare Hobbes, De Cive, chap. iii, § 8. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. ii:

As a general rule, it is a duty to repay services which have been done to us, rather than to confer favours on our comrades. We must behave as if we had incurred a debt, and must pay our creditors in preference to making a present to our comrades. The general rule then is that the repayment of our debt is a duty, but that if the honour, or urgent need, of making a present outweighs it, we must decide in favour of making the present rather than of repaying the debt. (W.)

Add what Socrates maintains about brotherly love, in Xenophon, Memorabilia, Bk. II [iii]. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [xv]:

No duty is more indispensable than that of returning a kindness. Now if, as Hesiod enjoins, we ought, if it is in our power, to repay what we have received for mere use with interest, how ought we to act when called upon by kindness? Are we not to imitate those fertile fields which yield far more than they have received? For, if we readily oblige those who we are in hopes will serve us, how ought we to behave toward those who have served us already? For as generosity is of two kinds, the one conferring a favour, the other repaying it, whether we confer it or not is at our own option, but the not repaying it is not allowable in a good man, provided he can do it without injury to any. (E.)

It should be observed that Cicero relates gratitude to liberality, because it is not bound by such strict laws as justice, which enjoins the exact restitution of what is owed by agreement. Add Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxxi; Gellius, Bk. I, chap. iv. But although there is not lacking some obligation to do a kindness, yet a far greater freedom attaches to the doing of a kindness than to the need of showing gratitude, since a man should strive in every way to approve himself to his benefactor. And yet it often happens that those who confer a kindness have a greater love for those whom they favour, than is returned to them. The causes for this are elaborated in Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. IX, chap. vii. Add also Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xi, where he shows the reason why the acceptance of great benefactions from superiors begets love, but not so if they come from equals or inferiors, unless there is some hope of returning them. On this principle is based the statement of Tacitus, Annals [IV. xviii], towards the end: 'For benefits are only so far acceptable as they seem capable of being requited; but when they have much exceeded the power of remuneration, they are recompensed with hatred instead of gratitude.' (O.)

17. Now although an ungrateful mind does not of itself constitute an injury, since no right, in the proper sense of the term, is violated, yet the epithet 'ungrateful' is held more shameful and more worthy of censure and loathing than 'unjust', since it is regarded as the mark of an abject and degenerate mind for a person to declare himself unworthy of the opinion which another has of his probity, and to be unable to be moved even by kindness to show a feeling of humanity. Gregory Nazianzen [De Vita Sua, ii, p. 16, ed. Colon. 1609]:¹ 'If kindness does not make a man gentle, what other thing, of all that there be, could ever make him such?' Lucian, in Anthology [IX. 120]: 'A bad man is like a jar with a hole in it. Pour every kindness into him and you have shed it in vain.' (P.) Add the opinion of Pheraula on the nature of man; Xenophon, On the Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII [iii. 19].

Descartes has an excellent passage on this subject, Les Passions, 256 art. 194:

Ingratitude is the vice of brutal and stupidly arrogant men, who think that everything is no more than their due; or else of the stupid, who never reflect upon the benefits which they receive; or else of the feeble and abject, who because they are aware of their infirmity and their need, basely seek the assistance of others, and after they have received it, hate them, because, not having the desire to make a like return, or despairing of being able to do so, and imagining that every one is similarly venal and mercenary, they think that nothing is done except in the hope of reward, and so that they have deceived their benefactors.

Sophocles, Ajax [520 ff.]:

Gratitude is due
From man for favours [. .]

¹ [This reference, given by Barbeyrac (except for the correction 1609 for 1690), we have been unable to verify.—Tr.]

Kindness return of kindness e'er begets.
 Who lets the memory of service pass,
 Him will I ne'er with noble spirits rank. (S.)

Learned men argue whether ingratitude is actionable in a court of law. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chaps. vi ff., denies this on the following main grounds: That the best feature of a kindness is lost if it is brought into court, as if it were a sum of money, or something owed by contract or lease, for it thereupon begins to be a loan; that while it is held to be becoming to feel gratitude, it ceases to be becoming, upon its being necessary; and finally, that all the courts in the world would scarcely suffice to meet the needs of such a law. Themistius, Orations, iii [xxii, p. 268 D]: 'The Persian law' (referred to in Xenophon, On the Training of Cyrus, Bk. I [ii. 7]) 'inflicts penalties for ingratitude, because that is extremely provocative of hatred whenever it appears. But where no law punishes ingratitude, there men hate one another and do not go to court about it, but keep their enmity concealed.' Add M. Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 42, towards the end; Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. vi, §§ 6-7: Bk. V, chap. iii, § 5.

The points advanced by these authors have been answered by others in great detail. See a dissertation by Boecler, entitled Actio Ingrati. It seems to us that in this connexion we should note merely that an action, or the equivalent of an action, does not at once take place in a court, as it were, of the law of nature, simply because some deed is contrary to natural law. Punishments, indeed, await the ungrateful after death, to be meted out at the decision of the divine tribunal. And it is right for such men to be hated and scorned by the rest of mankind, and held unworthy of any further kindness. But the reason is perfectly obvious why mere ingratitude, such as forgetting kindnesses received, or neglecting to show gratitude when an opportunity is offered, should not be enough to bring war upon a person or an action in a civil court. For it was this very reason that moved me to do another some favour, that is, I did not require the return of what I did for him, in order that he might have an opportunity to show that he was grateful from a love of uprightness, not from a fear of coercion, and in order that I myself might seem to have favoured him, not from the hope of gain, but from a desire to show humanity, in that I was unwilling to provide that I secure an equal return. A braver philosophy is that of Marcus Antoninus [Aurelius], Bk. IX, § 42:

But when thou findest fault with a man for ingratitude, turn thy thoughts to thyself. For evidently the fault is thine own that thou didst not bestow a kindness absolutely, and as from the very doing of it having at once received the full complete fruit. For when thou hast done a kindness what more wouldst thou have? Is not this enough that thou hast done something in accordance with thy nature? Seekest thou a recompense for it? (H.)

fails to be grateful, but even requites with injuries and evil deeds, then there is a cause for war and an action based on a real injury; and an ungrateful mind, added to this, showing the man's base blemish, gives reason for all the more haste in the prosecution of the injury, and all the more severe punishment of a person whose depravity cannot be lessened even by kindness. But how far the necessity of returning a benefaction is lessened by a subsequent injury, is explained by Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VI, chaps. iv-v; and Letters, lxxxi.

THE duties thus far set forth derive their force from that common relationship which nature established among all men even before any act was exchanged between them. But it is not enough to confine within such a circuit the duties which men owe each other. For not all men are so constituted that they are willing to do everything, with which they can help others, out of mere humanity and love, and without assuring themselves of some hope of receiving their equivalent; while it is often the case that the things which can come to us from others are of such a nature that we cannot have the boldness to ask that they be done for us gratis. It is often also not fitting for our person or lot that we be indebted to another for such a kindness, and so in many instances another person is unable to do us a kindness, and we are often unwilling to receive one, unless the other person receives its equivalent from us. Moreover, it often happens that other men do not know how they may serve our interests. Finally, in view of the finite power of man being unable to extend itself to all persons at the same time and with the same force, it is surely reasonable that such actions as are not yet covenanted for by former obligations are bound over to those who, by agreements, have secured for themselves a prior right to them. And so, if mutual offices, the real fruit of humanity, are to be practised more frequently between men, and by a kind of set rule, it was necessary for men themselves to agree among themselves on the mutual rendering of such services as a man could not also be certain of for himself on the mere law of humanity. Therefore, it had to be determined beforehand what one should do for another, and what he should in his turn expect from another, and demand on his own right. This is, indeed, accomplished by promises and agreements.¹

From what has been said, it is understood how works of humanity or of love differ from those which are required from a right properly understood, and are, therefore, directed by actual justice. The former are not owed by reason of agreements, express or implicit, but are laid upon all men by nature herself on the mere grounds of obligation. But whatever things I owed a man from agreement or covenants, I owe because he has secured a new right against me by my own consent. Furthermore, whatever I have done with another man in agreements, I have done not so much for his advantage as for my own, while in the duties of humanity the very opposite is the case. For although the exercise of such duties is in general necessary, that men may be able to live more advantageously with each other, and so their exercise turns to the advantage of him who observes them, in that he can expect their equivalent from others, yet in particular instances a man does a work of humanity not for himself but for the sake of him who receives the kindness. For so soon as a kindness is done for private advantage, it loses forthwith its designation and essence.

And so the law of humanity or charity, and the agreements of men among themselves, mutually supplement each other by way of their duties and guarantees, in that what is not or cannot be secured by charity, is secured by agreements, while in cases where agreements are not possible, charity offers its services. And although the nature and kind of agreements entered into by individual men depend on each man's judgement, yet the law of nature commands, in a general way and indefinitely, that men enter into agreements of some kind or other, since without them social relations and peace between men cannot be preserved. Isocrates, Against Callimachus [27 f.]: Treaties and pacts have such effect, that most of the affairs of life among both Greeks and barbarians are transacted through pacts and conventions. Putting our trust in these we come together and secure whatever we want. By means of these we form contracts with one another, and lay aside private enmities as well as general wars. This one thing, as being a universal good, all of us human beings constantly employ.

2. Now whenever men enter into any agreements, the social nature of man requires that they must be faithfully observed. For if an agreement lacks this guarantee, much the largest part of the advantage which accrues to mankind from the mutual interchange of duties would be lost. Aristotle, Rhetoric, Bk. I, chap. xv [22]: 'If contracts are invalidated, the intercourse of men is abolished.' (J.) Cicero, On Duties, Bk. II [xi]: 'The influence of justice is so great, that without some grains of it, even they who live by malpractices and villainy could not subsist.' (E.) This point he makes plain by the illustration of thieves and pirates. Furthermore, if it were not necessary to keep promises, it would be in no way possible with any confidence to base one's calculations on the assistance of other men. Nay more, from broken faith can arise the most just reasons for recriminations and war. For when I have done something on my side of an agreement, my contribution or labour has been irretrievably lost, if the other person breaks faith. And even if I have as yet done nothing, yet it is a hardship to have my plans and intentions upset, since I could have arranged my affairs otherwise, had the other man not thrust himself upon me. And it is not right that I should be scoffed at, because I believed another person to be an honourable and upright man. It is, therefore, a most sacred precept of natural law, and one that governs the grace, manner, and reasonableness of all human life, That every man keep his given word, that is, carry out his promises and agreements. Add what Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. II [lxxv], says about Numa adding Faith to the number of the gods. Euripides, The Children of Hercules, [890-1]: 'The lips that lie not best beseech the noble.' (W.)

3. Now since agreements, especially express agreements, lay upon us an obligation which nature did not otherwise enjoin, at least not so definitely, it seems convenient to consider at this point the most important kinds of obligations. An obligation is either congenital or adventitious, or, as they are called in Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. III, chap. ii, 'relations natural and acquired'. The former kind are such as attach to all men by reason of the fact that they are living beings endowed with reason, that is, such agreements as attend their rational nature as such. Yet in view of the fact that all men, born by the union of others of their kind, come into the world as infants, unable as yet to make a full use of their reason, this obligation lies dormant for a time and is ineffective, only exerting its full force and making men able to contract guilt when they come to the age at which they begin to appreciate its power. From that time on it produces its effects, however much a man through slothfulness has failed properly to measure its force. Therefore, ignorance of natural law excuses no person who is of age, even if he maintains that it had never occurred to him to consider whether a certain matter came under natural law.

Adventitious obligations are such as are laid upon men by reason of some antecedent human deed, with their expressed or presumed consent.

- 259 4. The most important of congenital obligations is that which concerns the duty of all men toward God, the final arbiter of this universe; by it we are obligated to venerate Him and to acknowledge His dominion and laws. Whoever wholly denies this obligation brings upon his own head the stigma of atheism. And this takes place whenever any one denies either that God himself exists, or else that He takes an interest in human affairs. For these two statements as regards moral effect are equal, and by each of them all religion is destroyed and reduced to a bit of mummery, wherewith to curb the unlicensed mob. Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxvi: 'There is nothing which is more of a help to a good life than to believe that He will be our judge, whom hidden things do not escape, and unseemly things offend, and good deeds delight.' (R.) Add Lactantius, On the Anger of God, chap. viii. And so quite properly is the opinion of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. xiv, § 19; chap. xv, § 2, to be rejected, where he classes atheism among the sins of imprudence or ignorance, as if it were not really a sin, but merely an error, and a bit of folly which cannot rightfully be punished. The argument he uses runs like this: 'The atheist has never submitted his will to God's will, not conceiving Him so much as to have any being [...]. Now no man hath supreme power which is not bestowed on him by our own consent. Therefore, since the atheist has never been under the kingdom of God, he is not obligated by the laws of God's kingdom.'¹

But the statement that all government is based upon the consent of those who are governed is utterly false. For that is true only of human government, where our faculty to resist another, who is by nature our equal, is not taken away, except by our consent and agreement. But who would say that God has no right to command a creature of His, unless that creature had of his own will consented to His sovereignty? And even Hobbes, chap. xv, § 5, derives the right of God to rule and punish in the natural kingdom, from His irresistible power. Yet no one would believe that atheists can resist the power of God. And so atheists are in no proper sense of the term enemies of God (according to Hobbes' definition of enemies as those who are subject neither to a common sovereign nor one to another), but they are His rebellious subjects, and so have involved themselves in the crime of treason against the divine majesty, even as Hobbes himself so ably shows, chap. xv, § 19. Thus, according to the same author, the crime of treason against human majesty arises when some one openly declares by word or deed that he will no longer obey that man or body to which is committed the supreme authority of the state; or, in other words, when some man has broken once and for all the tie of civil obedience. And so it is not so difficult a matter to determine the kind of sin to which atheism should be referred.

But it is also false that atheists can be punished on no other ground than by the right of war, after the manner in which, according to the poets, the gods girded themselves for battle against the giants, who were θεομάχοι [striving against God]. We shall show, in another connexion, that the injuries done to enemies in war are not penalties, in the proper sense. Nor can a ruler who brings refractory subjects to submission by war be said for that reason to have used the right of war, for the right of sovereignty implies that those who refuse to obey commands can be made to do so by the use of force. Even less can one who breaks the lawful bond of sovereignty become a just enemy, who may therefore claim a right to resist.²

Nor can Hobbes find any support in the fact that, in the Fourteenth Psalm [1], atheists who 'say in their heart, there is no God', are called 'fools'. As if, indeed, the words of Sacred Scripture only designate those as fools who live in error, but not those who are guilty of wilful sin. As if it were not the height of folly for one, out of one's own depravity, to seek the most severe punishment in return for a passing pleasure, or none at all. Furthermore, it is not so difficult to find out the nature of God by natural reason, as it is to discover the proportion between a sphere and a cylinder, the example Hobbes uses. Of course not every common man could work out or grasp the scientific and philosophical 260 argument for the existence of God, but that fact will not form a sufficient reason for any man to feel himself safe in questioning or denying the existence of God. For inasmuch as this faith has been practically a perpetual possession of mankind, whoever would attack it must not simply destroy entirely all the arguments used to prove the existence of God, but must advance reasons even more plausible for his own assertion. And since it is held that the preservation of mankind has thus far been due to that belief, the same person must furthermore demonstrate that the interests of mankind are better advanced by atheism than by continuing the worship of God. But since this is clearly impossible, atheists must be held to offend not only against God, but against all mankind as well. And so they should receive all the less consideration, because they undertake to oppose, in fact, the accepted faith of all peoples and ages, in claiming for themselves, as above others, some special sharpness of wit. It follows that whoever have fallen into atheism are, indeed, involved in an error, detestable in itself, but also such a one as they have conceived, not so much through any lack of foresight or ingenuousness, as from a vain arrogation of wisdom. Compare Jean d'Espagne, De Erroribus Popularibus, Sect. I, chap. vi; Bacon, Essays, chap. xvi; The Advancement of Learning, Bk. III, chap. ii. Add also Plato, Laws, Bk. IX, towards the end, where he distinguishes between the kinds of atheists and discusses what punishments should be used in keeping them in check.

It is not so difficult to meet the arguments with which the writer of the work entitled Theologico-Political Treatise [Spinoza], chap. xvi, attempts to support the view of Hobbes, premissing his argument with the thesis that 'every one who does not possess the use of reason lives, by the supreme right of nature, in a natural state, according to the laws of his appetite'. To the objection that such a statement denies a revelation of divine law, he replies: 'The natural state is prior both in nature and in time to religion.' Such a statement about natural religion is the falsest possible, as is also the following: 'No man knows by nature that he owes any obedience to God; nay, such obedience cannot be inferred by any process of reason, but is confirmed only by signs upon revelation.'

This can under no circumstances be admitted of natural religion. Therefore, the conclusion of the same writer is false when he says: 'Before revelation no one is bound by a divine law of which he cannot avoid being ignorant,' if he means divine natural, not positive, law; and 'A natural state must be conceived as one without religion and law, and therefore without sin and injury'. He proceeds to say that in a natural state a man is free from religion, not only 'by reason of his ignorance, but because of the liberty with which all men are born. For if men were by nature bound by divine law, that is, if the divine law were the law of nature, there would have been no reason for God to make a covenant with men, and obligate them by an agreement and oath.'

But these arguments between God and men come from revealed religion, and not from natural religion, to which man is obligated because of the fact that he was created by God a rational creature. And so the conclusion of Spinoza is wrong¹: 'Divine law came into effect at the moment when men by an express agreement promised God obedience in all matters, by which promise they left, as it were, their natural liberty and ceded their right to God, as is done in a civil state.' But to maintain this position one must imagine that men in a natural state do not owe their existence to God.

From this obligation, whereby all men are bound to render obedience to God, there arises the further obligation of all men toward their fellow men as such, by which they are obligated to live a mutually social life. How this is to be known has been shown in another place.

5. Another common division of obligations is into natural and civil, interpreted, however, by different writers in different ways. According to Grotius,² Bk. II, chap. xxiv, § 6, the term natural obligation is sometimes applied to something which nature recommends as worthy to be done, but is not strictly an obligation. He gives, as illustration of this, for an executor to pay all the estate without reserving what is his by the Lex Falcidia; for one to return a kindness; for a person to pay a debt which he no longer owed by reason of a court decision against the creditor, or to which he could oppose his right under the Decree of the Senate relating to Macedo. See Suetonius, Vespasian, chap. xi. Nicolaus of Damascus, De Moribus Gentium [frag. 103b Jacoby], gives a law very similar to this decree: 'If any one is convicted of having lent money to a spendthrift, he loses his loan.' When such things have been paid voluntarily, no formal claim can be entered for their restitution.

Sometimes an obligation which actually binds us is called a natural obligation, whether another receives from it a perfect, or only an imperfect right. In the same way a civil obligation sometimes denotes one which is not based on purely natural law, but arises from civil law, a common example of which is an obligation made in writing; sometimes it denotes one which is based on natural as well¹ as civil law, and which also warrants action in a civil court.

Others make a threefold and more simple division of obligation into strictly natural, strictly civil, and mixed. The first is based upon natural equity, with the restriction that it allows no action in a civil court. The second is based entirely upon the strict letter of civil law, by which every citizen is so restricted that an action is always highly proper against him, although such an action may be dismissed by the judge, whose power constitutes a perpetual exception. The last is that which is sustained by natural equity, with the further confirmation of the authority of the civil law. On these divisions see in general the writers on Roman law.

6. We may well discuss the division of obligations into natural and civil, not so much on the ground that such a division explains the origin of obligations,² as that it suggests³ the basis of their force in common life. And so a natural obligation is that which binds only by the force of natural law; a civil obligation that which is reinforced by civil laws and authority. The efficacy of each is considered, either in him in whom it resides as the subject of the obligation, or in the other person, who is its object. From the point of view of the subject, the efficacy of a natural obligation consists principally in the fact that it binds the conscience of a man, or that a man realizes, when he has not fulfilled it, that he is disobeying the will of God, whose law all men recognize that they should obey, just as they are indebted to Him for their very existence. And although penal sanctions are not to be found so expressly defined in natural law, there is no reason to feel that it lacks every kind of sanction, and that the man who breaks its obligation should expect no greater punishment from the hands of its author than he who fulfils the same. Among other arguments for this fact are those bitings of conscience with which the wicked are seized, even when they have hope of deceiving men and escaping human punishment; and that such a fear springs from no higher principle, from no realization of the divine sovereignty, but can be traced to mere simplicity, habit, or the fear of human punishment, no pious man is convinced. Cicero, For Roscius the Comic Actor [xxiv]: 'It is his own dishonesty and the terrors of his own conscience that especially harass each individual: his own wickedness drives each criminal about and affects him with madness; his own evil thoughts,⁴ his own evil conscience terrifies him. These are to the wicked their incessant and domestic furies.' (Y.) Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. I, chap. iv, p. 47 ff. Nor can I believe that any man has ever found for himself in the impiety of atheism a final relief from such terrors, but that his fear of God has at times got the upper hand,¹ and shaken his impious mind in the end with even greater tumults. And, indeed, those niggardly and infrequent worshippers of the gods, who stray, versed in a wisdom that is folly, are in almost every case with serious misgiving forced at length to turn their sails backward [Horace, Odes, I. xxxiv. 1 ff. slightly paraphrased].

Now although the binding of a man's conscience is the most characteristic feature of a natural obligation, the same efficacy is found as well in a civil obligation, provided the latter is concerned with an object not repugnant to the former. And so civil laws also, which are not repugnant to natural law, have an influence on the conscience. Furthermore, both obligations agree in this respect, that a man should do, of his own accord and by an intrinsic motive, the things which they demand of him. This forms the main difference between obligation and compulsion, since in the latter the mind is forced to something by mere external violence contrary to its intrinsic inclination, while whatever we do from an obligation is understood to come from an intrinsic impulse of the mind, and with the full approbation of its own judgement. 262

But when these obligations are viewed from the effect which they produce on the person who is owed something by reason of them, they have this feature in common, namely, that whatever is furnished as a debt on this account may be rightfully received and kept. But when a man neglects or refuses to meet an obligation, there arises a distinction, in the manner of requiring its fulfilment, between natural and civil obligations, according as one lives in natural liberty, or in a civil state.

Among those who live in natural liberty there obtains, from the precepts of natural law, an inequality of obligation. For such² things as natural law commands one man to show another, before any agreement has passed between them, such as the duties of charity and humanity, can be required only by peaceful means, as by persuasion, admonition, request, or entreaty. But it will not be allowable to use force against a person who persists in his refusal, unless it happen that extreme necessity impels us. The reason for this seems to lie in the fact that, without such duties, the intercourse of men cannot be sufficiently peaceful, and so nature is understood to have put them to one side, as a means by which men may bind others to themselves by a special exhibition of good will³; since things which may be extorted by force have no such power to win the hearts of others, as those which may be denied without fear. But if what is owed by an agreement is not forthcoming, force may be used to extort it. In the same way we may defend any of our possessions by force, when another man inflicts injury upon them.

Now civil obligations, or such as secure authority from civil law, open the way for action in a civil court, by the authority of which I can drag the defaulter before magistrates, who may by virtue of their jurisdiction compel him to meet¹ his obligation. But natural obligations, because they lack the sanction of civil law, depend for their power in states only upon the honour² of the debtor and his reverence for God, and citizens may not use force to secure their fulfilment.

² [For benevolentia read benevolentia.—Tr.]

Legislators determine the kind of obligations to which the civil law should extend its power, bearing in mind the usefulness of such in securing the internal peace of the state. And just as they would see that the judges shall not be troubled by mere trifles, so they would scarcely heed those who would like to imitate the Chinese, of whom Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 34], writes: 'Among them there are actions only for murder and insolence. For it is not in a man's power to avoid these, whereas any person may take due precautions not to be deceived in the matter of a contract, by considering carefully who it is in whom he is trusting.' A similar account is given by the same author, Bk. XV [i. 53], about the Hindus: 'They have no actions for mandate or deposit, nor do they use witnesses or seals, but simply trust one another.' Compare Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. IV, chap. i. Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. III, chap. xv.

7. Obligations can also be divided into perpetual and temporary. The former is one which cannot be annulled, so long as that person exists in whom it inheres. Such is the congenital obligation toward God, the exercise of which cannot be suspended at any time. Such is 263 also the obligation of all men toward other men as such, from which also no man can free himself, so long as any part of mankind exists, although it may at times be suspended in part, so far as its exercise is concerned. This takes place when I pass into a state of war with another. For this is a reciprocal obligation, so that when it is broken by one of the parties, and hostilities take the place of duties of humanity, the second party is no longer obligated to live on friendly terms with the first, but is free to maintain his safety and his rights even to the other's hurt. Yet that obligation remains perpetual to this extent, that so soon as the consideration of our own safety permits, we must be ready again to exercise the duties of humanity toward the other party, and live at peace with him. Of the adventitious obligations men usually call perpetual the obligation of children towards parents, and that which passes between husband and wife, which is discussed more fully in another connexion [VI. i and ii].

Temporary obligations are such as can be annulled, while those in whom they inhere are still alive.

8. Furthermore, since it is very frequently the case that obligations exactly correspond one with another, they can also be divided into mutual and non-mutual. A non-mutual obligation is when one man is bound to render something to a second, and yet the latter, to whom something is owed, is under no corresponding obligation that also binds him to return the equivalent. Such is the obligation of men toward God, by which they owe Him absolute obedience, while He is on no account bound, by any force arising from an external obligation, to make them any return for this obedience.

Of the obligations which are concerned on both sides with men, there are apparently none of this kind, if you except a few so-called μονόπλευροι [unilateral] contracts. And this is so because it is repugnant to the natural equality of men, that one man should be obligated to another, and yet the latter should in no way be likewise bound to the former. Those men, indeed, cannot be reckoned social creatures who are not united by some common bond, and between whom there is no exchange of mutual aid, but one of them exists only for the sake of another, from whom in turn nothing need be forthcoming to the former. Nor, indeed, when men introduced a difference in stations, were they able to confer upon any of their number so eminent a right that he could be freed from every obligation, and from meeting any duty to other men.

9. Mutual obligations are such as correspond one with another in such a way that the man, to whom something is owed by an obligation, lies under another obligation, which enjoins him, in view of the thing owed him, to do something in his turn for the other party. These are again divided into imperfectly mutual, and perfectly mutual. The former are such as match each other unequally, so that to one obligation there is opposed another, which is of a different kind, or not so efficacious. This usually seems to come about for two reasons: either because there is such an inequality, between persons¹ who are mutually obligated, that to the one belongs a right to command, and upon the other rests a necessity to obey; or else because some men, otherwise equal, were unwilling to bind themselves by an equal kind of obligation. For obligations vary in their efficacy, in that some produce, in the person to whom they are directed, a perfect right, wherefrom an action arises against us in human cognizance, to be prosecuted either by war or before a tribunal, according to whether one lives in natural liberty, or in a commonwealth. But the rest give only an imperfect right, which cannot be used to force another to render something.

Now from the first of the reasons mentioned above, imperfectly mutual obligations are those between princes and subjects, between states and citizens, masters and slaves, fathers and children, each of which will be treated in its proper place. An obligation becomes imperfectly mutual from the second reason, chiefly in the case of gratui-

264 tous promises and their fulfilment. For in promising another something gratis, I obligate myself perfectly to do it, so that he may on his own right demand it of me. But since I did not agree with him for its equivalent, he is bound to me only by the law¹ of gratitude, wherein the necessity to pay is much more loose and free than in the case of something that is owed by an agreement. For we cannot by any means base our hopes on an unlimited obligation of that kind, and so, no matter however ungrateful the other may turn out to be, we conclude that we have suffered no hurt. For they are wrong who maintain that nature has given a perfect right to demand gratitude from an ungrateful person, even though most nations have refused any actions in their courts on that score. Certainly, it does not follow that there is a greater necessity to return a kindness than to do one, and therefore the latter is an imperfect right, while the former is a perfect one; since there can be different degrees in obligations of the same kind, especially when duties that devolve upon us at the same time are to be compared with each other. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 4.

ON THE NATURE OF PROMISES AND PACTS IN GENERAL

| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. The source of adventitious obligations. 2. The meaning of Hobbes' 'transfer of right'. 3. Hobbes' 'right to all things' does not exist. 4. A perfect promise. 8. Promises in the future tense do not transfer a right. 9-11. Whether there be in mere agreements a power to impose obligation. |

WE must now consider further, how obligations, which are not congenital with a man, may arise for him from some act of his, while by the same means others acquire some right which they did not have before. For these two obligations follow each other in such a way that when an obligation arises for one person, there springs up in another its corresponding right, since it is inconceivable that I should be obligated for something, unless there be some one who may require it of me, or at least properly receive it from me. Although the opposite of the case does not always hold: that is, when one man has a right, there is at once an obligation in another; for instance, sovereigns have a right to exact punishment, but the criminal is under no obligation to undergo it. We may prefer to say, however, that if right be taken in a strict sense, as a faculty or competency to have something, there must always be some obligation in another corresponding to this, but not always, if right is taken in the sense of a faculty to do something. It is clear, therefore, that adventitious obligations arise from an act, either μονόπλευρος [unilateral] or δίπλευρος [bilateral], of which the former is a gratuitous promise, the latter a pact.

2. Now since it is generally agreed among all men, that promises and pacts transfer a right to others, we shall examine first of all the position of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, §§ 3 ff., on the transfer of right. After he has concluded from his thesis of a natural state, that every man has a right to everything, and has gone on to show that from the assertion of this right there will follow a war of all men against all others, a state of affairs the worst possible for the preservation of men, he concludes: Since reason commands men to pass from that status into one of peace, and since this peace is inconsistent with the right of all men to all things, it likewise commands men to part with a portion of that right to all things. He says that a man parts with his right if he either absolutely renounces it, that is, if he declares by sufficient signs that he is willing that it shall never be lawful for him to do that again, which before by right he might have done, or if he conveys the same right to another. The latter method is followed, if he declares by sufficient signs to that other, who is ready to receive that right from him, that he is willing it should be unlawful for him to resist the other, in going about to do somewhat, in the performance whereof he might before with right have resisted him. He concludes from this that 'the conveyance of right consists merely in not resisting'; that is, if any man in a natural state transfers a right upon another, he does not give the other a new right which he did not have¹ before, but he merely renounces his right to resist the other, when the latter wishes to exert his own right.

This he proves on the basis of his hypothesis in the following way: Before the conveyance of the right the man to whom the right is said to be conveyed had already a right to all things; therefore, he could not be given a new right. But the just right of resistance of the conveying party, by reason of which the other could not freely enjoy his right, is utterly abolished. Therefore, whosoever acquires some right in the natural state of men, only procures himself security and freedom from just molestation in the enjoyment of his primitive right. As, for example, if any man should sell or give away a farm, he utterly deprives himself only from all right to this farm, but he does not so to others also; that is, he announces that he will not resist or hinder another who wishes to enjoy that field. Yet by this act he does no prejudice to all other men, who still keep their primitive right to that field.

3. But just as we have shown before, that this state of Hobbes is by no means natural to man, who has been designed for a social life, so we do not acknowledge the consequence of this state, namely, such a right which a man has or may have to everything, and which has an effect in turn on other men. That this may be understood more thoroughly, it must be recognized that not every natural faculty to do something is properly a right, but only that which concerns some moral effect, in the case of those who have the same nature as I. Thus, as in the fables [Aesop, 175], the horse had a natural faculty to graze in the meadow, and so had the stag as well, yet neither of them had a right to this, because their respective faculties did not concern the other. In the same way, when a man takes inanimate objects or animals for his use, he exercises only a purely natural faculty, if it is considered simply with regard to the objects and animals which he uses, without respect to other men. But this faculty takes on the nature of a real right, at the moment when this moral effect is produced in the rest of mankind, that other men may not hinder him, or compete with him, against his will, in using such objects or animals. Of course it is absurd to try to designate as a right that faculty which all other men have an equal right to prevent one from exercising.

Now we admit that man has by nature a faculty to take for his use all inanimate objects and animals. But that faculty, thus exactly defined, cannot properly be called a right, both because such things are under no obligation to present themselves for man's use, and because, by virtue of the natural equality of all men, one man cannot rightfully exclude the rest from such things, unless their consent, expressed or presumed, has let him have them as his very own. Only when this has been done, can he say that he has a proper right to the thing. To state it more concisely: A right to all things, previous to every human deed, must be understood not exclusively, but only indefinitely, that is, not that one man may claim everything for himself to the exclusion of the rest of mankind, but that nature does not define what particular things belong to one man, and what to another, before they agree among themselves on their division and allocation. And even less does the same equality of men allow one man to claim that he has by nature 266 a right over every other man. Nay rather, no man would ever have a right to rule over another, had he not acquired it in some special way from the other's consent, or from some other antecedent act of his, as is shown at greater length in its proper place.

4. The real nature of the transfer and acquisition of a right will become more clear, if it is understood at the outset, that certain rights concern men and certain others concern things, and that the right over things is either original or derivative. A right is acquired over men when a man agrees, either expressly or tacitly, that I may prescribe for him what he should do, allow, or avoid, whereby he at once obligates himself to endeavour of his own accord to do my will, and I on my part acquire the power to compel him, when in default, by the fear of misfortune. A man acquires an original right over things, when all other men expressly or tacitly renounce their faculty to use a thing, which they had held before on equal terms with him. But when once this right has been established, through which the primitive faculty over things has been taken away, by the transfer of the right, something which I myself had is taken away and given to another who before did not have it. This is why it is incongruous to say that a transfer of right consists only in non-resistance, since this negative word in no way expresses the power of the obligation that arises from a transfer of right, which obligation properly implies an intrinsic inclination to do what was agreed upon. Although non-resistance on the part of him who obeys the obligation is a consequence of the transfer.

Now the illustration used by Hobbes does not square with the matter before us. For not only is it an absurdity to call it a sale,¹ when I alone forswear my claim to a thing which all other men still keep as their own, but the ownership of things, on his own confession, comes from civil power, and after the discontinuance of a natural state. And so, in a natural state, no man could call a field his own, and therefore could not sell it. What should have been said was this: Since in a mere natural state things belong to one man¹ no more than to another, it follows that if one man wished to have the sole enjoyment of something, the others had to renounce the use of it. If they did this gratis, he would have the thing as a gift, but if they accompanied that act with some burden or other, it would be called a contract. But if he alone renounced his faculty to the thing, no prejudice would have been done the others, and so he alone, who had renounced it, could be excluded from its use, and not the rest.

5. Let us see, further, how a man, by his own free promise, may contract an obligation, and confer a right upon another. If the nature and effect of this is to be understood properly, it should be observed, at the outset, that we can speak in different ways of doing something for another, which is now, or, it is thought, may come to be in our power. One way is by our merely expressing our feeling, as it now stands, on something in the future, in such a way as lays us under no necessity of persevering in that desire. An illustration is in the message of Tiberius to Sejanus in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. IV [xi. 40]: 'What projects I have turned over in my own mind, by what further ties I am preparing to bind you to myself, I will forbear for the present to disclose.' (R.) From a statement of this kind there arises no obligation for myself, nor any right for another. See Digest, XLV. i. 108, § 1. And all that is required to make such a statement blameless is that our thought be true for the moment, that is, that my intention was actually such as we profess it to have been, and that we do not mock the other with a falsehood. But we are not bound to persevere in that purpose, since the mind of man has not merely a natural power to change its will, but a right as well, so that it may rightfully do this, when no obligation lays upon it the necessity of standing by an opinion once declared. Although 267 such changes of the will are to be censured, if the former purpose which was abandoned was better than the second, or if it has been the cause of unmerited mockery of others. A case in point is given by Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. viii, n. 5-6, concerning Q. Caecilius and T. Marius Urbinas. Although the impudence of gaping crows often merits such mockery. See Pliny, Letters, Bk. II, ep. xx. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 2.

6. We can call it an imperfect promise when a man declares his will to do a favour for another at a later time by some sign sufficient to show the necessity of his persevering in his declaration, that is, he clearly declares² his willingness to be obligated, yet in such a way that no right is given the other man to require the thing of him. This is like what happens in the return of a favour, when the man who receives a kindness is obligated to show a grateful attitude, which, however, his benefactor cannot demand by his own right.

Some maintain that it is not so easy to find an example of this kind of promise, so far as it arises from the law of nature. As instances are advanced the promise of an absolute ruler to his subject, of a master to his slave, of a father to a son under his authority, which promises the former are obliged to fulfil, while the latter apparently have no right to demand it, because there is no court where they can bring action against these superiors. The fact that such promises seem defective is due, not to their intrinsic weakness, but to the circumstance that a quality is found in those who make the promises which prevents the effect of the obligation from taking its full course. Others advance the instance of an imperfect stipulation, where, according to civil laws, promises must be made in certain stipulating formulae, and when these are not used, no action can be brought that is based upon the promise. They judge that if it was the intention of the promissors to make a perfect obligation, and it was only through error or carelessness that the exact words of the law were omitted, the promisor is still bound by natural equity to fulfil his promise, although the other party has no action in a civil court to require it. And yet, in this instance as well, the imperfection¹ of the promise comes about not by reason of natural law, but of positive law, which, quite contrary to the custom of natural law, orders the effect of the promise in set formulae. The following seems the best instance of an imperfect promise, if I couch it in this way: 'I have made up my mind in all seriousness to do this or that for you, and I hope that you will take my word for it.' Under such terms the promisor apparently is obligated to do something, more by the law of veracity than the law of justice, for he was willing to have some obligation laid upon himself, yet he was unwilling to be compelled by the other person to do it. For the spirit of men is so generous that they would rather appear to be brought to perform some duty by the impulse of their own virtue, than by some right of another.

Under this head should also fall the assurances of men in authority or of high regard, whereby they promise another person their recommendation, intercession, help, or support, not in words involving a pledge of honour,² and yet in all seriousness, which assistance they are unwilling to have demanded of them on any right, but want it imputed entirely to their humanity and truthfulness.³ And not even natural law seems able to force a man to perform such a promise when he has silently made the reservation against any such compulsion, so that an added grace might gather around his deed the freer it was from coercion.

7. It is a perfect promise when a man not only declares his will for a future time to perform something for another, but also shows that he gives him a right, whereby the other is fully entitled to demand of 268 him the thing promised. Now when we promise to give something or to do something, such a promise either leads to the alienation of our property, or is an alienation of some slight portion of our liberty, so that in what we were able before to do, or omit to do, or to handle at our discretion, we must now follow the directions of our promise. Yet it must be noted that such considerations apply only to promises between men. For although it is impossible for the divine promises to fail, yet it is surely a venturesome thing to say that man acquires a right against God from His promise. Add Grotius, loc. cit., §§ 3-4.

8. Some attention should be given at this time to the opinion of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, §§ 6 ff.: 'But if there be no other tokens extant of our will either to quit or convey our right, but only words, those words must either relate to the present or time past'; that is, a right to a thing promised is transferred to another only by words of present or past time, not by words of future time. For the man, for instance, who says of the future, 'To-morrow I will give, to-morrow I will make a settlement,' shows openly that he has not yet given the thing. And so for the whole of to-day his right over the thing remains undisturbed, and so also for the next day and the day after that, unless he has transferred the right by some new promise, or given it over meanwhile by some act. But if, besides words, other signs are used, capable of declaring the will to transfer a right in the present time, words will not hinder the effect, even though grammatically they belong to the future tense. When, however, such signs are lacking, verbs in the future tense should not be given so free an interpretation as to allow them to effect a present transfer of right. For since we are, as a rule, not in the habit of transferring our goods to others, except to acquire thereby some advantage, which advantage is not clearly visible in a gratuitous donation; therefore, no easy presumption should be made about an act which accords only slightly with the general inclination of mankind, except in so far as it can be gathered by express signs of the will. Especially since words of this nature usually show but a mere attitude of mind,¹ and have, for the present at least, no efficacy. So long, therefore, as a man speaks of the future, he is supposed to be still weighing the matter, and before that time both his own attitude, and the merit of the other party may change, or some other situation arise, whereby he will be unable conveniently to do without his possession. This is just like a man making his will, who under no circumstance transfers by his will to an heir a present right, but is always held to have made some such mental reservation as: 'This man shall be my heir, unless I change my mind before I die.' And yet a man will not escape the stricture of fickleness, if he seriously deceives others with empty hopes.

The matter is very different, if I say, 'I am giving or I have given you something for you to have to-morrow.' For this is giving to-day a right to have something to-morrow, or, in other words, transferring to-day to another a right over something, the actual delivery of which should take place to-morrow. Nor are such promises as these affected by the fact that most promises are by custom expressed in words denoting future time. For although we usually say, even when we promise something by a formal acknowledgement or oath, 'You will have this of me', or 'I will give you this', &c., it has been the practice for such words to be used, because the actual transfer of the thing promised usually comes after some interval. Nay, it can scarcely be called a promise when the thing is done immediately upon the declaration of one's intention, since in such a case there apparently never was any obligation, or it expired as soon as it was contracted. In general, people say they have something when they have the actual possession of it. And so the real meaning of the words commonly occurring in a perfect promise, such as 'In six days I will give you one hundred units of value', is merely this: 'At this time I give you the right to have and require of me one hundred units of value, and at the same time I obligate myself to give it to you within the specified time.'

The case can be presented more briefly thus: Words of the future tense in promises, especially a word meaning to give, imply either the assumption of an obligation, whereby neither the thing itself nor any right to it is transferred, or else the transfer of a thing to be made hereafter, the right to which is now or has been already transferred, in which case the words in no way detract from the perfect character of the promise.

9. At this point we must discuss also that most vexed question, whether, namely, natural law invests with any power of obligation mere promises as well as mere pacts, so long as they are only set forth in terms of simple agreement and do not contain any undertaking (negotium) or συνάλλαγμα [contract]. This is denied, particularly by François Connan, Commentaria Juris Civilis, Bk. V, chap. i, whose arguments Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 1, and others have undertaken to refute. And certainly all the savants hitherto have agreed that a verbal pledge must be kept, and that a man by his statement alone can lay himself under a necessity to do something, even if no further transaction has taken place. Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vii]: 'Now the foundation of justice is faithfulness, which is a perseverance and truth in all our declarations and in all our promises, and for that reason it has been said that the word fides is no other than a performance of what we have promised.' (E.) Ulpian in Digest, II. xiv. 1: 'What, indeed, can be so much in accordance with mutual trust among men as the principle of abiding by what persons have agreed to?' (M.) That was a poor and wicked jest on the part of a petty prince of Java, when reproved for not keeping his promises, to say that 'his tongue was not so rigid as a bone'. It will appear from a discussion of the arguments of Connan, whether his attempted attack is anything but a crude effort.

His first point is: 'He who rashly trusts a man who makes a promise without cause is no less at fault than he who makes the vain promise.' Here it must be carefully explained what a promise 'without cause' is. For if he means that such things are promised which will produce no harm or inconvenience to him to whom they are promised, if they are not fulfilled, and which will bring some loss or trouble to the one who fulfils them, then surely it can be granted that promises made 'without cause' carry no obligation. For why may any man wish to claim on the basis of some right of his that I should be put to some trouble or expense if he is not going to receive thereby any advantage for himself? While for my part it is against all reason to undertake something from which no good and only evil will result. Thus, for example, if you had required of me that I should go without food for four days,¹ there is no reason why I am obligated to keep the promise if such a fast must injure my health and bring you no advantage. And, in a case of this kind, as much folly must be charged to him who promises such a thing as to him who thinks that from such a promise he has secured a right which may be claimed in all seriousness. Furthermore, since promises are gratuitous, and lay a responsibility on but one of the parties, it is always to be understood that they carry² this proviso: They will be fulfilled in so far as it can be done without any great inconvenience to me. Nor, indeed, will the man to whom the promise is made be so bold as to claim that my kindness shall involve me in some loss, or that he may desire to be enriched at considerable cost to me.

The matter is treated by Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [x]:

Occasions frequently happen with the result that it is not just to keep a promise; for it is proper to have recourse to the foundations of justice: in the first place, that of injuring no person, and secondly, that of being subservient to the public good. When these conditions are altered by circumstances, the moral obligation, not being invariably identical, is similarly altered. A promise, as a paction, may happen to be made, the performance of which may be prejudicial either to the party promising, or to the party to whom the promise is made. For (as we see in the play), had not Neptune performed his promise to Theseus, the latter would not have been bereaved of his son Hippolytus; for it is recorded that of the three wishes to be granted him, the third, which he made in a passion, was the death of Hippolytus. Therefore, you are not to perform those promises which may be prejudicial to the party to whom you promised, nor if they may be more hurtful to you than they can be serviceable to him. It is inconsistent with our duty that the greater injury should be put before the less. For instance, suppose you should promise to appear as the advocate of another person while his cause is pending: now, if your son was to be seized violently ill, in the meantime, it would be no breach of duty in you not to perform what you promise; the other person would rather depart from his duty, if he should complain that he had been abandoned. (E.*)

Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chaps. xxxv and xxxix. Another passage from Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxiv], bears on the case before us:

If any one should give some person a cure for dropsy, and should covenant with him that he should never afterwards use that cure—if by that cure he became well, and in some years afterwards fell into the same disease, and could not obtain from him with whom he had covenanted, leave to use it again—what ought he to do? Since he is an inhuman person, who would not give him leave, and no injury would be done to that person by using it, he ought to consult for his life and health. (E.)

But, if Connan means by a promise 'without cause' a gratuitous promise, then it is clear that his position would destroy all possibility of kindness and liberality, and that all the duties of humanity would become mercenary. For if a man, knowing his own resources, has ordered me to expect some free gift from him, that I may thereafter have some reason to love and cultivate him, why should I not trust him? And since he could make or withhold the promise at will, why did he command me to base my plans upon his word, if he was not ready to be fully obligated thereby? For the denial of a kindness is without injury, only so long as a man is bound to its performance merely by the law of humanity, but not if the other person has secured by the promise a right to its fulfilment.

10. Connan goes on to maintain: Since such promises arise more from a desire for display than from real intent, or, even if they are to be taken in all good faith and not jestingly, since they are thrown out hastily, and with little consideration, the fortunes of all men would be seriously endangered, if they are to be bound by any chance word or promise. Perhaps the reason why the ancients held that the vows of lovers were not binding, and that the gods overlooked those who broke them, was because they were made by a mind blinded with love, Plato, Convivium [p. 183]; and the poets, passim.¹ But in fact such a danger need arouse no fear, for we attribute the power of obligating only to serious promises, and such as are made upon deliberation. Only a dolt would take some jocular word in all seriousness. On the other hand, rashly to promise more than you can conveniently fulfil certainly merits reproof, but surely it would be inhuman to try to exact such promises. Flavius Vopiscus [xxxv] tells how Aurelian once promised the people crowns of two pounds weight if he returned a victor, and while they expected them to be of gold, he made them of bread.

In the next place words of honour, and such as are used to express in a general way our esteem for another, must be distinguished from promises by which we are bound in a special way to some particular undertaking. For men of good breeding often express their good-will in very full terms, for instance, by saying that they are all yours and offering their persons and their possessions to another's assistance. So Aeolus in Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. I [76], says: 'Tis your part, O queen, to examine well what you would have done: it is my duty to execute your commands.' (B.) In this case it would have been highly uncivil to have taken such words in their strict sense. See 1 Kings, xx. 3 ff., although a different interpretation is given the passage by Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. VIII, chap. viii. Grotius, on the passage in question, says that Ahab understood the words in this sense: 'I give myself and my possessions into your protection'; but that Benhadad understood them as of actual possession. Add Polybius, Selections on Embassies, XIII [XX. ix]; Livy, Bk. XXXVI [xxviii], on the case of Phaeneas, the ambassador of the Aetolians. Such words, therefore, although uttered in all seriousness, obligate one to no special thing, but only bespeak a kindly mind and attitude towards another person. Add Fernando Vazquez, Controversiarum Illustrum, Bk. I, chap. x, §§ 20 ff.

But just as those promises which bid a person to expect some certain and definite thing from us must necessarily be fulfilled, because the man has put faith in us, and made his plans according to our word, 271 so the obligation to keep promises should not be taken from the relations of men, just because some few men of muddled wits, who ought to be turned over to the care of their family or friends, would ruin themselves and their fortunes by making too many promises. In the same way the practice of giving surety for a person is not condemned merely because it entails not a few people in losses. And so in view of the fact that a promise becomes a debt, men should be cautious about promising more than they can conveniently fulfil. Nor can it be other than a mark of weakness for one to be so tender-hearted that he cannot say no to a man, however impudent his request. Terence, Andria, Act IV, sc. i [629-38], has a passage to the point:

It's the worse class of men who at the moment haven't the courage to say no, and afterwards, when the time comes for fulfilling their promises, then under the strain of necessity show their true character, and are fearful.¹ Then with brazen assurance they talk in this style. 'Who are you? What are you to me? Why should I give up my bride to you? Look here, charity begins at home.' Suppose you ask 'What becomes of your promise?' They're shameless when shame is wanted; when it's not wanted, then they have scruples. (S.)

Plutarch, Brutus [vi. 5], turns it in this way: 'That inability to withstand shameless importunity, which some call timidity, he regarded as most disgraceful in a great man, and he was wont to say that those who were unable to refuse anything, in his opinion, must have been corrupted in their youth.' (P.)

11. The other arguments which Connan advances give less difficulty. He says that it is entirely right to leave something to a man's honesty and liberality, and not to claim and demand everything with the strictness of an obligation. That our zeal for honourable behaviour and constancy is increased when an opportunity is left for those virtues to shine forth, which would scarcely be possible, were all men under compulsion to do everything they had promised. That to fulfil what you had once promised or shown by some other sign that you would do, is a noble and laudable thing, but all the more worthy of approbation, the less it is made compulsory.

But surely there is enough opportunity for liberality in offering a man the right to demand of you what you could perfectly well deny him. And since so many promises pass between men from their standing in need of each other's assistance, it is more to the interest of human affairs that men keep their word with less attendant praise than that a great number of men be deceived by the inconstancy of their fellows. Thus the law of nature commands a man to do a favour to another in so far as he can do it without great loss to himself. But the obligation is made more binding if a man gives his own free consent to what nature had commanded only indefinitely, and bids another person expect it from him without fail. Hence the conclusion cannot be drawn, that even though I had made no promise, it was the part of a good and just man to come to the aid of others, and therefore it is praiseworthy to stand by my word, only because another is in need, not because I have made a promise.

But the same writer concedes that if a man has suffered any damage from the non-fulfilment of a promise (suppose a man has trusted another's word, and has in some way or other neglected to look to his own necessities), the promissor is bound by natural law to make good the matter; and from this it is right to conclude that a promise can be exacted, and a person must perform it, lest another suffer loss thereby. But it is a dangerous thing to admit the following conclusion: When you are no worse off from my non-fulfilment of my promise than you would have been had I made no promise at all, therefore I shall have the right to recall it, if it has so far had no effect; and that it will be more contrary to nature to require such promises against the will of the promissors, when you are seeking therefrom some gain to yourself, than for them to recall their promises when you receive no hurt therefrom. For your duty of humanity is not met merely by your avoiding any injury to another, but, so far as in you lies, you should even advance his interests. Therefore, if you have bound yourself in a special way to such an act, to repent of it for the sole reason that the other person will receive no harm therefrom, would make it seem that the bettering of our neighbour's condition is beneath our notice. On the same principle, no one would admit that a person could rightfully withdraw from such pacts as include συνάλλαγμα [exchange of services], when such a withdrawal would mean, not that the other party's condition would be worse, but only no better.

And Grotius also shows very well that, as a result of accepting Connan's view in this crude form, it would follow that pacts between kings and different nations would have no force so long as nothing had yet been done on their terms, especially in places where no special form has been found for treaties and covenants. Nothing could contribute more to arousing mistrust among men, since under such circumstances everything would have to be done with eyes on the tips of your fingers.¹ But the condition of men who have business relations with one another scarcely ever permits such intimate transactions.

Finally, the reason why the Romans allowed an action only on those promises which were made by stipulation or agreement was not because the law of nature did not hold serious promises binding, but with the object that, by the use of set formulae, men would be made carefully to consider whether it was to their advantage to promise what could not later be recalled. And also that what was promised might be expressed more clearly, for fear some obscurity in their terms might open the way to disagreements. Add Digest, XIX. v. 15.

ON THE CONSENT REQUIRED IN PROMISES AND PACTS

|---|--|
| 1. Consent is required in promises and pacts. | 9. Whether a suspicion of deception makes pacts invalid. |
| 2. Consent is given expressly or tacitly. | 10-13. Fear makes promises and pacts invalid. |
| 3. Consent presupposes the use of reason. | 14. How invalid promises may become valid. |
| 4. This is hampered by great drunkenness. | 15. On the consent of the acceptor of a promise. |
| 5. On minors. | 16. On the signs and tokens of consent. |
| 6. On error in promises. | |
| 7. On error in pacts and contracts. | |
| 8. On fraud. | |

SINCE promises and pacts regularly limit our liberty and lay upon us some burden in that we must now of necessity do something, the performance or omission of which lay before entirely within our own decision, no more pertinent reason can be advanced, whereby a man can be prevented from complaining hereafter of having to carry such a burden than that he agreed to it¹ of his own accord, and sought on his own judgement what he had full power to refuse.

2. Now although consent is usually expressed by signs, such as speaking, writing, and nodding, it sometimes happens that it is inferred, without such signs, from the nature of the business and other circumstances. Just as sometimes the absence of signs, or silence, when viewed in certain circumstances, is equivalent to a sign of consent. Euripides, Iphigenia in Aulis [1142]: 'Thy very silence is thy confession.' (W.) But it is necessary, in such a case, for the present condition of affairs to be such, that they agree from every point of view in presuming consent, and that there be no probable conjecture that would lead to a different conclusion. For otherwise it would surely work a hardship to lay an obligation upon a man merely from any kind of token. 273

From this one can understand what goes to form the real nature of a tacit pact: when, namely, consent is not shown by the signs which men regularly make use of in their transactions, but when it is clearly to be gathered from the nature of the business and other circumstances. But it often happens that when² the principal pact has been made with express consent, a tacit pact is understood from the nature of the business to be added to it, and to flow from it. Just as it has long been recognized that some tacit exceptions and conditions are to be understood in pacts. And yet these should not be allowed more freely than the general character of human transactions will bear, lest they render pacts too slippery and uncertain.

The following can be taken as examples of a tacit pact: A stranger who, in the guise of a friend, enters a state whose policy has been the friendly reception of foreigners, even without giving any expression of his fealty, is understood to have expressed tacitly, by his act of entering the country, his willingness to conduct himself by the laws of that state, in accordance with his station, so soon as he has found out that such a general law was promulgated for all who desire to sojourn within the limits of that state. And, on the same ground, he has tacitly stipulated from the state for a temporary defence of his person and the securing of justice.

When in a man's absence some business of his is done without his express orders a tacit pact is understood, whereby the man is bound to compensate any person for the labour and expense to which he was put in managing the business to good advantage. For it is presumed that, if the absentee had known about the matter, he would have expressly agreed to its dispatch.

Likewise, when a man sits down at a table in an inn, it is understood that by this act he has agreed to pay the price asked for his food, although he may not have exchanged a word about it with the keeper, for it is well known that no one gets food in such a place gratis. In the same way the obligation that exists between a guardian and his ward, finds its source in a tacit agreement. Add Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xxiv.

The following are instances of accessory pacts: If a man shall bargain with another about safe entrance to a certain place, it is understood that an agreement has been made for his return also, although there may have been no express mention of it, since otherwise the first pact would be of no avail. Likewise, if a ruler has made a pact whereby foreigners may use a market of his state, it is supposed that he has also agreed that they may take from his territory the goods which they purchase there. Just as it would be absurd, for example, to sell a man a field and not be willing to allow him to possess it where it lies, but to demand that he take it off to another place. Again, it is understood that when a man lets out a room in his dwelling, he has allowed the renter the use of such parts of the house that he cannot do without, such as the doors, and passage-ways which lead to the room, so far, at least, that he may have entrance and exit.

Instances of tacit conditions and exceptions are to be met on every hand. But in general it is to be observed that they should all be strictly¹ interpreted, and that they should have no greater force than that given by a clear understanding of the agreement. Add Digest, XXII. iii. 24. For otherwise an onerous obligation might be laid upon a man against his will; and when too great indulgence is allowed tacit exceptions and conditions, most pacts can be rendered null or evaded. The Roman

Jurisconsults give the following example of a tacit pact in Digest, II. xiv. 2: 'If I return to my debtor a written undertaking which he gave me, it is held that there is a "tacit" convention between us that I shall not sue him.' (M.*) But here, because of the simplicity of natural law, it does not seem necessary to adduce a tacit pact in this case, since 274 a plainer statement would be that the return of the security is understood to remit the debt, and so to do away with any cause for action. But the Roman law preferred to invent this devious way of proceeding, and to invent a pact not to call for a loan, merely in order that an obligation for a thing really contracted should not appear to be removed by mere consent. So also in Digest, XIX. ii. 51, it seems unnecessary to stipulate that 'it was silently agreed that the owner need not make good the difference to the renter, if the farm was rented later at a higher sum'. For without the understanding of a tacit pact the simplest way to state the case is that the given law for such a contract can by no means be so extended as to benefit the renter, since he is unworthy of such a favour, who has not cultivated the field according to the agreement. Add also Code, II. iii. 2; Digest, XVII. i. 6, § 2; Ibid., 18; Ibid., 53; Digest, XIX. ii. 13, towards the end; Ibid., 14.

3. But that a man may be able to give his full and clear consent, the first thing required is enough use of his reason to let him understand whether the business at hand suits him, and falls within his ability to fulfil; and then, after weighing all this, to be able to show his consent by sufficient signs. It follows from this that the promise of a child as well as of an idiot and lunatic is invalid. Although it should be observed about an idiot that his actions have no moral force merely during the time of his derangement. But when his madness leaves him intervals of sanity there is nothing to prevent his being able validly to obligate himself, but only for so long a time as the disease allows him the use of his reason, for when the insanity recurs, it suspends all obligation to transact any business on his own part until such actions can again be considered truly his own. And so the common saying of the lawyers: 'The coming on of madness does not nullify any business that has already been properly transacted,' must be understood of matters that are concluded at once. Such is the nature of a will, which, when once properly drawn up, stands until it has been abrogated by a clear declaration of a contrary will, such as cannot be done by a demented person.

But when an obligation must be fulfilled by different acts requiring the use of reason, it is clearly suspended by an intervening fit of insanity. If a man has undertaken some work for me at a definite time, and meanwhile goes insane, his obligation will cease, since he can no longer fulfil it. Yet in the hope that a person will recover his sanity an obligation, as well as power and right, are often understood to continue to reside in him, in so far as the initiation of an act is concerned,¹ the exercise of which is for a time vested in others. But if a man is incurably insane, civil law properly considers him dead. See Digest, I. vi. 8; Ibid., I. xviii. 14; Ibid., III. iii. 2; Ibid., IX. ii. 5, § 2.

4. Furthermore, since drunkenness seriously affects the use of the reason, or at times completely subverts it, the question arises whether a drunken man is able to obligate himself by a promise or agreement. This can apparently be answered in the negative if the drunkenness is so deep that the wine has completely destroyed the power of reason. For it surely cannot be regarded as a real and deliberate consent, even if a man agrees to something on a passing and ill-advised impulse, or makes signs that would otherwise show consent, all at a time when his mind has been deranged by a kind of stupefying drug. It would be bold indeed to want to exact such a promise, especially if its fulfilment carries with it a considerable burden. And if a man has taken advantage of a drunken person, and on noting his condition has cunningly extracted a promise from him, he will not escape punishment for deceit and fraud. But if, after his drunkenness is over, a man has recalled what he said and confirmed it, he shall be obligated, not for what he did when drunk, but when in his right mind.

275 Yet a fairly generous indulgence, which does not destroy the reason so much as it contributes to a jovial occasion, does not destroy the power of incurring an obligation, especially if it be renewed when both parties are sober. This is illustrated by the well-known passage of Tacitus, Germany [xxii]:

In their feasts they generally deliberate on the reconciliation of enemies, on family alliances, on the appointment of chiefs, and finally on peace and war; conceiving that at no time the soul is more opened to sincerity or warmed to heroism. These people, naturally devoid of artifice or disguise, disclose the most secret emotions of their hearts in the freedom of festivity. The minds of all being thus displayed without reserve, the subjects of their deliberation are again canvassed the next day; and each time has its advantage. They consult when unable to dissemble; they determine when not liable to mistake. (O.)

A similar story is told of the Persians, by Herodotus, Bk. I [cxxxiii]; Athenaeus, Bk. IV, chap. x; Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. iv [1]. Add Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. VII, chaps. ix-x.

But it is clear that crimes are by no means to be overlooked, merely because they were due to drunkenness. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. vii:

Legislators punish a person for mere ignorance, if it seems that he is responsible for it. Thus the punishments inflicted on drunken people who commit a crime are double, as the origin of the crime lies in the person himself, for it was in his power not to get drunk, and the drunkenness was the cause of his ignorance. (W.)

¹ [The precise meaning of the phrase quod actum primum is not quite clear to us, nor do Barbeyrac and Kennet seem to give much help.—Tr.]

It was a law of Solon: 'If an archon be found drunk, he shall be punished with death.' And by a law of Pittacus the punishment was twofold for a crime committed in a state of drunkenness. Diogenes Laertius, Bk. I [57]. Although a drunken man may not know what he is doing, yet surely, when of his own accord he took what he knew would cloud his senses, it is assumed that he consented to all the consequences.

But it does not follow from this that drunken men are obligated by their promises, since there is a great difference between committing crimes and contracting obligations. For since the commission of a crime is strictly forbidden, a man should shun all occasions which seem likely to lead him to commit them; and a man can scarcely avoid knowing what drunkenness may mean for him. Furthermore, since drunkenness is called a sin, primarily for the reason that it leads men to other sins, that which is in itself a sin cannot be excluded from the number of sins merely because it is due to a sin. And yet, since it lies within our own power whether or not we are willing to incur new obligations, we are not bound to avoid occasions which might interfere with our clear consent. So, of course, we are not supposed to avoid sleep, merely because a man might in jest take our nodding as an agreement to something he wants of us. A grim jest of this nature on the part of Caligula is given by Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xxxviii:

A well-known¹ incident (he is writing of an auction held by the emperor) is that of Aponius Saturninus; he fell asleep on one of the benches, and as the auctioneer was warned by Gaius not to overlook the praetorian gentleman who kept nodding to him, the bidding was not stopped until thirteen gladiators were knocked down to the unconscious sleeper at nine million sesterces. (R.)

From this it may be concluded that, if drunkenness were responsible for no other misfortune than that it allows to be elicited from imprudent or ignorant person signs, which otherwise show consent, this alone would not be reason enough to make it unlawful. And since, in order to contract an obligation from a promise or pact, there is required the consent of the contracting party who understands at the time the business at hand, a man's consent cannot be presumed from the fact that he had consented to a thing which was going to prevent the use of his reason. Especially since most men indulge in wine, not in order to lose the use of their reason, but only for the pleasure to be secured; and the former effect steals upon them for the most part unintentionally, while with no thought for the consequences they are seeking this latter diversion. A further consideration is that, since a crime causes a person some damage, while a promise confers a benefit which was before unowed, and since it is more odious to suffer an injury than to fail to secure some benefit, drunkenness can more easily render null a promise than excuse a crime.

Finally, that a man is bound to pay for, say, some wine which in his drunkenness he pours down into an already sated stomach, and which he would not have consumed had he been himself, appears from the contract made at the beginning of his drinking bout, by which he agreed to pay for as much wine as his throat could swallow, even though it would have to be ejected later by the same passage. If in his intoxication he pours out some of it, breaks the glasses, or to cap the evening smashes the windows, he is held responsible on the general law of compensating for the damage which his mischief has caused another.

5. Now how long children continue in a weakness of reason which prevents their contracting an obligation cannot be definitely stated in general terms, since with some the judgement matures more rapidly, with others more slowly. In determining this question regard should be had to the daily actions of each individual, or to what positive laws have been passed in states, which have usually set a certain time for coming of age, according as they have observed that their inhabitants develop more rapidly or more slowly. Thus among the Hebrews a promise was valid if made by a youth after his thirteenth year, by a maiden after her twelfth year. But since a tender age, even when able to understand the conduct of business, is carried away by quick and usually ill-considered impulses and makes promises lightly, is credulous, eager to have a reputation for liberality, inclined to cultivate influential friendships, and ignorant of whom to trust, many states have safeguarded it by the law, that, in contracting obligations, younger persons must follow the authority of others who are more prudent, until it is felt that their hasty impulses have abated. And so in some countries whatever is done by such persons on their own initiative is held null; in other countries they are accorded full restitution, in case they have suffered from sharp practices. See Digest, IV. iv. 11, §§ 3 ff.; Ibid., 24, § 1; Ibid., 44.

Natural law in no uncertain terms called for a decision on such matters by positive law, especially since a man can scarcely be cleared of deceit who takes advantage of that easy age and wishes to enrich himself by involving others in expenses which their weakness of judgement prevented them knowing how to foresee or estimate. The Attic law in this respect put women on a par with minors, not allowing them to make a contract for anything above a peck of barley, 'because of that weakness of their judgement,' as it is put by Dio Chrysostom, Orations, xxv (De Incredulitate) [lxxiv. 638 M]; Isaeus, Orations, ix.

But the same natural law goes on to enjoin that, when states have statutes of this kind, they are to be observed in the transactions of citizens not only with one another but also with foreigners. This is not so much because, whenever a man makes a contract, he is under the laws of that state for a time as a temporary subject, as because a state usually refuses any action on matters which do not conform with its laws; unless the state has expressly made known that, in executing the law for strangers, it will follow mere natural law. And the same rule must be observed, if a written contract has been entered into between citizens of different states, whereby an action is to be brought in the court of the one who is in default. For although the contracting party 277 may never have put himself, even for a time, under the government of the other, yet if he wants to avail himself of the help of the other's court, the transaction will have to be decided in accordance with the laws of the latter's state. So also if two men, who are subjects of the same state, draw up a pact in a place which recognizes no sovereignty, such as on the ocean or a desert's isle, they will put themselves in agreement with the laws of their country, if they wish to secure a perfect right from them, or to an action in a court of their state. We shall note in another place what rule is to be applied to the acts of those who are superior to civil laws.

6. Consent, again, which is necessary in order to validate promises and pacts, is entirely nullified by error, because of which it happens that the mind wanders from the true object of a promise or pact, and as a consequence the will does not in fact agree to it. But a careful distinction must be made, as to whether error is concerned with a promise or with a pact. Regarding promises the definite statement can be made that, if a promise was based on the presumption of some fact, which was not as stated, or if I made my promise on the supposition of some fact or quality and would not have bound myself had I not supposed it to be there, the promise will naturally have no force; provided the very nature of the business and the circumstances clearly show that I based and conditioned my consent entirely upon that fact or quality. The ground for this is, that the promissor did not give his absolute consent to the promise, but made as a condition the presumption of this fact or quality. But since, now, the condition is not present, whatever had been based upon it falls to the ground and vanishes. Digest, II. 1. 15.

For instance, should I have been informed by a messenger that you had conducted my business well, and I had promised you something on that account, I shall not be bound by my promise, when I have found that the report was false. The same rule may be used to settle the question put by Cicero, On the Orator, Bk. I [xxxviii]:

A false report of a soldier's death having been brought home from the army, and the father, through giving credit to that report, having altered his will, and appointed another person, and having then died himself, the affair, when the soldier returned home, and instituted suit for his paternal inheritance, came on to be heard before the centumviri. (W.*)

Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. vii, § 1. The argument advanced for the soldier was based on the civil law, which stated that those wills of a parent are void in which a son has been neither designated as heir nor disinherited by name, something that was not done in this case. But the designated heir might have replied that the law in question supposed that the father knew his son to be still alive, which in the case before them the father did not know. But it is possible to make a simpler reply on the basis of natural law, to wit: The father's will was based upon the belief that his son was dead, and since this is clearly false, the purpose of the father is null, because his son's death is plainly the sole reason for his changing his will, and otherwise he would not have changed it.

It is clear from these facts what reply should be given the over-nice question proposed by Thomas Browne, Religio Medici, § 20, whether the man, whom Lazarus had designated as his heir, could keep the latter's estate, or whether Lazarus, upon being brought to life, could rightfully lay claim to his property. The latter position is unquestionably to be maintained. For the property of dead men passes to others because they are taken out of human affairs, and for that reason have no longer any need of their estate. This is the reason why in some countries a portion of the dead man's estate is set apart to be given to the priests or the poor; or in other countries some things are buried or burned with him for his use in the other world.

But if the promissor was careless in examining the matter on which 278 he based his consent, he is bound to make good any damage which the other person suffered because of his ill-judged engagement.

If a promise is not based upon the presence or absence of some quality as a condition, then, no matter how the quality was when the promissor agreed to it, the promise will still be valid. But if a promise was only partly built upon error it will hold good for the rest, unless one of the parts of a promise is related to the other as a condition, or unless the matter can be accomplished only if all the parts are fulfilled. For in such a case an error in part will destroy the whole.

7. Touching error arising in pacts, the distinction must be drawn as to whether a man was induced by error to enter a pact, or whether the error is concerned with the matter about which the pact was made. In the former case I feel that the next thing to observe is, whether or not there have been proceedings under that pact. If I have been led through error to enter a pact or agreement, and I discover the error while the matter is still hanging and nothing has yet been done, it will certainly be fair to allow me to repent of my agreement, especially if I plainly declared, on entering the agreement, what reasons led me to do so. But if the error appears after steps have been taken towards fulfilment, when the pact is already fulfilled entirely or in part, the man who made the mistake will not be able to urge the rescinding of the contract. Unless, indeed, the other party may be willing to show some feeling for him, as in such a case as that of a man¹ away from his estate who receives a false report that his horses have all died. For this reason he contracts to purchase others, but before the sale is completed he discovers that the message was untrue. It is my opinion that he cannot be made to carry out his side of the contract, since the dealer knows that he took the false message as a condition of his purchase. Yet equity obliges him to make some amends, or at least to make good any damage the dealer may have suffered. But if the money has been paid and the horses handed over, it will not be possible to compel the dealer to return the money and take back his horses, even though the man has no further use for them, unless this was expressly stated in the contract.

But when error concerns the thing about which the agreement is being made the pact is rendered void, not because of the error, but because the laws of the pact are not satisfied. For pacts require that the thing itself, about which the agreement is being made, and its qualities, should be understood, and unless there is this understanding no clear consent can be recognized. And so when a defect has been detected, the man who would have been wronged may either withdraw from the contract, or force the other party to make good the defect, and even to meet his loss, in case any fraud or guilt has slipped in. And this is possible, not merely if the defect is discovered at once, but even after an interval of time has elapsed. In case the civil laws do not fix this interval, its duration must be set by some honest arbiter, so that too much indulgence in examining the matter may not be granted either to the deceit of the one or to the negligence of the other. And a greater interval is to be allowed if the defect does not lie on the face of the thing, but can be detected only after close and expert examination.

The common saying that a pact is made void by an error in essentials, but not by one in accidentals (Digest, XLIV. vii. 57), is to be interpreted as meaning that by the essentials of a pact are understood not only such things as enter into the physical essence of the matter over which the pact is made, but also those qualities which the maker of the pact had especially before his eyes. For it often happens that in a pact the quality of the thing is considered of first importance, while its physical substance is regarded only as a necessary accessory. See Digest, XVIII. i. 34 pr. Cicero, For Roscius the Comic Actor [x], has this to say on the slave Panurgus:

For how much of him belonged to Fannius? His body. How much to Roscius? His education. His person was of no value; his skill was valuable. As far as he belongs to Fannius he was not worth fifty thousand sesterces; as far as he belonged to Roscius he was worth more than a hundred thousand. For no one looked at him because of his person; but people estimated him as a comic actor. For those limbs could not earn by themselves more than twelve sesterces; owing to the education which was given him by Roscius, he let himself out for not less than a hundred thousand. (Y.)

And so my contract will be void, not only when I have bartered with another for Davus, and he has sent me Syrus, but also when I have said that I wanted a slave that was a skilled cook, and one has been sent me who knows nothing of that art. Add Digest, XVIII. i. 9, 10, 11, 14, 41, § 1.

8. All the more is a promise or pact nullified, if the error which led a man to make it was produced in him by the other party's malicious fraud and deceit. It is our feeling that the disputes concerning the effect of fraud can be easily cleared up, if a distinction is made at the outset about the author of the fraud, whether it be the one with whom we are dealing, or a third party. And then, whether the fraud was the cause of the promise or pact, and we would not have entered the contract but for it, or whether it was only incidental to the business, which we would have undertaken anyway, and we were deceived only in the object and its qualities as well as in the value of the latter.

When the fraud was perpetrated by a third party, without the connivance of the man with whom we are directly doing business, and no shortcoming is to be observed in the transaction itself, the agreement will stand; yet from the man who played the trick we will be able to recover what loss we suffered by being deceived. But if a man practised fraud in order to lead me into some agreement with him, my act puts me under no obligation to him. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. II, chap. xxviii.

If the fraud were such as touches a quality of the thing, or the thing itself with which the negotiations are concerned, the pact will be vitiated to such an extent that it will rest entirely with the deceived party, whether to break it off entirely, or to demand compensation for his injury. Matters not concerning the real nature of the business and not expressly mentioned do not nullify an act, even though one of the parties may have had them in mind while the pact was being drawn up. What the law says, if excessive deception has been used about the price of a thing, will be explained below.

9. We must next observe how far fear prevents the acts of men from giving rise to an obligation. There are two kinds of fear which must be carefully differentiated. The one arises from a vice of some characteristic in the person to whom a man is going to obligate himself, or possibly from some malign intent of his, already made sufficiently clear, which makes it more than likely that he will practise some deception. The other denotes the wild terror of the mind, which arises from the threat of a great injury, if we are not willing to make a promise or pact.

Regarding the first kind of fear it seems certain, that if I see a man who has absolutely no scruples about deceiving every person he meets, and who 'finds his pleasure in a broken oath', or if I observe that in the business at hand he is setting a trap for me, I shall be playing the fool if I put any trust in his given word, and lay myself open to his scorn and fraud. For he who rushes into snares with his eyes wide open has sacrificed even pity. Who would give his word to men of such a type as is described by Plautus, Curculio [705 f.]:

CH. I, promised? How? ¹

PH. With your tongue.

CH. With that same tongue I now gainsay it. That was given me by nature for the purpose of speaking, not of losing my property. (R.)

And in his Rudens [1371-4]:

GRIP. 'What mode of proceeding is this? Don't you owe it me? Didn't you promise it me upon your oath?

LENO. I did take oath, and now I'll take an oath, if it is in any way my own pleasure. Oaths were invented for preserving property, not for losing it. [1355] It's according to my own intention what my tongue speaks. (R.)

Or to such men as Polybius, Bk. VI [lvi], describes his fellow Greeks? 'Greek statesmen, if entrusted with a single talent, though 280 protected by ten checking-clerks, as many seals, and twice as many witnesses, yet cannot be induced to keep faith.' (S.)

But whether such a fear or suspicion of deceit renders invalid a pact already made, and frees the person who entertains it from the necessity of fulfilling his part, will appear when we have examined the position of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 11. In this passage he says: 'But the covenants which are made in contract of mutual trust, neither party performing out of hand, if there arise a just suspicion in either of them, are in a state of nature invalid.' This statement cannot be accepted unless, after the pact has been concluded, one of the parties has a just fear that, when he has fulfilled the pact, the other will not do the same. And we mean by a just fear one which is based on clear proofs and arguments; for it is nothing other than a great injury to doubt a man's word without cause, when we have found it trustworthy before. And so even Hobbes himself adds in his notes:

For, except there appear some new cause of fear, either from somewhat done, or some other token of the will not to perform from the other part, it cannot be judged to be a just fear; for the cause which was not sufficient to keep him from making compact must not suffice to authorize the breach of it being made.

In other words, although a man may have a suspicion before entering a pact that the other would deceive him in its fulfilment, yet his entering the pact with such a person shows that he turns his back upon this fear, and announces that it is not enough to prevent his being able to trust the other. For were this not so nothing would have passed between them.

But at first it seems to have been Hobbes' opinion that even without such a fear a pact once entered into may be void. This appears in the first place in his work, On the Body Politic, written in French,¹ where there is no trace of his restriction of fear to that arising after the pact has been made, and then from the following reasons of his [De Corpore Politico, I. ii. 10]:

Because he that performeth first, considering the disposition of men to take advantage of every thing for their benefit, doth but betray himself to the covetousness, or other passion of him with whom he contracteth. [. . .] There is no reason why the one should perform first, if the other be likely not to perform afterwards.

It appears from this that he finds the reason for suspicion in the depravity of all men. On this reasoning the great majority of mankind will be declared unfit for one to enter pacts with; further, all trust will be done away between such as are not subject to the same jurisdiction. For since there can be no absolute certainty of any man's constancy, because most men are markedly prone to wickedness, while in a natural state any man may dispose his affairs² as he sees fit, and since the subject of the fear is the only judge of its force, even an empty suspicion will be enough to break a pact, and so they will be of no advantage outside the boundaries of a state.

It is also too harsh to lay a charge of such wickedness against all men that we find in them, upon the removal of civil law, practically no effective reverence for God, respect for their plighted word, or power of sound reason. For, as a matter of fact, an indelible sense of one's integrity, clearly inherent in the minds of all men, is adducible from the fact that there can scarcely be found a man who would openly acknowledge that he does not stand by his word, and that no one wishes to have it felt that he broke his agreements for other than grave reasons. Nay, when one nation breaks faith with another, it at once throws itself upon the faith of still another nation, and tries to join this other to itself by a treaty and promise of faith, striving to repel by the aid of faith the evil which threatened it because it had broken faith. And so it is fair to presume that a man will do what is just until his evil deeds prove the contrary. Here one can apply the remark of Lucian, The Lover of Lies [xv]: 'You act ridiculously to doubt everything.' (H.)

From all this the following conclusion may be drawn: The fear that men will break faith, based only on the general depravity of man's nature, is not enough to justify refusal to fulfil a pact. And so it was 281^a a silly excuse that the people of Mytilene offered for their having broken their treaty with the Athenians, as given in Thucydides, Bk. III [xii]:

They courted us in time of war only because they were afraid of us, while we acted in the same manner towards them in time of peace; and good faith, which in most cases is made steadfast by good will, was in our case made secure by fear, and it was fear rather than friendship that held us both to the alliance; and whichever of us should soonest gain boldness through a feeling of security was bound to be the first to commit some act of transgression also. (S.)

² [For de ne negotiis read de negotiis.—Tr.]

Even if some vices are discovered in a person that alone should not be a reason, without further ado, for not keeping faith with him. For many vices have no relation to the matter of faith. Thus, although a man may go to great excesses in unchastity, drunkenness, and cruelty, this does not of itself alter his ability to observe all diligence in keeping faith. Suppose, indeed, a man is addicted to such vices as tend to destroy the stability of faith, for instance, there is seen in him a desultory lightness of mind; or a burning desire for riches, a mighty force in the breasts of men; or a lust for power, which is for most men more violent than any other passion; such vices nevertheless form no sufficient reason for any one else refusing to keep his given word with such a person. For it may often happen that a man from some special inclination may injure some other person, and yet live on friendly terms with me. Furthermore, by the very act of making an agreement with a man whose mind I know, I declare that his vices are not enough to prevent me from placing faith in him; and therefore I renounce any exception to him which might have been taken from his character, regarding a refusal to fulfil a pact. For otherwise nothing would have been done, if one of the parties had desired at the outset to make some reservation whereby he could at will render the transaction void. Although it is surely imprudent for a person to make an agreement a second time with a man by whom he has once been deceived without exacting a special security. This is the reason for the proverb current among some peoples: 'Whoever has once deceived me, may the gods destroy him; if he deceive me again, may they destroy me.' Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xxvii, towards the end. Nay, even when, after the signing of the pact, there appears reliable evidence that the man is taking steps to deceive me, it would be the height of folly for me knowingly to expose myself to his knavery. Cicero, On Invention, Bk. I [xxxix]: 'It is the utmost folly to hope for good faith among those whose dishonesty has so often deceived you. And so Menelaus says, in Homer, Iliad, Bk. III [105-6]: 'And call hither great Priam, that he may pledge the oath himself, seeing his sons are overweening and faithless.' (L.) Add Polybius, Bk. VIII, chaps. i-ii; Bk. X, chap. xxxiv. A passage to the point is in Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. I [II. xv]: 'He is the common enemy of all men who has once been the enemy of his own connexions. No wise man ever thought that a traitor was to be trusted.' (Y.) Idem, For Rabirius Postumus [xiii]: 'When any one has once perjured himself he cannot be believed afterwards, not even if he swears by more gods than he did before.' (Y.) Add Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. IV, chap. xxvii, towards the end.

But in this much we do agree: If a man openly confesses that he places no value upon the sacredness of an oath, or if he professes beliefs which necessarily mean the same thing, no confidence should be put in his promises or pacts, except in so far as we can bring force to bear upon him in case he tries to get out of them, or else his own obvious advantage leads him to abide by his agreements. To this class belong atheists, who deny either the existence of God or his divine providence, and to whom those persons who deny the immortality of the soul are closely related. For the only justice these last know is that which is based on advantage, measured by their own judgement. With them you may also class those whose manner of life is an open profession of their villainy, such as pirates, thieves, murderers, pimps, courtesans, and others of their kind who take a pleasure in perjury. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XI [xix]: 'The plot [. . .] was not dishonourable against a deserter, and one who had broken his allegiance.' (R.)

282 But it must be admitted that, although the argument of Hobbes presented above does not destroy all the force of pacts in a natural state, it can still suggest the following rules of prudence: A person should not place great confidence in a covenant unless he sees that the advantage of the other party, no less than his own, depends on its fulfilment, and that, unless the other stands by his agreement, a certain ill and misfortune will befall him, more grievous than any that attends the fulfilment. Likewise, that in making a contract with a superior, he so draw up the terms that not he but the superior be the first to meet them. For if the inferior does his part first, it may happen that he will be deceived, or that he will find himself dependent on the mere good will of the other. And so Socrates the Achaean replied to the demands of Artaxerxes, in Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XIV, chap. xxiv [XIV. xxv]: 'The king deals with us without sense or reason; for that which would have to be taken from us, he demands forthwith to be delivered to him, and that which we are to expect in return, we must seek for as suppliants.' (B.*) Consequently, as Quintilian, Declamations cccxii, says: 'More faith can be put in the word of an equal.'

Likewise, prudence will recognize that a man jeopardizes his own safety if in fulfilling a pact he weakens himself and strengthens the other party in the hope that he will later be aided, according to the terms of the promise, by the latter's strength. For it would be folly to exchange an actual possession for words, writings, and seals, where there is nothing more than the religious regard for one's word to oppose to the avarice and greed of a superior. Andr. Maurocenus, Historia Veneta, Bk. V [p.193]:

I should not dare to place the final security of my property in a league, since such is the nature of confederacies that they can be disturbed and embarrassed by any number of different circumstances. The different ends of the allies too frequently draw their minds and resources in different directions, and the common good is neglected, while each member looks to his own interests. They do not furnish their allotted assistance, nor at the time agreed upon; hence there arise suspicions, enmities, and finally, as a result of these, withdrawals. By withdrawals, finally, the laws of leagues are overturned and cast aside, and in the end those states which can make less resistance than the others have become a prey not only to their foes but even to their allies.

10. Our next task is to examine that fear which follows a direct threat of serious harm, for it seems to require a little more discussion. Now we lay down the general statement, that our will naturally inclines to what appears good to it. And it seems to the will no less good and desirable to avoid a threatened evil than to secure an absent good, and those means are chosen which lead to either end, however undesirable they may otherwise seem in themselves. For means irksome and distasteful in themselves are used no less to secure some good than avoid an evil, although the hope of attaining a good may be more potent than the solicitude to avoid an evil, in lessening the annoyance occasioned by that means. And for this reason Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. III, chap. i, calls those actions mixed, which are undertaken to avoid an evil, an example of which is the old one of throwing goods overboard when shipwreck is threatened. Although no less hardships have been undergone, for instance, by athletes who were in training to win a crown in contests. See Epictetus, Enchiridion, chap. xxxv.

Now although actions undertaken from fear of a greater evil should be classed as voluntary, and the less evil which we choose under such circumstances may really, in our present condition, be the thing we wish, such actions still cannot be the source of any obligation on our part towards another. For since an obligation looks to some person for whom something must be done, and so it implies in him a corresponding right, by reason of which he may compel the fulfilment of the obligation, the creation of such an obligation requires that, in the one, there be such principles as would produce an obligation, and in the other such as warrant his securing a right. Indeed, an obligation is inconceivable without its corresponding right; and I owe nothing, if no one has a right to demand something of me. Therefore, that fear which causes a defect in the other party prevents the rise of an obligation, since the defect makes him incapable of acquiring a right. Such a defect is an injury and an injury can by no means be the cause for the production of something to which it is unalterably opposed. For since the law of nature commands the doing of something to which another person has a right, it seems absurd that an injury, that is, a deed 283 contrary to natural law, can produce something to the firmness of which natural law itself contributes, and so it would work to its own destruction. Surely a law forbidding theft cannot include theft among the proper ways of securing property.

11. But the first point of all to be considered is: Who caused the fear? The man with whom we are transacting our business, or some one else? The next point is, whether or not he had power to use intimidation. For there can be no question about my being obligated, when I bound myself in order to be freed from a fear inspired by a third person without the instigation or collusion of the man to whom the promise was made. For there is no defect in the latter which prevents his acquiring a right against me, and he can properly claim some return for what he did for me, because I used his aid in avoiding a present danger. Thus, if I should agree with a man that he give me his aid against robbers while on a journey, the agreement would surely have to be kept. Nay, a man is guilty of ingratitude as well as perfidy if he entices others to his aid with large promises, when he is in a tight place, and then devises every kind of delay once the danger has been averted by their aid.

But a promise made to a third party is valid if a man was led to make it by the authority and threat of punishment vested in him who had power to command such a promise. For no defect attaches to the person receiving the promise, while the man who preferred to be driven by fear to do what he should have undertaken of his own accord, has only himself to blame. Thus, if some ruler, in order to defend another's realm, wishes to lend his troops to a foreign prince, and for greater security compels them to take an oath to the latter, the soldiers will not be able to break their vow, in the excuse that they did so through fear, since it came from a person who had the right to demand such obedience by whatever means he desired. Likewise, if we assume that a father can give a husband to his daughter even against her will, in case she has given her promise to the hated suitor out of fear of her father's authority, she can by no means later break it. For no defect attaches to the suitor, whereby he cannot secure a right from the promise, while the daughter should have obeyed her father's orders of her own accord.

Up to this point the question concerns the person who occasioned the fear. But in other cases the Roman laws are justified in stating that it is of no concern who caused the fear, provided no one had a right to do so, and the fear was the cause and not the mere occasion of the promise or pact. See Digest, IV. ii. 14, § 3. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, cont. xxvii [IX. iii. 9]:

The question is whether, if there be force and necessity in a matter, everything that is done under compulsion of force and necessity be invalid, if the force and necessity be applied by the contracting party. 'It makes no difference to me', says one party, 'whether you were compelled or not, so long as you are not compelled by me; for me to be punished, the fault must be mine.' 'Not so,' says the other, 'the law is not angry at the one who employs force, but assists the one upon whom force is employed; and it appears unfair in the eyes of the law for that to be legally binding which a man agreed to, not because he so wished, but because he was so compelled. Now it makes no difference who it was that made the agreement necessary. That which renders unjust the contract which is being rescinded is not the person of the agent but the fortune of the recipient.'

Idem, Excerpta Controversiarum, Bk. IV, chap. viii: "The violence did not come from me", he claims, "but from some one else." Yet he who exercises the violence and he who employs for his own advantage the violence exercised by another are equally guilty.'

Now we adjudge those promises and pacts to be invalid which a man is compelled to make by unjust force on the part of the one to whom he makes the promise, or with whom he enters the pact. For since whoever extorts something from another by unjust fear is bound by natural law to restore it, and so must make good whatever loss the other party met through the pact, it is understood that the compensation destroys the obligation, if that is not yet paid which should have been restored at once. See Digest, XLIV. iv. 8. Just as it would be foolish, when a man had got into a safe place, to pay what was promised 284 under duress, and then to want to get back damages for his loss. Martial, Bk. XI, ep. lix [XI. lviii]:

Suppose my barber, steel in hand,
Should liberty and wealth demand;
I yield, of course, for he is then
No barber, but a highwayman.
But when his razor's in its case,
I'd have him flogged till black in the face.

Especially since the man shows quite clearly by his exacting or accepting a promise from me that he had no intention to pay me damages of his own accord.

Furthermore it is idle to seek a right for yourself on the ground that you did not do something for a person which the laws forbade you to do; and equally absurd to claim some return from a man because you did not do something which would have been a heinous sin. And so Cicero, Philippics, II [5], denies that he is indebted to Antony because the latter did not kill him at Brundisium: 'But what sort of kindness is it to have abstained from committing nefarious wickedness? [. . .] Is not this such a kindness as is done by banditti, who are contented with being able to boast that they have granted their lives to all those whose lives they have not taken.' (Y.)¹ Horace, Epistles, Bk. I, ep. xv [I. xvi. 46 ff.]: 'If a slave were to say to me "I never stole or ran away": "You have your reward." I should answer: "You are not flogged." "I never committed murder." "You shall not hang on a cross for the crows to eat." "I am a good and useful servant." One of us Sabellians shakes his head and says, "No, no!"' (W.) Idem, Art of Poetry [267-8]: 'After all I have saved myself from blame, I have not earned praise.' (W.) Digest, II. xiv. 7, § 3. Seneca, Controversies, Bk. II, cont. xiii [V. xii]: 'To refrain from committing a crime is not a benefit.' Quintilian, Declamations, cccxxx: 'I do not count it as a benefaction when a man ceases to do an injury.'

Nor is a man any longer bound who goes surety for another in a case of this kind, even though he does not obligate himself because of his own fear. For since the going of surety is only a kind of additional guarantee of the principal business it would be absurd, at least by natural law, for more efficacy to lie in an accessory than in the principal business, or that the principal debtor should be more loosely obligated than he who promised that he would take up the former's obligation for his assistance. But a different statement must be made, if a third party personally contracts with a robber an obligation, which does not depend upon the obligation of his captive, or takes its place; for instance, when he in pity promises something to the robber, on condition that the latter in return let some prisoner go free. For he is not subjected to unjust fear, nor can he put forward the objections allowed the captive, since he obligated himself not for the captive, but on his own account, and did not base his obligation upon that of the captive, since the latter was under none. Furthermore, it was a noble act, worthy of some sacrifice, to have saved the life of an innocent person, and to have gained for himself so noble a reputation for humanity.

But if a captive has given hostages, or left some of his companions in the power of the robber until his promises are made good, he is obligated not because of his pact with the bandits, but because of his understanding with the hostages. This is the reason for the fact that, in Morocco and other parts of Africa, the Christian captives as a body give their word that no one of them will try to escape, and on this guarantee they are allowed to go about the cities without chains. But if one of them escapes, the rest are constrained to pay the amount of his value. We shall discuss in another place whether such a promise is strengthened by an oath.

In general we agree with the words of Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxix]:

If you should not pay a price for your life, agreed on with robbers, it is no fraud. For a pirate is not comprehended in the number of lawful enemies, but is the common foe of all men. With such a man, neither should faith nor an oath be in common. (E.)

Certainly promises made to such persons need not be fulfilled. But many have no liking for the reason given by Cicero, especially if it be extended also to such promises and pacts as we enter into with such persons although under no compulsion. Now it is true that, by the laws of nations, a lawful enemy is treated in one way, a robber and pirate in another, as may be gathered from the passage of Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. I [29]: 'A war with pirates never ends with articles of peace, nor terminates with libations.' And yet such a person does not for this reason lose at once all the rights of a man, especially when he still treats with some persons after the way of men. For when he makes an agreement with me and does not introduce the consideration of fear, he acts not like a robber but like any other man. 285

Now a robber is called a common enemy because he does not declare war upon any particular person as other enemies do, but threatens with violence any and every person who falls into his hands. For this reason there is no need for a declaration of war, the formation of an army, or a call to arms, to put down such a person, but nature herself allows every man the right to take up arms against him. And yet it can be said that just as enemy status does not save one from having to keep one's word given to an enemy, as Cicero confesses, so this common hostility of a robber does not prevent the necessary fulfilment of pacts once entered into with him, especially when he does not perform any hostile acts upon entering the pact.

Grotius, Bk. III, chap. xix, § 3, advances his objection in this way: 'Such as are notorious malefactors and are members of no state can, if we consider only the law of nature, be punished by any man' (K.) (which theory we shall examine in another connexion). But they who can be punished even with death can likewise be deprived both of their property and of their rights. But among their rights is also to be reckoned that secured by a promise; therefore this also can be taken from them¹ as punishment.

And yet he who voluntarily enters a pact with a robber, whom he knew to be such, is understood to have renounced, for that very reason, such an exception as he might have based upon the person of the robber, and so have opposed the validity of his promise, because otherwise nothing would have passed between them. Therefore, if a robber, upon my being lost, brings me back upon my path for a promised reward, I have no doubt but I should pay it. In the same way, Digest, XVI. iii. 31, § 1, lays it down that a deposit must be returned to a thief, provided the man from whom the thief took it does not put in an appearance, and the holder had no knowledge of the evil calling of his depositor. For if a man knew both that the fellow was a thief, and that the things had been stolen from some one else, I do not see how he could receive such things and yet not be implicated in the crime.

12. But there are still many who contend that a power to obligate lies in promises and pacts which have been extorted by force. Some turn to the authority of the Roman law, which, although it comes to the aid of persons injured by such pacts, in giving them the benefit of a full restoration of their loss, still seems to lay down the principle that, by the letter of the law, there is in such engagements a power to obligate, but that the rigor of the law should be tempered by the equity of the judge. However, the reason for this lies in the Roman laws. For since it is not presumed that violence has been offered to a person living in a commonwealth, and some uncertainty may arise on an exception to this, it was simpler that a pact of this nature be upheld until the allegation of fear could be examined by the judge. Yet it does not follow from this that an intrinsic power of obligating can reside in a pact of this nature as well as in other transactions which can be annulled by a peremptory exception, since such devious exceptions suit the usage of a civil court better than the simplicity of natural law, at least when the matter concerns those who do not recognize a common judge.

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 7, lays it down that 'therefore, by the law of nature, whoever has made a promise in fear is obligated by it, because of the presence of consent and, indeed, absolute consent, in view of the present state of affairs'. (K.) (Since, indeed, 'the dearest thing of all to a man is his soul.' Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. V[26]), even though he would never have given his consent to such a thing had not that evil threatened him. Yet just as every obligation derived from a pact supposes its corresponding right in another, so it is not enough 286 that I have in me the requisites necessary to give rise to an obligation, but there must be no defects in the other person which may interfere with his acquisition of a right. And so the fact that I have the faculty to give something does not mean that at once the other person has the faculty to accept it. Therefore, since an obligation to which there is no corresponding right is void, it is not to be believed that an obligation arises from my mere consent when the law of nature forbids the other party to accept it. And that is absolutely true in this case. For the same law which forbids one to strike fear into another, also prohibits his acquiring a right or making a profit from that fear.

But what Grotius adds does not suit the case:

If the person to whom the promise is made has inspired a fear, even though slight, and the promise has resulted therefrom, he is bound to release the promissor, if the latter so wishes, not because the promise was without force, but on account of the damage wrongfully caused. (K.)

Yet if I can be freed from an obligation at my pleasure, without the performance of anything, I am already actually free. What, then, is the use of such a nicety as, 'You should free me from an obligation, if I myself ask it'? We may the rather say: 'Because you forced me to make a promise, I owe you nothing, and it is idle for you to exact something from me which you are bound to restore just as soon as I have complied with the demand.' Add Seneca, Controversies, Bk. IV, chap. xxvi.

13. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 16, defends this position with different arguments. He says:

Compacts extorted through fear are not of none effect because they proceed from fear. For then it would follow that those promises which reduced men to a civil life, and by which laws were made, might likewise be of none effect (for it proceeds from fear of mutual slaughter that one man submits himself to the dominion of another); and he should play the fool finely who should trust his captive covenanting with the price of his redemption.

But in the first point there is an ambiguity in the word 'fear'. For the fear which causes men to band together into states is clearly different from the one we are now discussing. The former is a safeguard against some evil which can befall one at any time, while the latter is terror that arises from some serious present and threatened evil, and one which I have not strength enough myself to repel. Therefore, there is a great difference between pacts which we make in order to secure mutual help, so that we may not be overcome singly by a common enemy, and those in which we promise something in order that we may escape an evil, with which another man unjustly threatens us.

Regarding the second point, we fully agree that a thief would act like a fool if he extorted a promise by an injury, and then took a man's word as if the matter had been done legally. For nothing prevents the same man being both a villain and a fool, as Menander says, in Stobaeus, Anthology [III. ii. 6]: 'Wickedness is an unreasonable thing.' Nay, I should, on the contrary, say that the man who had escaped from some danger unjustly brought upon him, and had then of his own accord handed over to the robber the reward of his villainy, would surely be acting without a show of reason. A case in point is given by Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. VIII [xxxvii]: 'Since all treaties, both public and private, that are entered into through necessity [. . .] are soon dissolved when the [. . .] necessity ceases.' (S.)

Hobbes continues: 'It holds universally true that promises do oblige, when there is some benefit received, and when the promise, and the thing promised, be lawful. But it is lawful, for the redemption of my life, both to promise and to give what I will of mine own to any man, even to a thief.' But surely what a robber does for a traveller in not injuring him by taking his life cannot be called a good. It is absurd to treat non-performance of an injury to a man as a good, for we can only be said to have conferred a good upon a man, when we have given him a good which he did not have before, or preserved a present one, or when we have repelled an evil which threatened him through no fault of ours. Thus it was a foolish excuse advanced by Polycrates for his preying upon friends and foes alike, in Herodotus, Bk. III [xxxix]: 'A friend was better pleased if you gave him back what you had taken from him, than if you spared him at the first.' (R.)

In the next place Hobbes' conclusion is not justified, to wit: It is 287 lawful for me to promise and give something to a thief; therefore, he has the right to require it, or therefore, I am bound by some inner compulsion to perform it. We can do many things lawfully to which no obligation binds us. I can throw away my property lawfully, but I am not obligated by another to do so. And so the rule which the same writer lays down in his Leviathan, chap. xiv, is false: 'Whatsoever I may lawfully do without obligation, the same I may lawfully covenant to do through fear: and what I lawfully covenant, I cannot lawfully break.' For he should have added: 'provided the other can fairly require it.'

14. One further question must be raised in this connexion: Since promises occasioned by error or fear are invalid, how may those promises regain their force, in case a man wishes to stand by his words after the error or fear have been removed? For what was at first invalid may later regain its force, if some new cause is added which has the power of itself to generate a right which, in the present case, is a clear and voluntary consent. Therefore, some say that in order to confirm such a promise all that is required is an internal act of the mind, or a clear and free consent to that promise, even if it is not expressed by any sign, inasmuch as the external sign of agreement has already been given. That therefore, since the intrinsic determination is now clearly and willingly given, every requirement for the production of an obligation has been met. Others do not agree with this, on the ground that the internal consent and the external act should coincide in time, and that therefore a previous external act cannot be the sign of a subsequent internal act, which perhaps had not been considered beforehand. Therefore, for such a promise to be binding, they require the verbal pronouncement of a new promise and its acceptance.

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 20, takes a middle position, that signs are absolutely necessary to show subsequent internal consent, because otherwise the other party could not be certain of his right. But they do not need to be shown by words, because other signs can be sufficient in such a case. Thus a promisor, after recognizing his error and putting away his fear, may willingly perform his part, or may raise no objection¹ about what he has already done, when he might easily have done so, or he may afterwards treat with the other party about the matter, as if the latter rightfully had it. To this opinion we also give our assent.

15. But the further point should be made that, for a promise to be valid, there is required the consent, not only of the one who makes the promise, but of him to whom it is made (Digest, XXXIX. v. 19, § 2), and that it be expressed by sufficient signs, in which case a nod may be enough, if something is offered voluntarily, or has been requested beforehand. For when the other party has not given his consent, or has refused to receive the offered promise, the thing so promised remains in the power of the promissor, even if the agreement has been fortified with an oath, for an oath does not transfer a right before acceptance, but has the sole effect that I cannot withdraw an offer before his refusal is established. Now whoever offers his property to another wishes neither to thrust it upon him against his will, nor to throw it away recklessly. Therefore, if the other has refused acceptance, the promissor has lost none of his right over the thing offered. But if a request passed between them beforehand, it will be understood to stand until it has been expressly recalled, and in this case the acceptance is understood to have been made beforehand, provided the thing offered corresponds to the request. For if a man returns a smaller sum than the other party requests, an express acceptance is required, since in giving a smaller sum his interest has not been consulted; at any rate he will be responsible only for the sum which passes between them. In this connexion the remark of Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. IX, chap. xiii, should be noted: 'The challenger's word is decisive, for the challenger proposed the conditions, and when they were accepted, the other party had no power to make additions.' (G.) 288

The reason is that only so much right can be acquired by the receiver of a promise, as the promissor agreed to. But if the promissor merely gives his nod to the request of the others, it will be understood that the request has been tacitly repeated in making the promise. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xvi, § 32.

To the passage, Digest, L. xii. 3, from which some have concluded that the mere act of the promissor is enough to make a promise valid, Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 14, replies that the promise once made is not to be recalled, so that it may always be accepted, but not that the obligation is contracted before the acceptance. But it appears to those who examine the passage more closely that Ulpian teaches that a pact is an agreement or convention of two parties, that is, a reciprocal promise, while a promise is an act only of the person who makes it, although this does not deny that the latter may finally become binding by acceptance. And, indeed, the state has already signified its acceptance in advance, if the promise were made for honours sought or accepted, but has refused what was proffered without reason. See Digest, XXXIX. v. 1, § 1; Ibid., 19. But in Digest, XXXIX. v. 3, § 1, it is not allowed to claim things given without cause, because a gift could not be made without acceptance, and so because the actual possession of the thing had already been transferred to the community.

Now since any and all obligations require in the person whom they concern, or who secures a right by them, his consent to accept the obligation of the other party, and to the right thereby transferred, which consent may be given either personally or through a representative, and is expressed by signs that show his mind, it is clear what view is to be held on the firmness of vows or obligations voluntarily undertaken with regard to God. Certainly they cannot be undertaken with any force, unless either God Himself has shown by revelation that He will accept them, or else there is some one to stand in His place among men and judge of their force. For otherwise a man cannot know whether or not God wishes to be obligated, or whether or not it is His pleasure that the vow be kept. Especially is this true since vows should be made about matters which God has not demanded before of us, at least definitely, through some commandment. Were this not so, it means that you would impute an act to a person as voluntary, which was in fact necessary and required, and we cannot know, except by divine revelation, whether an act not prescribed by God will be pleasing to Him. Surely it is useless to undertake vows when it is not known whether they will be pleasing to God.

But will it not be possible to assume God's consent and approval? We feel that this is possible only in such things as agree indefinitely with natural law and so with the divine will, while their application to persons, place and time, and their limitation in degree, have been left to the judgement and decision of men. And so we hold that those vows should be kept whereby a man obligates himself to give a certain amount of money to the poor, or for pious causes, provided that by such a gift other necessary duties are not interfered with; whereby he sets for himself certain days of fasting, or abstinence from a particular food or drink, at least within certain limits; whereby he forbids himself the wearing of certain unnecessary ornaments, such as pearls, precious stones, and gold. These and similar abnegations carry some virtue, although their exact determination is not laid down in any precept. But we feel that those vows are foolish which give only trouble to the one who makes them, and are of no advantage to other men, and all the more so if they interfere with other duties.

Another question in this connexion is, whether an obligation commences for the promissor at the very moment when the acceptance has been made, or only when he receives word that it has been made. It appears certain that a promise can be conceived in two ways: either, 289 I wish the promise to be binding, if it is accepted; or, I wish it to be binding, if I understand that it has been accepted. In case of doubt it must be gathered from the nature of the undertaking, which sense the promissor had in mind. The former sense is more to be presumed in a generally liberal and pure promise, because in such the promissor seems, as it were, to hasten to obligate himself; the latter in a promise to which has been added an arbitrary or mixed condition. Cf. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 15.

16. It remains for us to make some concluding remarks on the signs by which consent is expressed; which, indeed, are necessary in order to make an obligation, since acts of the will, so long as they are not manifested by signs, can have no effect among men. The more imperfect signs are gestures which must be used in business between men who do not know the other's language¹; the more perfect are words, understood by both parties. See I Corinthians, xiv. 11. I say 'understood by both parties'. This is probably the reason why the Turks do not hold themselves bound by pacts and treaties which are couched in any other language and characters than their own. See Marselaer, Legatus, Bk. I, chap. xxx.

That words may show the will more clearly and firmly it has been a common practice, first, that for more important pacts witnessess be called in, to whose memory and conscience appeal might be made, in case the pact be denied by either of the parties, or in case some question arises as to its terms; second, and most frequently, that the terms of the pact be put down in writing, for which written agreements the Greeks sometimes used tallies or σύμβολα. For the memory even of a number of men may be treacherous, or their faith corruptible, while what is written is not so open to forgetfulness or perfidy. Moreover, mere words are often gainsaid by the plea that they were spoken in haste, or before the matter was rightly understood. But written documents preclude such a claim, for while they are being drawn up, they present the matter clearly enough to the mind of the signer, allowing him as well some time, so that if he has approved it, he must be held to have given so complete an agreement to the matter that he may afterwards offer no plea based upon passion or haste. Nor can writings be so easily twisted by subtle interpretations as can words of the mouth, in which a single phrase, dexterously inserted and unnoticed in rapid pronunciation, can change the whole thought; to this shortcoming written documents are by no means so much exposed. And so it is proper that more trust be put in authentic documents, not vitiated with any defect, than in the evidence of witnesses, since a man's testimony against himself is more strong than that of another person, and the gravest evidence is brought against the man who cannot deny his very own authority. Yet the fullest hearing should be given the more important witnesses if they can show probability that the document is forged, supposititious, or corrupted.

Although the firmness of pacts does not depend entirely on writings or instruments of this sort, since² they are legally contracted even without such (Digest, XXII. iv. 5), and may hold good so far as the law of nature is concerned, although the documents themselves may by some chance have perished (Digest, XXII. iv. 1, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10; Code, IV. xix. 20, 21); yet before a civil judge, where cognizance is given only to most clear signs, these instruments are accorded the greatest consideration. And where they cannot be produced, the plaintiff as a rule loses his case, unless he has adduced sufficient proof that it was by some accident he had lost them. Therefore, it becomes a careful man to conduct his business with written agreements rather than on mere faith. Thus, according to Plutarch, On False Modesty [x, p. 533 B], when Persaeus once made a loan to a friend, he required that he be protected by the form customary in court. His friend remarked upon his care and inquired the reason for the legal form. 'That I may get it back', replied Persaeus, 'as from a friend, and not demand it in legal form.' Juvenal, Satires, XIII [75-6]: 'So easy and so natural is it to despise the gods above, that witness all, if no mortal man attest the same!' (E.)

According to Appian of Alexandria, Mithridatic Wars [ix. 64], when Murena made war upon Mithridates and the ambassadors of the king appealed to their treaty, he said that he had never seen any treaty: 'For Sulla had not written it out, but had gone away after the terms had been fulfilled by acts.' (W.) But, by way of contrast, Christophe Richerius relates of the custom of the Turks: 'They show such steadfastness in their spoken word, and place such confidence in the faith of their countrymen, that in their agreements they never use any document, seal, or signature, but all their business stands upon the word of the promissor, or upon the mere mention of the name of the party to the agreement.' A similar account is given of the Peruvians by Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VIII, chap. xvi.

It follows also from the value of a written agreement that if a creditor knowingly destroys it with the knowledge of the debtor, he is understood to have cancelled the debt. But the debtor will not be freed from his obligation if, in some way or other, he gets his hand on the contract, whether by stealing it or securing it in some other way. From this it is clear that Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. x, is far from right in calling 'promissory notes [. . .] empty phantoms of property'. (S.)

CHAPTER VII

ON THE SUBJECT-MATTER OF PROMISES AND PACTS

| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. We are obligated only to such things as are possible. 2. Promises about impossible things are void. 3. Impossibility arising in pacts. 4. Nor his own, if they are already obligated to another. |

WE must now examine the subject-matter of promises and pacts, that is, things to which our promises and pacts can obligate us. Now to obligate ourselves it is required that we have the moral and physical faculty to perform some thing or action, in other words, that the performance is not beyond our strength and no law forbids it. For when a thing is placed within my strength, and the faculty is left me of reaching a decision about it, there is nothing to prevent my voluntarily laying a necessity upon myself of doing it, when it is called for by the needs and uses of human life. On the other hand, it is useless to contract an obligation about matters which exceed our strength, or cannot be met by reason of a stronger obligation, since it would be without any direct and legitimate effect.

2. It follows from the foregoing that there can be no obligation to impossible things—a statement bandied about often enough, but requiring a more accurate examination. At the outset a distinction should be drawn between obligations which we undertake of our own accord, and those which are laid upon us by the authority of another. When a man is willing to obligate himself to something impossible, and knows that it is such, he is unquestionably lacking in wit. For he wishes to do something which he realizes beforehand he cannot do.

Yet a man who undertakes by a promise or pact what is impossible is not always clear of all necessity of fulfilment, even though he cannot do the thing agreed upon. Indeed, if I have promised¹ another something, which I thought would be² within my ability, but, for some reason which I cannot control, I am unaware that it is now beyond my strength, or will be before the time of fulfilment, it appears that I am not bound to the matter promised, nor to make good the loss of the other party, especially when this difficulty has been expressly mentioned, or this condition is tacitly understood by both parties. See Digest, II. xi. 2, § 3 ff. For instance, if I promised to lend a man a horse which is in another place, and it dies on the road, I am not bound to produce the horse or to make good the man's loss. For it is understood that I tacitly based my promise on the condition: 'Provided the horse comes safely home.' Since this condition failed, due to no fault of mine, the force of my promise is entirely lost. But if both the promissor and the man promised knew that the thing was impossible, and each knew that the other knew, it must be concluded that they were only jesting, and that nothing really passed between them. But if only the promissor knew that the thing was impossible, while the other did not, the former will have to make good the latter's loss in being thus made sport of. But when the promissor has been too careless in measuring his own strength, and has promised something now impossible for him to perform, which he might have known was such, had he used due foresight, the obligation will be void, because the promissor supposed the possibility as a tacit condition. Yet because of his carelessness and responsibility, he will have to compensate the other party for the loss caused him by his empty promise, although the hope of profit and gain based on the empty promise is not to be reckoned in the loss. The same principle applies also to pacts. In case a man through negligence has agreed to an impossible thing, he may be freed from his obligation by making good the consequent loss suffered by the other party, while the latter shall be freed from that to which he obligated himself, or, if he has already performed it, he shall have restored to him what he gave, or else be given its equivalent.

3. When the thing was possible of fulfilment at the time when the promise or pact was undertaken, but later became impossible, it must be decided¹ whether this is due to mere chance and no one's fault, or to some one's fault and bad faith. In the former case the pact is void, when the matter is not as yet undertaken. But when something has been done by one of the parties, it must be restored or its equivalent rendered. If not even this can be done, the utmost endeavour must be made to keep the other party from suffering any loss. For in pacts we rivet our attention on what has been expressly agreed upon; when we cannot obtain this, it is sufficient to give its equivalent; but in any case every precaution must be taken not to experience any loss. But when a man himself in bad faith takes away his own power of fulfilment, he is bound to use his utmost endeavour, and may also be punished by way of supplement, as it were.

By these principles the questions that concern insolvent debtors

are to be settled. When they cannot meet their debts by mere chance, and for no fault of their own, they should show the utmost endeavour to pay. But equity and humanity require some amount of time to be allowed them to explore and prepare means of meeting their debts. See Matthew, xviii. 25-6. Surely it would be criminal to strip such persons of all their property and to reduce them to beggary. The Roman law, indeed, so favoured such persons in general that it allowed them to be fined 'only what they can pay'. See Digest, XXIV. iii. 12; Digest, XLII. i. 6, 16-21; Ibid., 49, 50; Digest, XLII. iii. 4, 6, 7. Yet unless the creditor has cancelled whatever exceeds their present ability to pay, they will be required to pay the balance when they get in better circumstances. But anybody who has turned bankrupt through trickery or through his own fault can be restrained by some punishment, and in his case the old rule still holds good: 'Let him who cannot pay in money pay in his person.' See Gellius, Bk. XX, chap. i, towards the end; also the remarks attributed to Appian in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. V [lxvi]; add, however, Livy, Bk. VIII, chap. xxviii. 292

The further point must be considered, in this connexion, as to what cause or necessity made the man contract the debt, for the favour and pity accorded an insolvent debtor is increased or decreased, according as his necessity was greater or less. So harder terms are rightly laid upon merchants, even though they have become insolvent by mere chance than upon others who were forced to go into debt because of some special necessity. For it was a desire for profit that induced the former to contract debts. And since they openly profess the art of growing rich, they are scarcely to be exonerated if they did not guard against ill fortune; if, for instance, they put all their fortune in a single venture. This is opposed to the advice of Pliny, Letters, Bk. III, ep. xix: 'To distribute one's possessions about seems a safer way of meeting the caprices of fortune.' (B.) And Justin, Bk. IX, chap. i, tells us that while Philip was conducting his unsuccessful siege of Byzantium, he sent a predatory expedition into Thrace, following his rule of meeting the expenses of one war by another. Livy, Bk. [XL], chap. xxi:

Antigonus tossed about by a violent storm, when he had all his family in the same ship with him, was said to have advised his sons to remember, and hand down to their children this maxim: 'Never to have the hardihood to rush into danger themselves and their whole family together.' (M.)

Yet it appears that the early settlers of Rome gave little attention to these distinctions. For Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. xvi, says:

Do you suppose that our ancestors were so foolish as not to understand that it is most unjust that the man who has wasted the money which he received from his creditor on debauchery, or gambling, should be classed with one who has lost his own property, as well as that of others in a fire, by robbery, or some sadder mischance? They would take no excuse, that men might understand that they were always bound to keep their word; it was thought better that even a good excuse should not be accepted from a few persons than that all men should be led to try to make excuses. (S.)

Thus, among the Muscovites, insolvent debtors are first given no mere perfunctory flogging, and then are forced to become slaves of their creditors.

4. At this point we must examine the assertion of Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 14—too sweeping a one, obviously: 'Covenants oblige us not to perform just the thing itself covenanted for, but our utmost endeavour.' That is, since we are not obligated to the impossible, and nothing beyond our utmost endeavour is within our power, what we cannot achieve is impossible for us, and therefore beyond any obligation on our part. But he should have added, 'provided we have not by our own fault or trickery reduced our power of fulfilment.' For if we have done so, our obligation is not met by utmost endeavour, but at the point where our fulfilment ceases we are made liable to receive punishment for the deficit.

The statement of Hobbes apparently is proper only in those pacts where we promise some future service of ours, in exchange for something already received, or some present service, since the obligation of such pacts is met by utmost endeavour. For since future eventualities are so far beyond the power of man to perceive, that either our strength may be weakened by some chance happening, or else events may so shape themselves that the opportunity to do them may be lost entirely or rendered more difficult; and since, furthermore, the judgement of men is often apt to err in the estimation of their own strength and of a difficulty, those who enter such pacts are understood to be mindful of human limitations, and therefore, in agreeing to future actions or services, to have added the tacit condition: 'Provided my strength and the opportunity remain the same, or provided I have not rated too highly my present strength.' In such cases it is proper to say that a man who has done the best he could has met his duty, especially when in the act of fulfilment something not dependent on our strength interposes to prevent or distort the effect.

That the assertion of Hobbes holds good only for this kind of pacts is clear from the arguments which he himself adds. He says:

But yet, though we often covenant to do such things as then seemed possible when we promised them, which yet afterwards appeared to be impossible; (it is supposed, of course, that we had had no opportunity to try our strength on them) are we not therefore freed from all obligation. The reason whereof is, that he who promiseth a future, in certainty receives a present benefit, on condition that he return another for it. For his will, who performs the present benefit, hath simply before it for its object a certain good, equally valuable with the thing promised; but the thing itself not simply, but with condition if it could be done.

But I would rather say that he who bestows a present good upon a person has as his direct purpose the securing of the future good which was expressed in the pact, and that this applies in an agreement of giving as well as in one of doing. For the distinction which some allege is apparently not founded on natural law, namely, that by agreements of giving a man is obligated precisely to giving, but by agreements of doing he is obligated not precisely to doing, but may be freed by some substitution. When the thing agreed upon cannot be done, to avoid loss he is willing that its equivalent be forthcoming. But if even this cannot be done, and the matter which is already furnished does not admit of substitution, a man will satisfy his obligation if he does as much as his strength permits.

But in contracts of loan and others of the same nature, it is not true that a debtor can be cleared of an obligation by utmost endeavour. For when a loan is secured, and especially under stress of no extreme necessity, the creditor naturally supposes that the debtor is willing and able to pay, the debtor pretends as much, and the contract is entered into on that assumption. But if at the time for settlement the full amount is not to be found in the estate of the debtor it is, of course, impossible to wring any more out of him, but the obligation to make up the balance in the future still holds. See Matthew, xviii [25 ff.].

But in simple promises whereby we engage to do something, the fulfilment of which is not entirely within our power, the following restrictions should always be understood: 'If fortune smiles upon me'; 'Provided some opposing force does not intervene'; or, what better befits pious Christians, 'If it be God's will.' See James, iv. 15. Yet to take a firm oath on such uncertain matters in the future is a thing of great boldness and wicked presumption. An instance of such an oath is that of Labienus and the other followers of Pompey, given by Caesar, Civil Wars, Bk. III [lxxxvii. 6], who had sworn that 'they would not return to camp except as victors'. Add Acts, xxiii. 21; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. IV, chap. vii.

5. There is another thorny question to be decided in this connexion which Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 18, raises. It is, Whether a man can obligate himself by a pact to undergo ills which surpass the general endurance of mankind; for example, 'Can a man obligate himself by a pact not to resist him who shall offer to kill or wound him?'¹ It is clear to one who examines the matter with some attention, with what purpose in view the question is answered in the negative; to show, namely, that the security of men is not sufficiently safeguarded by pacts alone, and that it is not enough for a man to obligate himself by a pact that he will voluntarily undergo punishment, if he has done an injury; but that in order to preserve peace between men, it is necessary to have authorities established which may bring the guilty to punishment even against their will. This is certainly true, and will be discussed at length in another place.

But it may be worth while to consider Hobbes' arguments a little more closely. He says:

294 No man is obliged by any contracts whatsoever not to resist him who shall offer to kill, wound, or in any other way hurt his body. For there is in every man a certain high degree of fear, through which he apprehends that evil which is done to him to be the greatest; and therefore by natural necessity he shuns it all he can, and it is supposed that he can do no otherwise. When a man is arrived to this degree of fear, we cannot expect but he will provide for himself by flight or fight. Since therefore no man is tied to impossibilities they who are threatened either with death [. . .] or wounds, or some other bodily hurts, and are not stout enough to bear them, are not obliged to endure them.

On these words the observation may be made, that it does not seem to be a thing beyond the endurance of man to meet death steadfastly. Therefore, if God commands that a man die rather than do some particular thing, there is no doubt but he is obligated to do so. Yet we readily grant this much, that since such a thing is beyond the endurance of most¹ men, it is not presumed that a man wished to bind himself, by a pact of his own, to any such thing. Since, of course, human laws should be framed, and pacts entered into, with the same due appreciation of human weakness.

Yet this conclusion should by no means be carried so far as to destroy the force of military discipline, so that a soldier could be justified in deserting his post, upon seeing some present danger threaten his life, on the plea that he is not bound to face death, that being an impossible thing. For we deny that to face a probable risk of death, especially when joined with the power of resisting to the last, is beyond man's endurance, at least such as is found in soldiers. And I believe that there is scarcely an instance in war when men are forced to put themselves at the mercy of the enemy, without the power to resist and to combine craft and courage. And so it appears from the end of preserving states, and from the usage of all nations, that if the situation requires it a commander has a full right to order a soldier to take a certain position and oppose the enemy to his last breath, even though it happens that he must die in his tracks, while the cowardice of those who desert their posts may as rightfully be punished with death. For whoever enlists for military service lays aside the excuse of natural timidity, and obligates himself not only to enter the battle, but also not to retreat without orders from his commander. Nor, indeed, is it an illogical kind of punishment 'to kill you because you were unwilling to be killed'. For it is worse to be slain ignominiously by an executioner than to perish at the hands of the foe with glory, like a hero. Add Digest, XXIX. v. 1, § 28. It should be added, that if a man is by temperament so feeble in spirit that he faints under those things which are within the endurance of men in general, the defect of his spirit does by no means release him from his obligation.

Hobbes continues: 'Since he that is tied by contract is trusted [. . .] but they who are brought to punishment [. . .] are fettered or strongly guarded, that is a most certain sign that they seemed not sufficiently bound from non-resistance by their contracts.' In the case given that is true, although at times even those who are bound by actual pacts are so far from being trusted entirely that armed guards also are placed about them as a precaution to restrain their perfidy. The lines of Seneca, Thyestes [643 f.], are to the point:

The citadel sways the town and holds in check
The common rabble when it scorns the throne. (M.*)

He adds: 'A pact of this kind would be useless. Although contracts are frequently entered into to this effect: if I do it not at the day appointed, kill me'; that is, you will have the right to inflict capital punishment upon me, if I do not do it. 'But such a promise as this: if I do it not, though you should offer to kill me, I will not resist, is unusual and not needful.'¹ This he proves in the following manner. Such an agreement is entered into between a state and a citizen, or between citizens of the same state, or between two men living in natural liberty. For a state to make such an agreement with a citizen is useless; since it is enough for it to have the power to punish wrongdoers, if the individual citizens pledge their faith that they will not undertake to defend any man on whom punishment should be inflicted. Citizens are unable to make such an agreement with one another, since the right of capital punishment cannot, in states, be accorded a private citizen. Useless also, for those who live in natural liberty, is such a pact; for if the parties agreed that one of them would be killed upon non-performance, it is understood that another pact preceded this one, to the effect that he would not be killed before an appointed day. For, 295 according to Hobbes' own hypothesis, every man in a state of nature has the right, before the making of a pact, to kill any other. Therefore, on that day, upon non-performance, there returns the right of war or of a hostile status when any man may do any thing to another, and in this way there will also return the right of resistance.

But I should prefer to state the case thus: The utmost force of pacts amounts to this, that they not only adduce an intrinsic necessity of fulfilling the agreements, but they also give to each party the right to compel the other by force, in case he refuses, with the threat of some evil. That therefore pacts are resolved into these terms: 'I agree that I will do this for you; if I do it not, you shall have the power to compel me by force and threat of evil.' That it is useless and absurd to add to this pact another about not resisting a man when he threatens that evil, for this again would have to be sanctioned by another pact specifying the punishment, such as: 'If I resist your proceeding to force, then you will have the power to punish me with some evil.' So it is obvious that nothing has been added to the first pact by the second, for the first already gave permission to punish the violator of the pact, and the second pact is as easily broken as the first. What need is there, then, of securing one pact by a second, when it is no more difficult to break ten than it is to break one?

Hobbes adds by way of conclusion:

Lastly, by the contract of not resisting, we are obliged, of two evils, to make choice of that which seems the greater. For certain death is a greater evil than fighting. But of two evils it is impossible not to choose the least. By such a compact, therefore, we should be tied to impossibilities; which is contrary to the very nature of compacts.

Now, truly, his rule about choosing the lesser evil needs a careful explanation. For it properly applies only in the comparison of two unprofitable evils as such, that is, such as cause a loss, in which case there appears some advantage in being able to come off with only a part of an unavoidable loss. But the rule should on no account be extended to a comparison of two wicked evils, or of two evils of which the one is wicked and the other unprofitable. For of two evils of commission neither should be chosen.

But it sometimes happens that two affirmative commands¹ cannot be satisfied, the non-performance of which, considered separately, is connected with a sin, but when taken together the non-performance of one of which is held lawful. In this case, then, of two evils of omission the less is to be chosen, or rather the concurrence with the other more noble precept shows that in such a case the omission of the baser precept is not a sin. And this, because subordinate laws are always understood to contain this limitation: In so far as they can be met without prejudice to the higher law. For example, disobedience to God and disobedience to the civil power are each, considered separately, a sin. But in case it is impossible to satisfy both, if, for instance, the civil power commands something contrary to the divine law, disobedience to the civil law ceases to be an evil, because the law about showing obedience to a civil power is understood to carry this limitation, provided nothing is commanded contrary to divine law. In the same way it is possible to choose to carry into execution what is another's sin, or to co-operate in it as the instrument, in preference to some great evil which may bring loss or injury, as will be shown more fully in another connexion.

Nor is it possible to compare a troublesome or loss-producing evil with a sin, and to choose the latter instead of the former, as that a man may prefer to commit a sin rather than lose some profit or sustain a loss, however much his judgement, corrupted by wicked desire, may feel that the former is a lesser evil than the latter. For, if this were possible, the efficacy of obligations would depend upon each man's judgement, and would, as a result, completely vanish, if I were not obligated to perform a thing, the non-fulfilment of which is by some external regard made to seem more desirable than its fulfilment. Thus it would be no excuse for a thief if he should say that his judgement had decided it was a greater evil to make his living by labour than by laying his hands on the property of others. Nay, in such cases, obligations exert their greatest force, in that because of them there arises an intrinsic necessity to do something from which our inclinations and desires alone would shrink. 296

6. That an obligation may arise from a promise or pact it is further required that there lie within us a moral faculty to fulfil the matter which is the object of the agreement. In the defect of this faculty it is not within our power to obligate ourselves to a thing illegal in itself. For every promise draws its strength from the power of the promissor, and extends no farther; that is, no man can validly bind himself beyond his power. Now, when the law forbids an action, it takes away the power of undertaking it and of assuming an obligation to perform it. For the complication arises, that something should necessarily be done on an obligation arising from laws which, by the same laws, should be avoided. And our will, subject itself to laws, cannot escape their¹ power by its own act. Therefore, a man sins who promises what is unlawful; but that man sins twice who proceeds to its performance. Add Digest, XXVIII. vii. 15; Ibid., XLV. i. 35, § 1; Ibid., XLV. i. 123.

From this the further point follows, that promises which will prove hurtful for the person to whom they are made should not be kept, for a general precept of natural law forbids a man willingly and consciously to do another an evil, even though in his stupidity he desires it. Moreover, from the fact that a valid obligation cannot be contracted regarding unlawful things, it follows that acts which are undertaken contrary to laws are regularly invalid by that very law, or have been declared to be so on the previous declaration of the magistrate. Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. v, chap. 7. Although sometimes, when an act is undertaken against the laws, a fine is placed on those who undertake it, but the act itself is not rendered null, since a greater misconduct is to be seen in the act than in its effects, and often the inconveniences which attend the disannulment are greater than those of the act itself, if it is left valid. Thus in Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautic Expedition, Bk. IV [1106-9],

Alcinous, on being chosen arbiter between the Colchians and the Argonauts, gives as his decision: If Jason has not taken Medea to wife, she should be restored to her father; if he has, she should remain in the hands of Jason. The same story is told in Hyginus, Fables, xxiii; Apollodorus, Library, Bk. I [25]; Orpheus, Argonautica [1321 ff.].

7. But it is possible in this connexion to inquire a little more closely as to whether, in the first place, an obligation to do something wrong is valid, while the matter is still untouched, and nothing has been performed. On this point it is certain that an obligation from such a wicked agreement does not exist on either side, but that each party should withdraw from it. Seneca, Hercules Oetaeus [480-1]:

I can give pledge of faith, if it be free
From sin; for sometimes faith itself is sin. (M.)

Add Digest, XLV. i. 26, 27. And so, in case a man hire an assassin to commit some murder, and the assassin repent and refuse to undertake the task, he cannot be compelled by his employer to fulfil the pact. On the other hand, if the hirer repents and tells the assassin not to commit the murder, the latter cannot force the former to carry out the arrangement, so that he may have an opportunity to secure the price of his bargain. Nor will he be able to demand his reward of his hirer on the ground that the latter is to blame for the nefarious deed not being carried out. Furthermore, if, after the arrangement has been recalled, the murderer still persists in committing the murder, the hirer will not be held for the deed, but will be condemned only to the extent that he agreed to the murder, and then repented before it was executed.

297 Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 9, decides that a promise or reward offered, for example, for committing a murder is void, because it is done to incite a man to an evil deed. An example of the breaking of such a pact is in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. III [xxiv], where Apollonius promised some pirates that he would deliver into their hands a richly laden merchant vessel, and then tricked them by taking it over another course.

8. The second inquiry is whether after a man has committed a crime in accordance with an obligation, the other party is bound to pay the price agreed upon. Grotius, loc. cit., asserts that he is, on the ground that, although before the commission of the crime the reward has a blemish, because it is an incentive to the wrong, yet after the crime has been accomplished, the blemish is removed, because it has ceased to be an incentive to the wrong. But we take a different view of the matter. For instead of such a pact ceasing to be wrong upon the accomplishment of the villainy, it has rather attained a higher degree of baseness when it has achieved its end. Unless, perchance, it be less evil to steal than to plan a robbery, to receive the reward for a crime than to hope for its accomplishment, to pay the reward than to promise it. Nay, if a promise is wicked, because it is an incentive to evil, the fulfilment of a promise will also be wicked, because it is the payment for a piece of villainy and an invitation to undertake more. Therefore, some blemish is also judged to attach to such a payment, even when it passes by just title into the hands of a third party, since it was earned by a crime. Thus the divine law forbids that money secured by prostitution be brought into the house of God. Deuteronomy, xxiii. 18; Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. IV, chap. viii. And religious scruples made the priests consider the reward offered for the betrayal by Judas, tainted money, and prevented them from turning it into the sacred treasury. It is also a well-known saying that the third generation gets no enjoyment from ill-gotten wealth.

Therefore we cannot give our approval to the following statement of Grotius, loc. cit.: 'Up to the time of the fulfilment of a crime the effectiveness of a base promise is in suspense, as is the case with the effectiveness of conditional promises,' during the time the condition exists, or as in the case of the promise of a thing, which is impossible for the moment, but, it is hoped, will be possible after a while, when it shall have come within our power. 'But when the crime has been committed, the force of the obligation which from the beginning was not intrinsically lacking (for the consent was mutual), but was restrained by the accompanying wrong, is revealed,' (K.*) namely, that it contributed in a way to the performance of the wrong. But if this be allowed, the prohibition of natural law upon entering pacts that have to do with illegal matters would be of no avail, should natural law require that the pact be kept when once the villainy had been perpetrated. Of what advantage is it to forbid robbery if, after a thing has been stolen, it can be kept without blame? And it is untrue that an intrinsic force to obligate is not lacking in an evil pact, but it was only held in suspense because of the attending blemish, until it ceased to be the incentive to the crime. For the presence of consent on both sides is not enough to create in a pact an intrinsic power to obligate, but it should concern a matter which each party has free power to dispose of. Otherwise, if mutual consent were enough to produce an obligation, it would be easy to overturn all laws, by making a pact to do so; and so the law of nature itself would minister to its own destruction.

It is our conclusion, therefore, that by the law of nature neither can the doer of a crime claim the agreed-upon reward, as if on any right properly so called, nor is the man who hired him bound by an intrinsic and conscientious obligation to pay him the reward. And so it is no concern of the law of nature that a man should not have committed a crime gratis. Indeed, if a man, for instance, who has hired an assassin, and then, after the murder, refused to pay him the reward, is the victim of the latter's revenge, there is no one who may say that he has been done an injury. But we should observe here that, although evil pacts lack any intrinsic power to obligate, and cannot lead to an 298 action in court, they are not lacking in some effect in the case of the man who first freely agreed to them and then refused to stand by them. This effect is that no right of his allows him to complain if the other person uses force upon him to fulfil them, and visits him with some evil if he does not do so. The law of nature, indeed, forbids one man to force another to a thing he does not owe, or to do him some hurt if he does not produce it. But the man who agrees to an evil pact renounces even the favour of this law, in that, so far as he was concerned, he created in the other a power to demand a thing not owed in itself. And so the evil which a man has brought upon himself, from his own fault, is held to be what he deserves. For instance, the law of nature forbids a man to ravish a virgin against her will. But if she gives her consent, she has, of course, caused herself an irreparable loss, but she cannot complain that an injury has been done her. Although, in such a case, the lines of Ovid, Heroides, ep. V [VI. 137-8], have their place: 'She has won her husband with the very crime she brought him as her dower.' (S.) Thus in states where duels are forbidden, the man who has been challenged is not required to enter the arena, if he has promised to do so. But if he has met his challenger and received some wounds, he cannot complain that an injury has been done him, or demand of his assailant that he meet the costs of his cure.

On the illustration in Genesis, xxxvii, where Judah was anxious to pay the price for his lying with Tamar the harlot, Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. V, chap. iv, has this to remark:

It was believed at that time that a woman who was unmarried¹ and independent could bestow the use of her body upon a man without any agreement upon living together, and this either gratis or for a price. And so a valid obligation could have been contracted by such an agreement, since it concerned a thing which was lawful, so far as the civil laws were concerned.

Although it may be observed that many men make a willing payment in such cases, when they have not satisfied their desire gratis. Perhaps also Judah was concerned about recovering his pledge.

A case to the point is in Digest, XII. v. 4, § 3:

Money given a harlot cannot be recovered at law [. . .]. This, however, is on a different principle, as the point is not that there is immoral behaviour on both sides, but on the part of the giver only; the woman acts immorally in being a harlot, but, being one, she does not act immorally in taking money. (M.)

Here, although in Rome public prostitution and the acknowledgement of that disgraceful calling before the aediles did not fall under the penalties of the civil laws, yet honest men quite properly considered such a life most disgraceful. But when it had once been entered into, it was no further disgrace for a courtesan to receive a fee for her services, and 'ever stretch out her hollowed palm for pay', Tibullus, Elegies, Bk. II [iv. 14]. It is as if I should say: 'It is disgraceful in an honest man to take up the occupation of hangman; but if he has once overcome his shame at it, it is no disgrace for him to receive wages for it.' You may put it more concisely thus: Since at Rome the status of courtesan was tolerated, all pacts concerning that status were by their courts held valid. Although, on another head, such pacts are accused of iniquity by Ovid, Amores, Bk. II, el. x [I. x. 29 ff.]:

'Tis only woman glories in the spoil she takes from man, she only hires out her favours, she only comes to be hired, and makes a sale of what is delight to both and what both wished, and sets the price by the measure of her delight. The love that is to be of equal joy to both—why should the one make sale of it, and the other purchase? (S.)

But it is clear that a man cannot complain of a wrong which was undertaken for his own advantage and with his own consent. Medea says to Jason in Ovid, Heroides, ep. XII [131-2]: 'I may be blamed by others, but you perforce must praise me—you, for whom so many times I have been driven to crime.' (S.) Nisa to Minos, Idem, Metamorphoses, Bk. VIII [130-1]: 'Let this act which was a crime against my country and my father be but a service in your eyes.' (M.) Seneca, Medea [500, 503]:

Who by sin advantage gains,
Commits the sin [. . .]
Let her be guiltless in thine eyes who for thy gain
Has sinned. (M.)

Yet it is common, especially among princes, to secure the advantage of another's villainy, although they punish the crime itself, so that by example the thing may not spread to their hurt. Thus in Paulus Orosius, Bk. V, chap. xviii, the consuls decreed that the servant who had betrayed his master Sulpicius, declared a public enemy by the Senate, should first be manumitted, because he had discovered an enemy, and then cast from the Tarpeian rock, because he had betrayed his master. Add Zonaras, Bk. III, On Theophilus, at the beginning.

9. A third and last inquiry is whether the reward given for a wicked deed can be recovered. Now the law of nature appears to furnish no excuse for this recovery, if there has been no attendant deceit or great damage. For the reward was handed over to the other with the consent of the owner, and with the intention of transferring ownership, and furthermore as if it were a debt for a service, which he valued at that amount. And of course, when a thing is given gratis, there is no recovery. Nor does it make any difference whether the thing was acquired by unjust title, or by a method and means forbidden by the laws. For this fact cannot be alleged by the giver as a reason to recover what he gave, since he agreed of his own accord to the wickedness, and upon its accomplishment he reckoned he would receive some return equivalent to his outlay; nor can he remonstrate about some knavery for which he himself was responsible. But the illegitimate method of securing the reward brings it about, that a superior may either take away as a penalty what was given, or restore it to the original giver. But if, for example, some enticing courtesan should have fleeced an unsuspecting youth out of a large sum of money, it can rightly be recovered, since even among those who band together for wickedness, a certain kind of justice, and therefore the laws of contract, are observed after a fashion.

But since it is also considered wicked to be unwilling to do without a reward something which you owed gratis, the further question arises, whether what has been promised or given for a thing already owed can be recovered. Some reply quite readily that such a promise is valid, if we regard natural law, since even that promise is valid which has been made without regard for any reason; but that a loss occasioned by violent extortion must be made good. The matter will be settled more clearly, if a distinction is drawn as to whether the thing was owed by an imperfect or by a perfect obligation. If a thing is owed only by an imperfect obligation, what was promised for its accomplishment will have to be done, and there is no ground for recovery. For example, even though the law of humanity orders that one point out the way to a wanderer, if I agree to do this for a price, however little trouble it may be, I shall have the right to require it, and the wanderer will not be able to recover it. Unless, perhaps, I lead him by trickery and vain terrors to make some ridiculously large promises.

Those promises are also valid, wherewith I undertake to stir a man up to meeting his duty more quickly and exactly, for it is held that they are made of one's own liberality. But when something was owed perfectly, and the man who owes it is unwilling to pay it unless some new thing is promised, I should judge that the same should be said of it as of those promises which are secured through fear or guile. For if any one in a state of natural liberty refuses to fulfil his obligation, it is proof that he acts that way from trust in his own strength, because he believes that I have not the power to force him to perform his obligation. Therefore, when a man refuses to fulfil some former pact legally entered into, without a new supplement or condition, I acquire at once a just cause for making war upon him. But if my affairs will not allow me at this time to take the field against him, but urge me to agree with him on hard terms, I shall have the right afterwards to seek reimbursement for my loss, unless I forgive it of my own accord. But it is another matter if he wishes to withdraw the former pact, because he can show that it works him an enormous injury. But whoever in states refuses to meet a pact without a new addition to it can easily be brought before a judge and forced to pay.

To what has been said should be added the remarks of the commentators on the Roman law, on Digest, XII. v, where they make a distinction as to whether the fault lay only with the receiver, or only with the giver, or with both. In the first case they allow a claim of restitution, but not in the other two cases. Libanius, Orations, v:

I receive merely those advantages which the laws allow me; how is there any favour here? Assuredly,¹ he who receives a favour ought to make some return to the giver. Yet favour is not due the judge who is bound by the laws; for he has done merely what he was compelled to.

10. We have also no moral faculty to perform something, or to obligate ourselves to perform something, about the possessions or actions of other men, since they are subject not to our disposal but to that of another. A consequence of this is that we can make no promises or pacts on such things, whereby another may acquire by our act a right over them and be able to demand them of a third person on his own right. Therefore, the Roman Jurisconsults, on Institutes, III. xix, § 3, show that he who promises that another will give or do something is neither himself obligated, nor does he obligate the other whose service he promised. This is true if we are willing to stick strictly to the words of such a promise. But because it is not fitting that no effect should follow an act seriously made, it is easy to interpret such a promise to mean that the man will make it his business to see that the other person gives or does something. But if the promise has been couched in these express terms, that I will use my efforts to see that a third person performs some thing or action, I am then obliged to strive, by every means morally possible, to induce the person to perform it. We say 'morally possible', meaning thereby 'in so far as it can honourably be demanded of me, and is allowed by the nature of civil life'. Therefore, if I omit nothing on my part, and the third person still refuses to do it, I shall not be held for any loss incurred, unless I expressly agreed to do so, or am understood from the nature of the undertaking to have agreed. Livy, Bk. II, chap. xxxi: 'As though he had kept his pledge, for it had not been his fault that it was not being carried out.' (F.)

But if I make my promise in this way: 'If the third person will not perform, I will give something,' it is clear that upon the failure of the third party my promise is to be carried out. This is like a provision of the Roman laws, that, if a man bequeathed a thing belonging to another, and knew it was another's, his heir was required to secure it and make good the legacy, or if he could not secure it, to give its equivalent value. But it is certain that a third person is not obligated² by any kind of a promise which I may make, and that the other party does not acquire a right to demand it directly of him.

But the actions and possessions of those men over whom we have authority are not considered their own, in so far as our authority extends. For on such things I can make an efficacious promise, as if they were my own, so that not only am I obligated to carry out my promise, but the person whose services I pledge is obligated by reason of the power belonging to me over him to fulfil the promise when my will has been made known to him. And although it is usual to require of the principal promissor that he force his subject to comply, yet, if the latter persist in refusing, the action will have to be brought not against him but directly against his superior, unless the latter has given up all his right over his subject.

11. Finally, I can make no valid promise to a third person for possessions or actions of mine over which another person has already secured a right, unless it happens that he be willing to forgo his right. For he, who by prior promises or pacts has already transferred his right to another, has himself no further right left which he may confer upon a third party. And it would be no trouble for all promises and pacts on 301 this score to be rendered void by entering another, the terms of which either were directly contrary to, or could not be fulfilled together with, the former. Therefore, in such a case the later pact is made void by the former, or rather, the former shows that the latter has no force; while for the same reason all pacts are void which have been made by subjects among themselves, or with others, in contravention of the oath and loyalty which they gave their lawful sovereigns. Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. V:

He who is born under a sovereign owes allegiance first of all to his sovereign, and if any one else claims that for himself against the sovereign, he is a bold robber of another's¹ property; nor should any pact be kept which is opposed to the laws and rights of the kingdom. He who gave a promise against his sovereign is freed from it.

To the same point also is the old saying: 'The prior in time has the better right.' Not because the priority in time gives of itself any right, but because the first in time has already acquired a right over a thing which prevents a man who comes later from securing a right over the same thing. This is the reason why a servant cannot give his services to another, because they already belong to his master. But that by the laws of Rome a servant could not be obligated to his own master (beyond that general obligation which attends his state), is because his master already had a preceding right over all his possessions and useful services. Yet if one man has deceived another by promising him something that is another's, or his own, but already contracted to some one else, and has thus played him false, he shall be liable for the other's damage, and often is liable to an action for stellionate.

ON THE CONDITIONS OF PROMISES

The difference between pacts and conditional promises. |
|--|---|

It should be noted, regarding the making of promises, that some are made purely and some conditionally; that is, that sometimes we obligate ourselves absolutely to perform something, and sometimes we make an obligation dependent on some form of condition.

2. A condition is a kind of supplement to such acts as give rise to rights or obligations, whereby their force and efficacy are bestowed upon some event which depends upon chance or the choice of man. Therefore, there are two requirements for a condition: first, that it may postpone or destroy the force of an obligation; second, that the event, or what is supposed upon the condition, does not yet exist, or is still uncertain so far as our knowledge goes.

3. These considerations lead to the conclusion that those additions, which are concerned with present or past time, are not properly speaking conditions, although they may appear to be such from the grammatical form of the words. For only the future is unknown to mortals, while their knowledge of present and past events is considered to be clear, and, as a consequence, they can have no power to suspend consent. Therefore, in Institutes, III. xv, § 6, it is laid down that conditions which concern the present or past (such as, 'I will give, if Titius has been consul,' or 'if Maevius is still alive'), either immediately invalidate or make void the obligation, or do not defer it at all, but rather make it pure. For if the things attached as conditions are not as they are supposed to be no obligation is contracted, but if they are really so, the promise is at once valid and begins to obligate purely.

But it should be observed that a condition which concerns a present or past time can properly be affixed to a promise, only if it be unknown to one or both of the parties who are making the negotiations. And such a promise seems to carry with it the addition of a lapse of time. For nothing can be sought from it before it has been clearly shown the promissor that the condition really took place, and for this some time is necessary. For instance, some one ignorant of history can promise, 'I will give you ten something or other if the dictator Caesar ever crossed the Rhine.' In this case, before the amount can be demanded, it is necessary that the fact be first demonstrated on the authority of trustworthy historians. So when I promise, 'If Maevius, who is on a journey, be still alive, I will give you ten something or other,' the second party can require the sum, only when I am satisfied that he is alive. Yet if we wish to examine the matter more closely, the real sense of such promises, dependent upon a condition of present or past time, is this: 'I will give you ten something or other, if you prove to me that Caesar crossed the Rhine,' or 'that Maevius in his journeying is still alive'. Now these are really conditional promises, yet the condition consists not in the fact of that past or present act, but in the proof which the other must offer. It is therefore certain that if both parties knew that the condition was true, and are serious in their dealing with each other, it will be an absolute promise. But if both parties knew that it was untrue, the promise will be but a jest and produces no obligation.

But if the addition takes the form of an event, which, although future, it is known beforehand will certainly take place, for instance, 'If the sun will rise to-morrow,' it is generally agreed that such an addition should not be considered a condition, since it does not delay the obligation, inasmuch as the truth of the future addition is well established. But since it is not lightly to be presumed that such an addition is made with no purpose, we should consider whether the word 'if' is not used for the temporal conjunction 'when', so that such promises are not conditional, but signify a period of time, as if you would say, 'I will give it to-morrow at sunrise.'

Thus, therefore, every condition properly so called, contains something not yet established, at least to one of the parties who are concerned in the matter, and until the condition either comes to pass, or it has been proved that it has come to pass, the obligation remains in suspense. When the condition is found to be true, an absolute obligation is contracted; when untrue, the obligation also disappears.

4. Conditions are usually divided into possible and impossible. The former are those which make an obligation depend on an event which may physically or morally happen. These are again divided into casual or fortuitous, arbitrary or discretionary, and mixed, as partaking of the first two. See Code, VI. li, § 7. A casual condition is such as depends on the will of some third person not subject to us, or on mere chance or fortune, as far as we are concerned, such as, 'I will give you ten something or other, if Gaius marries Titia,' or 'if it does not rain within three days'. An arbitrary condition is one the outcome and existence of which depends on the will and strength of the person to whom something is promised contingent to it; the name promiscuous is given it in Digest, XXV. i. 11. But a promise is judged useless from the very first when the condition is placed at the will of the party promising, that is, of him who makes the promise; for example, 'I will give you ten something or other, if it suits my pleasure.' For the sense of such a promise is merely this: 'I make you no absolute promise now, and in the future it will be within my own discretion whether or not I shall choose to make you an absolute promise.' From this the other person acquires no right, unless the promise be made anew, for the promissor can always withhold or evade such a condition. And so the saying is proper, that what is in our power should not be given to chance. See Digest, XVIII. i. 7; Ibid., XLIV. vii. 8; Ibid., XLV. i. 17, 108, § 1. But if the condition is, indeed, placed at the will of the promissor, but in such a way that he is not able or willing to evade it indefinitely, the condition will have the addition of time; for example, 'I will give you ten something or other, if I put on new shoes,' or 'if I marry,' that is, 'when I do this or that.'

From what has been said an explanation is forthcoming of the words of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 8:

If the thing is not at present within the power of the promissor, but may at some future time, the validity of the promise will be in suspense; under such circumstances the promise ought to be thought of as made on the condition that the thing should come into the power of the promissor. (K.)

This can be taken as true, if the other man knew that the thing was not at the time in the power of the promissor. For otherwise it savours of deceit to substitute for an absolute and present promise one which is given for some after time.

Grotius goes on to say: 'If the condition under which the thing can come into the power of the promissor implies his power to obtain it, the promissor will be bound to do whatever is morally right, in order to fulfil the promise.' (K.) This means that if I promise you something, which for the present, it is impossible for me to perform, but may be made possible hereafter by my endeavour, it is my duty to try my best to develop the faculty whereby I may perform my promise. As an example, a student of the law, as yet unskilled, may promise another: 'I will conduct all your cases in court, if I acquire some skill at law.' According to Grotius such a man will be in duty bound to show all diligence in the study of law, so that he may become fitted to conduct the cases. This, however, is only to be understood when the man expressly promised, or from probable conjectures may be understood to have promised, that he would strive to give himself the power to perform. Otherwise the condition can be extended indefinitely.

It should be observed, furthermore, that Grotius uses the term 'arbitrary condition' in a sense different from that used above, that is, as a condition the fulfilment of which is in the power of the promissor.

Finally, a mixed condition is one the fulfilment of which depends partly on the will of him to whom it is made, partly on chance; for example: 'I will give you ten something or other if you marry Maevia.' For that is not entirely within your power, since she may refuse your offer of marriage, or meet with death before the ceremony.

It should be added, in conclusion, that a condition is considered fulfilled when it is the other party's fault if it is not fulfilled. See Digest, XVIII. i. 50.

5. Conditions are impossible either physically or morally; that is, some cannot be done from the very nature of things, some should not be done because of the laws. Added conditions of this kind, if we adhere to the natural simplicity of the terms, and especially when each of the parties knew that they were impossible, make the promise negative and hence void. See Digest, XLIV. vii. 1, § 11; Ibid., 31. And certainly when the business is between such as are living in natural liberty, it is clear that there is no transaction when the added condition is naturally impossible, although to deny a man's¹ request by such means has the appearance of insult, which is, apparently, not to be found in a simple negation. An illustration is in the reply of the Lemnians to Miltiades in Cornelius Nepos [Miltiades], chap. i. For when Miltiades quibbled about the exact meaning of the words which they had used, the decision is very properly reached, that 'the Lemnians were overcome not by their own word but by the good fortune of their adversaries'. And what has been said holds good also of a condition morally impossible or wicked. An illustration of this is in the reply of Esdiguerius to Maphaeus Barberinus about his professing the Catholic religion, as given by Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. XVI, p. 708. But if 304 a man has fulfilled a wicked condition, the question of whether at all, or to what extent, he can require the fulfilment of the promise is to be answered by what we have said before, chapter vii, § 8.

But in states civil laws can ordain that a promise with an impossible condition shall be considered as though such a condition had not been added, especially if the person promised did not know it was impossible; and that the person promised shall not be made the object of idle jest. And pacts and promises to which wicked conditions have been added, civil laws properly declare void, lest it should be believed that the pacts of individual citizens have any power to subvert the laws of the state. Thus the laws of Rome declared that added conditions, which were impossible, wicked, or absurd, were void in wills, since it seemed unreasonable that in an act, which had every occasion to be serious and weighty, men should be made sport of by idle clauses. In Petronius [Satires, 141], Eumolpus stipulates in his will: 'All those who come into money under my will, except my own children, will get what I have left them on one condition, that they cut my body in pieces and eat it up in sight of the crowd.' (R.) In Horace, Satires, Bk. II, sat. v [84 ff.], Tiresias says:

I will tell you something that happened while I was an old man. A determined old woman at Thebes was carried out to her burial, according to her will, in this way: her corpse was oiled all over, and her heir carried it on his bare shoulders. She wished to see (you understand) whether when she was dead she could slip through his fingers. I suppose when she was alive he had pressed her too hard. (W.)

On this passage the Scholiasts remark: 'She specified in her will that with her body naked and oiled she should be carried to burial by her legacy-hunter, himself also naked, in the thought that possibly in her death she might slip from the shoulders of the man whose importunity she was never able to avoid while living.' This matter is more fully discussed by the Roman Jurisconsults on Digest, XXVIII. vii. See Digest, VII. viii. 8.

6. It should be added that, if mention of place be inserted in promises without mention of definite time, it is understood that as much time is allowed for the fulfilment of the promise as will allow one conveniently to arrive at the place where the promise is to be carried out. See Digest, XLV. i. 73 pr.; Ibid., 137, § 2.

7. The addition of a definite time has the result that the effect of an obligation is not put forth before that space has elapsed, or, in other words, that the obligation can be required only on the appointed day.

8. In conclusion, the difference should be explained between conditional promises and pacts. Now they agree in this, that as the former are not binding, if the condition is not met, so the latter do not obligate one party, when the other party has not satisfied the terms of the agreement. This is the reason for the old saying that the particular articles of contracts are like conditions in each contract. Yet some make an exception in case the condition serves no purpose, being added only for form and by way of completeness, so to speak. Yet such an exception should not be extensively indulged in, lest it be extended to the point of glossing over important articles of a pact, and because it is not presumed that useless clauses are inserted in pacts. Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. XVI, states, regarding the secret articles added to the marriage pact between Charles, Prince of Wales, and Henrietta of Bourbon, that 'they were added more as a matter of form, as by so doing the Most Christian King secured favour with the court of Rome, while neither party believed that the pact was added with the intention of keeping it'.

Promises which have an arbitrary condition agree with pacts in this respect, that in both the one party must perform something, if he desires to exact from the other his promise or agreement. But the two differ in this respect, that in a promise under an arbitrary condition,¹ it appears to be no concern of the promissor whether or not the condition is fulfilled; at any rate he has no desire to constrain the other party to fulfil it, but leaves it to his own choice. But in a pact I undertook to perform something on the assumption of something being performed by the other party; and hence, if he does not do so, not only am I not bound to perform anything, but I can also compel him to perform what was agreed upon.

CHAPTER IX

ON THE AGENTS FOR CONTRACTING OBLIGATIONS IN GENERAL

|---|--|
| 1. We can make promises and pacts through another. | 5. How far a man can accept for another. |
| 2. The different kinds of commissions. | 6. Acceptance cannot be made by heirs. |
| 3. Supposing an agent die before the matter is concluded. | 7. On a burden added to a promise. |
| 4. The difference between an agent and a mediator. | 8. The division of pacts. |

It very frequently happens that promises and pacts are ratified by the intervention of other men. It must, therefore, be made clear at this point what should be observed in such cases. Now it is certain that a man is obligated, not only when he personally makes known his consent to the one to whom he wishes to be obligated, but also when he signifies it through another man whom he appoints the interpreter or commissioner of his consent. Such a person acts in the business like an instrumental cause, in that he not only carries on all negotiations upon the authority of the other, but also acquires no right for himself, and contracts no obligation touching the person with whom he is appointed to treat; but he secures a right for the man whose affairs he is conducting, and he is bound to him to conduct his affairs with all fidelity. For those actions, for the undertaking of which we have clothed another with authority, and have openly proclaimed that we will acknowledge them as our own, also produce an obligation in us and furnish us with a right, and are therefore regarded as ours. But that a man may treat effectively with such an agent, he must be assured that we have seriously chosen him to be the spokesman of our purpose, and that we will hold¹ whatever he does as our own acts. On these general principles depend most of the rules, given in Roman laws, on acts of trade and acts of agents. Here also belongs the heading quod iussu in the Digest [XV. iv].

2. We usually commission a person to conclude agreements in our stead, either with the general instruction, that he do whatever will appear to him to be of greatest advantage to me, or with an express designation on the manner and substance of the agreement which he should reach. If the first is done, I shall be bound by whatever agreement he has reached, in good faith, on the business at hand. We say 'in good faith'. For I shall in no way be bound by what he has done in bad faith, and by any fraud that he has perpetrated to my undoing, since, in vesting him with authority, it is understood that I presupposed his good faith as a condition. Indeed, good faith includes this further condition, that what he does be not opposed to the honour and advantage of his agent, at least so far as present conditions go. Ignorance of this indicates a negligence comparable with malice. The same is to be held of blank papers, signed with our name, which we often give into the hands of our agents for them to write in the terms of our undertaking. These will not obligate us if anything is written into them which had nothing to do with the matter of the commission, and to which it can 306 be presumed that we would not have consented.

A famous instance of a fraud committed by means of a blank paper of this kind is in Zonaras, Bk. III, and Glycas, Bk. IV, on Romanus Lacapenus, concerning the patriarch Tryphon, who signed his name to a blank, in order to prove that he was not ignorant of letters, as was falsely charged. On the page thus signed his enemy of Cacsarea filled in his resignation to the patriarchate, which the emperor took as an opportunity to eject him from that office.

In Gunther, Ligurius, Bk. VI [656 ff.], there is a criticism of the issue of such signed blanks: 'Surely it is a fair deed¹ and worthy of the head of the church to issue papers in blank filled in with only his name! These the dispenser may fill in with any kind of idle charge, when he wishes to trump up false crimes against the already unfortunate.'

When, however, certain limits have been prescribed, my representative cannot obligate me beyond them.

But if two sets of orders are given a man, the one open, to be shown to the other party to the contract, the other secret, instructing only the agent, and stipulating how far he should proceed, the question may arise whether the agent obligates his employer if he exceeds the secret instructions, and yet keeps within the strict letter of the open. The reply is that he can. For by the open instructions I bind myself to the third person, the party to the contract, to ratify what is done by my agent; in my secret instructions I bind my agent not to depart from them, and, if he does so, he shall be liable to me for the loss I suffered because he departed from my orders. But I am obligated to the third party for what the agent did. Were this not true, there could be no safety in dealing with agents, since there would always be the fear that the secret instructions were different from the open, and no easier excuse could be found for invalidating everything done by agents and tricking people with idle arrangements. See the anonymous work² Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, pp. 582-3 and 588. In this case also it is understood that the agent did not depart from the secret instructions out of bad faith.

3. But if we have used an agent to carry our promise to a man, and the agent happens to die before our will has been expressed to the third party and he has accepted it, it is clear that the promise can be recalled. For the promissor had expressly desired that the obligation be contracted through the direct conversation of his agent. And so, if the agent should have happened to mention to a third person the business he had in his instructions, and it should come through this party to the ears of the person for whom it was intended, I am still not obligated by that fact. For it was not my wish to be obligated by the word of that third person, nor has he so clear a knowledge of my will that he can make the other man sufficiently certain of it. But the matter is entirely different in the case of a courier to whom letters expressing my will are given to be carried to another. For even if he dies before the letters are delivered, and they are handed to the man by some one else, that in no way interferes with the contraction of the obligation. For the courier is not properly the instrumental cause for contracting the obligation, but only the conveyer of the binding instrument, that is, the letters, and it is of no concern to either of the contracting parties by whom they were conveyed and delivered. Cf. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 17.

4. But in other cases as well, it makes a great deal of difference whether a man acts as a go-between in the negotiations of other men and as a pure agent and transmitter of another's decision, or as a real mediator who may to some extent interpose his own judgement. This Grotius, loc. cit., expresses as follows: '[. . .] The servant who has been chosen to report the promise, or the agent authorized to make the promise himself.' (K.) In the former case, should I withdraw the 307 promise before it has been accepted by the other party, my withdrawal will hold good, even though it be unknown to my agent, and he, because of his ignorance, proceeds to indicate my desire to the parties, as it was first stated. Cf. Digest, XL. ii. 4. But when a man intervenes in another's affairs in the second capacity, unless the withdrawal is known to him it will be of no avail, and he puts his principal under no obligation, in case he has completed the execution of the business. Because, of course, the principal had decided that the offer of his promise should be made known to the other party by the act of his agent, who was to be not only the bodily conveyer of the terms, but also allowed to exercise judgement. Here apply the opinions of the Roman Jurisconsults, Digest, XVII. i. 15. Cf. Digest, I. xviii. 17; Costalius on Digest, III. iii. 65; [Constitutions of Clement, I. iv] De Renunciatione.

It is felt that the same distinction applies in the question, whether a gift is valid in case the donor dies before it is accepted. Authorities say that it is, if the agent be of the first kind, since nothing was lacking on the part of the donor; but they deny that it is, if he be of the second kind, since the gift had not been entirely fulfilled in the lifetime of the donor, and they say rather that merely an order had been given; in other words, because he had not yet offered the thing, but had only commanded that it should be offered. Yet compare Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 17, where he renders the opinion that the gift can be accepted, if the agent had already offered it in the lifetime of the donor. And yet it is not clear on what ground the recipient would delay accepting it, if the gift had been offered.

Grotius, loc. cit., feels that the same principle should be used in deciding the argument as to whether an agent can bring an action for a commission against the heir of the man who gave the commission, to recover expenses incurred in carrying out the commission after the death of him who gave it. The author of the Ad Herennium, Bk. II [xiii], says that on this question the praetor, M. Drusus, allowed an action, and Sextus Julius denied one.

5. Now since through an agent we can signify our consent to another man, the further question arises whether a third party can accept a promise in the place of the man to whom it is made. This has nothing to do with the person who has been authorized by the mandate from us to make the acceptance in our name, for we are supposed to have done ourselves what we do through such a person, and it is felt that we desire what we have left to his own pleasure, if he also desires it. But the question concerns those who have received no mandate from us about the matter. It is the opinion of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xi, § 18, that a distinction should be made between a promise made to me about giving something to another, and a promise conveyed in the name of the person to whom the thing is to be given; that is, whether the promise runs: 'I promise you that I will give to Seius,' or 'I promise I will give to Seius with you as arbiter and witness'. In the former case it seems the natural meaning of such a promise, that upon my acceptance I acquire a right to see that the thing reach the other person, if, indeed, he has accepted it, so that in the meantime the promissor cannot recall his promise. But I, as the one to whom the promise was actually made, may remit it, provided the other person has not already accepted it. And so the promise amounts practically to this: 'I will give to Seius, if you so desire.' In such a case it assuredly seems to lie with you, whether you wish to pass the promise on to Seius or, by refusing it, to destroy it, at least so far as its passing to him through you is concerned. For if it is my firm intention to give it I can do so without your intervention. But if you show that the offer is acceptable to you, I shall be unable to withdraw it before Seius has been informed of my promise. And when he has accepted the promise it will be valid by natural law.

Yet the Roman laws declared such stipulations as looked only to the use of a third party void if there was no added penalty, their reason being that stipulations are invented in order that a man may 308 secure something that is of value to himself; and if it is given to another it is of no value to the stipulator. But if the penal stipulation be couched like this: 'Unless you give Seius one hundred something or other, you will pay me by way of penalty eighty,' I have thereby acquired this much right, that, if the first condition is not met, I may on my own score claim eighty. But, as a matter of fact, this seems to have been made a positive rule, so as to reduce the number of suits, for a judge could justly rebuke the importunity of a litigant because he troubled the court and others with a matter in which he had no direct concern. And although, strictly speaking, it is some concern of ours if another receives any benefit through us, for on this score he is under an obligation of gratitude to us; yet it seemed inconsistent that an action be allowed for the recovery of something in another's name when the person concerned could not recover it in his own name and that, therefore, an action be allowed whereby a man could put one person under obligation to him at the expense of another.

But, in the second case, when the promise runs: 'I promise I will give to Seius, with you as witness,' if you lack authority to accept the promise for Seius, no matter what you say by way of agreement, you have secured no right for yourself or for Seius, since he does not recognize your action as his own. And so it makes no difference whether or not the intervening witness assents to the promise, since it was not directed to his person. And since the acceptance secured no right for Seius, the promissor can recall his promise without injury, although not always without discredit to his constancy and truth.

6. But it is certain that if something be offered to a man who is still alive, let us suppose by letters or by an agent, and the man dies before he has accepted it, his heir cannot make the acceptance, and so such a promise can legally be withdrawn. For it appears that the promissor directed the acceptance to the will of the dead man, not to his heir, and it is not presumed that he thought of the possibility of his death, and so was ready to perform his promise in that eventuality. Since we are often quite willing to give a man something which he can also hand on to his heirs, and yet not willing to give it to his heirs directly; for it makes a very great difference who the man is that receives a kindness of us. See Digest, L. xvii. 191.

7. The last question to be added in this connexion is whether a man can add a burden to his promise after it has once been given. That at the first as many conditions can be added as one wishes, there is no doubt. And this can be done when the promise is not yet completed by acceptance, or is not rendered unchangeable and irrevocable by the giving of one's word. For the other party has not yet acquired a right before the acceptance, and hence, just as the promissor can for that reason withdraw his promise, so he can also add a burden to it. But a completed gift allows no further conditions. See Code, VIII. liv. 4.

But what if the burden is added for the advantage of a third party? Suppose I should say: 'I will give you one hundred something or other, if you will meet the expenses of Seius' studies for a year.' In this case we maintain that this burden can be withdrawn by the promissor, so long as it has not been accepted by Seius, for no right can lie in Seius before his acceptance.

8. The most general division of pacts is this: That by some pacts a right is constituted which contributes to the use of all mankind, while by others a right arises which benefits only certain men. That is, the life of men would have been simple indeed and barbarous had not the gifts of nature been increased by their own institutions, whereby their relations were accorded striking advantages and no less signal grace. The most important of these institutions are speech, ownership of property, value, and sovereignty or command, all of which presuppose 309 a universal pact, tacit or express, whereby a fixed form has been assigned them. Reason, in view of the increase of the human race, advocated their introduction, on the ground of their great contribution to the grace and tranquillity of mankind. And so, now that we have noted the nature of pacts in general, we will examine those institutions and observe upon what covenants they rest, and what precepts of natural law, which we termed before hypothetical, proceed from them.

THIS one fact alone might be sufficient proof that man was intended by nature for a social life, namely, that he of all creatures has been given the ability to express his thoughts to others by means of articulate sound, which faculty can be of no logical use to men, unless they lead a social life. Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. ii, well says:

310 Nature makes nothing in vain. And the gift of speech (that is, such as is joined with intelligence and an understanding of what the words mean, and is not the mere repetition of borrowed sounds, like the chatter of parrots) is possessed by man alone of all animals (by the aid of which one man can most conveniently instruct and command another, and understand his orders, while without it scarcely any society, peace, or discipline among men, save of the most rudimentary nature, would be possible). For mere sound (or a kind of inarticulate noise) is but an indication of pleasure or pain, and is therefore found in other animals, for their nature attains to the perception of pleasure and pain and the intimation of them to one another. (Hence it follows that all sounds of animals are determined by nature and not by invention, as is the case with the speech of men.) But the power of speech is intended to set forth the expedient and inexpedient, and likewise the just and the unjust. And it is a characteristic of man that he alone has any sense of good and evil, of just and unjust, and the association of living beings who have this sense makes a family and a state. (J.)

Add Isocrates, Nicocles, towards the beginning. Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XI, chap. li [271]:

It is the voice that serves to express our sentiments, a power that distinguishes us from the beasts; just as, in the same way, the various shades and differences in language that exist among men have created an equally marked difference between us and the brutes. (B. & R.)

Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. II, chap. xvi, also has an excellent discourse on this. Sophocles, Oedipus at Colonus [1188]:

By open words

A scheme of villainy is soon betrayed. (S.)

Also Pliny, Natural History, Bk. VII, chap. i, neatly points out the necessity of speech when he says: 'One man of foreign speech is not a human being to another.' Add Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VII, chap. i.

Now since the weakness which is the lot of individual men can be removed most conveniently by the aid of others, and since another man cannot gird himself to bring me aid unless he first knows my needs, which knowledge can be gained most promptly by signs, and best of all by articulate words; it follows that in order that this instrument, of the greatest usefulness for the life of man, may gain its end in binding together the family of men, and that man may not become less sociable through the use of speech than through silence or dumbness, the law of nature is understood to command that no man shall deceive another by the use of signs which have been instituted to express his thoughts.

2. That we may trace this matter 'from the egg', as they say, we must realize that the nature of the way in which things come to our senses is such that not only do they give proof of their own presence, as it were, but they also are the means whereby the mind of man can arrive at a knowledge of other things. And this is either because those things have a natural relationship or connexion with what they suggest, or because beings, endowed with perception and understanding, without regard for their natural connotation, have vested them with notions, by which the images of certain things are presented to the mind. As a consequence of this there arises the distinction between natural signs and such as secure their power by agreement. Of the former the majority are found in the world about us, such as the dawn, which signifies the approaching sunrise, smoke, the presence of fire, &c. By agreement for their use in signifying something, men have adopted things and actions, certain movements and words, that is, articulate sounds made by the tongue and afterwards reduced to writing; and all these are understood to have some force, either with certain men, or the majority of mankind, or the world over.

Under the first general head can be classed lighthouses to guide the course of ships, which Nauplius once abused in dashing the tempest-tossed Greeks against the cliffs of Caphareus, that he might revenge the death of his son Palamedes. Add Digest, XLVII. ix. 10. Also other signs by which the course of ships is directed in the daytime, and channels and reefs are pointed out, as well as those on land routes, such as Herms, signposts, and the like. Thus, as we are informed by Barclay, Argenis, Bk. I, the Persians used to light fires along the tops of their mountains and pass certain messages through their kingdom in a very short time. Add Polybius, Bk. X, chap. xxxix ff. [X. xliiv], On Communication by Means of Beacons and Signal Fires; Casaubon, Letters, DCCCXII, ed. Graev.; Julius Africanus, Κετοί, Bk. II [xxxvii].¹ See also Ferdinand Pinto, chap. lxi, on the horn kept in every house in Japan, which they use for signalling.

An infinite variety of such signs whereby different things are announced to the citizens is to be found everywhere in states. Of such are clocks, the ringing of bells, spears, wreaths, signs upon houses, and the like; in warfare the sound of bugles, the beating of drums, firing of 311 shots, setting up of ensigns. Likewise certain gestures and movements are everywhere taken as signs for certain things. To make way before one, to rise from one's seat, to bow the head, and to kiss the hand are among most people signs of honour. To bare the head in address and to take off one's shoes are among some a sign of honour, among others of contempt. Thus in some places it is a sign of contempt to point with the middle finger, to turn up one's nose, to 'show the fig' as the Italians say, and there are many others of the same kind. To take a person by the beard is among some peoples an insult, among others a sign of honour, as with the Tartars, some of the races of India, and, as some think, among the ancient Gauls, according to Livy, Bk. V, chap. xli.

It is also customary to express by gestures desires for acts, the rendering of which requires a similar motion of the body; by such gestures strangers after a fashion supplement their ignorance of the language among foreign people. It is also generally accepted that we affirm something by a slight downward movement of the head, and deny it by a movement from side to side, while we reject it decisively by turning our back. Our use of motioning with the hand, or pointing the finger at a spot or object which we wish to designate, is perhaps more to be classed among natural than among arbitrary signs. It is well known, at least among such as have agreed upon their significance, what may be indicated by a nod, a wink, movements of the hands and feet, and it is not to our purpose to dwell upon them at length. Aeschylus, Agamemnon [1061]: 'Then wave thy foreign hand in lieu of speech.' (P.) Add Lucian, De Saltatione, where he tells about a dancer who depicted the amours of Mars and Venus so well by his dancing that he seemed to recite them; a certain foreigner thereupon asked Nero the gift of the dancer to act as his interpreter. Likewise Monsieur de Sancy, a French ambassador to Turkey, told of his once seeing two mutes, the one a Turk, the other a Persian, who could not understand each other because they used different signs and gestures; whereupon a third mute was found, able to serve as an interpreter between them.

3. But it is our chief concern here to consider speech, by far the most common as well as useful sign for the intercourse of men, invented that men may communicate to each other their concepts or thoughts. Because of his ignorance of the origin of mankind, Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I [viii], invents the following account of its birth:

Men at first led a rude and brutish sort of life, wandered up and down the fields, and fed upon the most agreeable herbs, and the natural fruits of the trees. And since they were attacked by wild beasts, they were taught by their own advantage to help one another, and as they came together out of fear they began to recognize little by little one another's forms. Their words were confused, without certain signification; but by degrees they spoke articulately, both making signs, and giving proper terms to everything upon occasion; and at length their discourse became intelligible one to another. But being dispersed into several parts of the world, they spoke not all the same language, every one using that dialect proper to the place, as his lot fell; upon which account there were various and all sorts of languages in the world. (B.*)

Lucretius, Bk. V [1027 ff.], gives an exactly similar account:

But the diverse sounds of the tongue nature constrained men to utter, and use shaped the names of things, in a manner not far other than the very speechlessness of their tongue is seen to lead children on to gesture, when it makes them point out with their finger the things that are before their eyes [...] Again, to think that any one then parcelled out names to things, and that from him men learnt their first words, is mere folly. For why should he be able to mark off all things by words, and to utter the diverse sounds of the tongue, and at the same time others be thought unable to do this? Moreover, if others too had not used words to one another, whence was implanted in him the concept of their use; whence was he given the first power to know and see in his mind what he wanted to do? Likewise one man could not avail to constrain many, and vanquish them to his will, that they should be willing to learn all his names for things; nor indeed is it easy in any way to teach and persuade the deaf what it is needful to do; for they would not endure it, nor in any way suffer the sounds of words unheard before to batter on their ears any more to no purpose. (B.)

He adds¹ that since brute animals were able to express different feelings with different sounds, why could not man as well, 'having voices and tongues, distinguish things by varying sounds to suit varying feelings?' (Add Diogenes Laertius, Bk. X [76]; Vitruvius, De Architectura, Bk. II, chap. i.) By such an account Lucretius seems chiefly to have wished to oppose Cratylus in Plato, who maintains that the man who gave names to things was a person of the greatest wisdom, a topic about which we shall speak later. And certainly those who believed that men in the beginning crawled up out of the earth, 'a dumb and filthy drove' [Horace, Satires, I. iii. 100], could scarcely give any other account of the origin of languages. For it is clear that no language is congenital with man, but that all men learn a language by practice. This is the reason why those who are born deaf are also dumb. And it is considered as good as a miracle to teach such a person to speak—a thing which has been done in our time in the case of the brother of Velasco, Constable of Castile, who, although born deaf, was taught to speak, write, read, and understand authors; and not long since Wallis of Oxford told of another such case.

Nor does it seem likely that some one man at the beginning fashioned any language in its entirety, with the relation of words carefully thought out and applied to things. Indeed, the majority of Christians are persuaded, on the authority of the Sacred Scriptures, that the original language was directly transmitted by God to the first men, whose children thereupon learned it by hearing; and that the difference in languages came by a miracle, while men were constructing the tower of Babel against the will of God. Add de Mornay, Traité de la Vérité de la Religion chrétienne, chap. xxvi. Some, indeed, question whether the language of Adam himself was supplied with all distinctions, and fitted to express every kind of thought, because the Sacred Scriptures mention expressly only the names which he gave to animals. And likewise, it is well established that most languages were at the first but poor and simple, and only in the course of time did they become rich and polished in form; that, indeed, in the course of time they have experienced great changes, and from their debasement and confusion not a few new ones have arisen in times not far removed from us. Cf. Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. iv.

4. But it is clear that the power which words have of bearing this or that meaning, that is, of giving rise to a certain idea in the mind, is theirs not by nature, or any intrinsic necessity, but arises from the mere judgement and institution of men. For otherwise no reason could be shown for the same thing being expressed in different languages by different words. This is also true of the different forms and outlines of letters. On this point Augustine, On Christian Doctrine, Bk. II, chap. xxiv, has this to say:

A single letter, shaped like a cross, means one thing among the Greeks, and another among the Latins, and this not by nature, but by agreement and consent regarding its value. Therefore, when a man knows both languages, if he wishes to indicate something in writing to a Greek, he employs this letter in a different value from that which he places upon it in writing to a Latin. Furthermore, the word beta means a letter of the alphabet in Greek, but in Latin is the name of a vegetable.¹ And when I say lege, in these two syllables a Greek understands one thing,² a Latin another.³

Nor is it any proof to the contrary to believe, as is recounted by Philo Judaeus, On the Creation of the World, that Adam gave animals their names with mature judgement and not at random, choosing them from each animal's own nature, and carefully describing thereby their characteristics, so that the nature of each could be gathered from the first sound of the word. For even if we grant that animals and some 313 other things (for no one can easily prove this of everything) were given names descriptive of their nature or outstanding characteristic, yet the very roots from which names are derived denote the underlying idea only arbitrarily. For example, although the reason given by Adam for naming his wife 'Heva', was that she was the mother of all living men, yet the word hava gets its meaning 'to live' only by imposition. And although in all languages cognate names are given to cognate things, along with the preservation of a conformity of inflection which is called analogy, this is by no means always preserved, many words following their own course of inflection; and even that analogy, which consists of a special inflection and arrangement of words, is itself due to the pleasure of men.

³ ['Read.'—Tr.]

Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. vi [16]:

But we must remember that the course of analogy cannot be traced through all the parts of speech, as it is in many cases at variance with itself. For analogy was not sent down from heaven, when men were first made, to give them rules for speaking, but was discovered after men had begun to speak, and after it was observed how each word in speaking terminated. It is not therefore founded on reason, but on example; nor is it a law for speaking, but the mere result of observation; so that nothing but custom has been the origin of analogy. (W.)

In the Cratylus [p. 383 A B] of Plato, Cratylus advances the following view: 'Names [. . .] are natural and not conventional' (which is absurd), 'not sounds which men, giving articulation to a portion of their voice, agree to utter'; (This may be accepted as true in cases where men, contrary to common usage, choose to give special names to things in order to make sport for others, as is done by strollers and vagabonds. In such cases fictitious names are opposed to true, in that they are applied to a thing or person in opposition to general usage.) 'but there is a truth or correctness in them, which is the same for Hellenes as for barbarians' (which is likewise false). To which Hermogenes replies [p. 384 c]:

I cannot convince myself that there is any principle of correctness in names other than convention and agreement; any name which you give, in my judgement, is the right one, and if you change that and give another, the new name is as correct as the old: just as we frequently change the names of slaves (which we allow, provided that entails no prejudice to the common agreement); for there is no name given to anything by nature; all is convention and habit of the users. (J.*)

But what Socrates maintains, in the passage already referred to, in support of the theory of Cratylus, does not settle the matter, for example, when he proposes as absurd, that, if I call a 'horse' what we commonly call a 'man', the same object will properly be called both 'man' and 'horse' [p. 385 A]. A brief answer to this is that words used by people have a sense given them by popular usage, which sense individuals cannot change to the confusion of the same; and on this topic more anon. This further argument of the same philosopher is also erroneous: If the whole proposition may be false, a part also, for example, a word, may be false [p. 385 c]. For in a single word no falsity can exist of the kind that commonly appears in an entire proposition. His following lengthy discussion on the correct use of terms is proper only in the case of the derived terms, but not of roots. Furthermore, since different peoples express the same things by different words, those that denote the same thing very often have entirely different etymologies.

- 314 For instance, the Greek word for 'god' (θεός) is derived from the verb 'to run' (τρέω), because the ancients believed that the stars, which are always moving in their course, were only gods. But what relation is there in Latin between deus and currere? So the word for 'man' (ἄνθρωπος) signifies one who meditates on what he sees (ἀναθρῶν ἀὶ ὁρωπε). But can the Latin homo be derived in any way from contemplatio? The word 'soul' (ψυχή) is related to the verb 'to cool' (ἀναψύχειν). Is anima then from refrigerare? And others can be adduced to the same purpose. In a word, however much a man may busy himself in tracing etymologies and reasons for words, yet when he comes to their simple and root forms, he is forced to recognize no other influence than pure imposition. On this subject we can add the words of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. vi [34]: 'Or shall we allow homo, "man", to be from humus, "the ground", because he was sprung from the ground, as if all animals had not the same origin, or as if the first men had given a name to the ground before they gave one to themselves?' (W.)

It is indeed amusing that, when Socrates was asked to explain the words for 'fire' (πῦρ) and 'water' (ὕδωρ), he could only say that they owed their origin to other languages. And he himself confesses that no further inquiry is possible on the derivation and reason for words, when one has arrived at 'those things which are, as it were, the elements of all other ideas and names';¹ even though he afterwards shows much cleverness, all to no end, in investigating the reasons of roots. And yet after he has delivered himself at great length, as if in defence of the position of Cratylus, he concludes by leaving it in doubt. Sosipater Charisius, Instit. [Ars] grammatica, Bk. I [p. 50, 25 ff. K.], quotes Varro to the following effect:

The Latin language is made up of nature, analogy, custom, and authority. The nature of verbs and nouns is immutable, and turns over to us not a bit more or less than it has received. For if any one should say 'scrimbo' for 'scribo', he is shown the error of his way not by virtue of analogy, but by the constitution of nature herself.

The same thought is found in Diomedes, Bk. II. But for my part I do not understand that necessity of nature. Unless we wish to say that the Latin tongue has naturally a certain remarkable agreeableness, which accords marvellously with the judgement of the ear, and that is the reason why the ear at once rejects harsh combinations of letters in that language. See Huartes, Scrutinium Ingeniorum, chap. xi. The reason alleged by P. Nigidius in Gellius, Bk. X, chap. iv, to prove that words get their meaning by nature, is certainly unfounded. Arnobius, Against the Heathen, Bk. I [lix]:

No language is naturally perfect, and in like manner none is faulty. For what natural reason is there, or what law written in the constitution of the world, that paries should be called hic, and sella haec?—since neither have they sex distinguished by male and female, nor can the most learned man tell me what hic and haec are, or why one of them denotes the male sex while the other is applied to the female. The conventionalities are man's. (B. & H.)

Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 8, on the other hand, rightly opposes those who have declared that the difference between things and words is that words are the natural signs or expressions of thoughts, while things are not. Now if the meaning of this assertion is that words were instituted to the end that they should be signs of concepts, and that therefore it is their nature and essence to signify something, while it is merely an extrinsic attribute of other things that they are used in place of signs, then, indeed, it must be admitted quite freely. But if its meaning be that words have by their very nature the power of signifying something, while things have not, the assertion is false. It is, on the contrary, the case that words by nature and without human imposition signify nothing, unless it happen to be some confused and inarticulate [ἀναρθρος] word, as in grief or laughter, which should rather be called mere sound than speech. But if the statement means that man has this endowment above all other animals, that he can express the thought of his mind to others, and has invented words for that purpose, then it is true; although it should be added that he can do this not merely by words, but also by nods and the like. This last is the way in which some mutes very ingeniously convey their thoughts. Therefore, in Digest, XXXIII. x. 7, § f. [XXXIII. x. 7, § 2], it is held that those who cannot 315 speak may express themselves by their very attempt and effort at sound, and by τῇ ἀνάρθρω φωνῇ (the inarticulate voice). And in Decretals, IV. i. 25, it is said that dumb persons may marry, the consent being expressed without words, that is, by nods. Nay, Pliny, Bk. VI, chap. xxx, tells us that among some peoples of Ethiopia nods and movements of the limbs take the place of speech. Add Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. XI, chap. iii. On the symbols used by the natives of Peru under the Incas, see Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VI, chap. ix.

Under this head fall also those symbols which denote not sounds formed by the tongue, that is, words, but the things themselves. This may be because they have some likeness to the things they express, as in most of the Egyptian hieroglyphics, or because the imposition of man has endowed them with such a force, as is the case with the Chinese characters, which express whole thoughts and sentences.

In this connexion it will not be amiss to make some observation on that imposition whereby a fixed and special name is customarily given to persons, as well as to places and to other things. The purpose of this is that one man may be distinguished from another, one place, one city, or country, from another, and that by such a distinction men may know what each of them may be judged to have done or said. Now just as the proper terms of other things follow the nature of appellative or common nouns, as they are called, so it should be observed regarding proper nouns, that the right to impose them belongs to those who have power over others. Thus it is customary for parents to give names to children, masters to slaves, kings to subjects whom they reward with some honour. When this has been omitted by those in authority, or if many persons are using the same name, every man will have the right, in order to avoid ambiguity or mistake, to take to himself some distinctive name. But just as a man is not allowed to take another name, should it defeat the purpose of their imposition, or should such a change work to any one's loss or prejudice, and to his own probable danger and suspicion, so it will not be permissible to conceal one's name, except in case such a concealment does no injury to the right of another, but works some advantage, or else wards off from us some loss and danger. And this according to those principles which we shall shortly lay down upon the obligation to tell the truth. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. IX, the last chapter [xv]; and Bk. VII, chap. iii, 8-9; the oration on the same point of M. Antonius Maioragius; Casaubon, Exercitationes in Baronium, Bk. XIII, n. 13.

5. Now just as all signs, except natural ones, denote a certain thing from imposition, so this imposition is attended by a συνθήκη, ὁμολογία [consent, agreement], and pact, by reason of which such signs must be used to point out one and only one thing. And a pact of this sort must be understood in the case of all things used for signs, no matter what origin we posit for human speech. For even though we should hold that the first languages were directly breathed into men, yet any man had his own faculty to speak, and could use it as he pleased, in applying certain words to certain things; and that faculty could not have come into use had there not been an agreement among men, that every man would use them in a uniform way and express the same things with the same words. For since a man in a state of natural liberty does not hold his faculties subordinate to another man, but may use them according to his own judgement, another would have no right to demand that I should use them in this way and no other, in order that 316 he may thereby be able to judge the meaning of my mind, unless there were some pact between us on the matter. The force of this pact extends no farther than to produce a probable certainty as to another's thoughts, not an infallible one, since men are skilful in dissimulation and deceit.

A saying of Archidamus in Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [xix], concerns the matter before us: 'A sheep always uses the same voice, but a man various and many, till he hath perfected his designs.' (G.) Moschus, Idylls, i [8-9]: 'Of an ill-disposition, but fair spoken, for he means not what he says'; (E.) yet it is assumed that a man really wanted what he expressed by these signs. And so the effects of a right follow upon the consent of a man, as it is represented by signs, even though it happens that the intrinsic purpose of his will differs from the signs. Add Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 3. Were this not the case, their use would be entirely cut off. But since the mutual exchange of duties among men could not be exercised unless every one could be certain of the will of men, and since human nature could not make this possible in any other way than by signs open to the perception of the senses, it followed that their use had to be sanctioned and protected by a special agreement, so that each man might be certain of what he could demand of another. An instance may be cited in this connexion from Livy, Bk. XL, chap. xlii: 'On the request of the people of Cumae that year, leave was granted them to use the Latin language in their public business, and that their auctioneers should have a right to use the Latin language in selling.' (M.) Although in general the Romans were zealous enough in spreading their language. See Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 2.

6. This agreement on the use of signs, and especially of words, is either general or special. The former applies among men who use the same language, so that they express certain things, especially such as concern daily use and commerce, by certain words which the common use of the time approves. For according to Horace, Art of Poetry [70 ff.]: 'In usage is the arbitrament, the right and rule of speech,' and at its will 'many a term which has fallen from use shall have a second birth, and those shall fall that are now in high honour.' (W.) Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. vi [20]: 'To retain words that are obsolete and disused, is a species of impertinence, and of puerile ostentation in little things.' (W.) Add Gellius, Bk. I, chap. x. Sextus Empiricus, Against the Mathematicians, Bk. I, chap. iii [82]: 'Now there are all manner of changes in sounds, and have been, and will yet be. For the age loves change not merely in plants and animals, but also in words.' Idem, Bk. I, chap. x [178]:

As in a state where a certain kind of money is locally current, whoever employs it may conduct every kind of business there without let or hindrance, while the man who does not accept this, but mints some new variety and wishes to use it as money, is a fool; so also in life, he who is unwilling to follow the kind of speech which is customarily employed, as he would use the current money, but coins a new language for himself, is not far from being a mad man.

Especially since no use can be made of speech, unless it is understood by both parties. Cicero, Tusculan¹ Disputations, Bk. V [xl]: 'We are all deaf with regard to those languages which we do not understand.' Ovid, Tristia, Bk. V, el. vii [V. x. 37]: 'Here it is that I am a barbarian, understood by nobody.' (W.)

It should also be noted, in this connexion, not only that many languages differ in dialects, but that words of the same language have different meanings in different places. The meaning, therefore, of such words will be judged according to the usage of the place where the business is being conducted, unless it appears that a stranger has not yet dropped his native speech and conformed to the parlance of the place.

317 Thus in one place and time some words convey an insult, but not in another. It is well known that this is true of the word tyrant. The word barbarian among the Greeks and Romans was a mark of disdain, yet King Theodoric in an edict applies it to his nation. Also in many passages of the Law of the Burgundians the Burgundians call themselves barbarians.

It should further be observed that many words have, beside their principal meaning, another accessory one, as it were, which carries with it an expression of our judgement or passion and esteem. Hence it is that of many words which are synonymous, so far as their principal meaning is concerned, some convey an insult and injury and some do not, all because such an accessory meaning accompanies some, and is wanting in others. Thus, if I say to a person, 'You are lying,' I not only mean that his speech does not agree with his thoughts, but the connotation of my words is that he did it with evil intent, and to work us an injury. Likewise, if I call a man an impostor and ignoramus, I insult him because those words connote contempt and censure, and because there are words with which I may, without insulting him, express the fact that he has done me an injury or is ignorant of some matters, and which, for this reason, would have expressed the facts in the case without the connotation of censure.

Sometimes this connotation arises not from the general imposition of men, but from the tone of voice (which is of one kind for instruction, another for flattery, a third for reproof), the expression of the face, gestures, and other natural signs, all of which play no little part in changing, decreasing, or increasing the principal meaning of words. Likewise, figurative language usually connotes passion in the speaker, while a direct statement merely expresses the simple fact. 'Is it then so hard a thing to die?' [Vergil, Aeneid, XII. 646] means more than 'It is not so hard a thing to die'; for the first statement suggests a contempt for death. It is due to this connotation that some words are considered obscene, and others not, although they signify the same thing, nay, even though there may be no disgrace in the thing itself. One reason for this seems to be because some words describe a thing or act a little more generally, others more distinctly and in a descriptive manner, as it were. Therefore, when a man uses the latter kind of word he immediately betrays for that thing or act a lust, and delight or approbation unworthy of a respectable man. Sometimes also words derive their obscenity from the fact that they either signify contempt for the thing, or are used only by men of a low type and towards persons who are shown no respect. See also Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. IX, ep. xxii. Casaubon, Commentary on the Satires of Persius, p. 342, questions whether it is even proper to use obscene words in the criticism of vices, as is the custom with the writers of satire.

Such words as have received a particular meaning from common usage, or which are unknown to common usage, acquire their force by special agreement. To this kind belongs the vocabulary of artisans, or the terms of an art which were either invented, or separated by a new meaning from common usage, because of the great number of articles, or from mere fancy. The nature of the business at hand can easily prevent any one of those who are skilled in the art from being deceived by them. Among the unskilled they should be described by words in common usage. This is, furthermore, necessary if the workers themselves are uncertain of their use, or if a man for certain reasons wishes to invent new words, or to give a new sense to old ones. Add Bacon, The Advancement of Learning, Bk. III, chap. iv, at the beginning. Nay, some people can and do invent words and symbols of things for their 318 own use, or give a new meaning to common words, so that these can be understood among themselves, but not by others. (How far this is allowable will be clear from what follows.) They serve their purpose if they show the true meaning of my mind to those with whom I have made a special agreement on their use, and this also holds good of other signs, defined by a special imposition of certain men. This is especially¹ true of military signals. Sometimes their place can be taken by silence. Thus Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. I [xi], tells us that the commander of the Arcadians in their night attack upon the Spartans at Tegra gave his soldiers a sign that they should cut down those who asked for a password. Accordingly the Arcadians asked for none, while the Spartans, not recognizing their own men at night, and therefore asking for a password, were killed by the Arcadians. The same writer, Bk. V [xvi], also recounts how Pammenes tricked his opponents by using the signals of the trumpet in their opposite sense, for he commanded his troops to advance on the call for retreat, and to withdraw on the signal for attack.

7. The further point must be carefully observed that, although we are bound by this general and special convention to use words and other signs as agreed upon and according to general custom, we are not in the least obligated by that fact to disclose to every one all our thoughts and ideas. To this thought may be applied the saying of Apollonius of Tyana, in his life by Philostratus, Bk. IV, chap. xi [33]: 'Palamedes invented writing not only in order that people might write, but also in order that they might know what they must not write.' (C.*) But for this there is need of another obligation which arises either from a special pact, or from a general precept of natural law, or, it may be, from the nature of the business at hand, for the undertaking of which use is made of speech. Thus, if I undertake the instruction of some person, I am obligated by the contract of letting and hiring, to acquaint him with all that pertains to that subject. If I send a person to ascertain the state of a certain thing, he is bound by agreement to inform me of all that he has found out about it. If I must fulfil for a man an office of humanity which is performed by speech, it is obvious that my words must conform to my thoughts. If a man has undertaken to give a history to the world, because of that common obligation whereby we are bound to promote the advantage of others, he will not be allowed to record anything he knows to be false. Of like nature is that general obligation to express our thoughts by clear signs, lest by doing otherwise others receive an undeserved injury. Finally, in the commercial relations of men, and in all undertakings in which a right or obligation arises from agreement, in points which concern the matter at hand our thoughts must be clearly expressed to those with whom we are dealing. For if this is not maintained, there remains no proper way to complete such arrangements.

But since it is not always the case that any of the rules mentioned above require that I make known my thoughts about affairs, especially such as concern me alone, it is obvious that I am not required to indicate to all men everything that I am turning over in my mind, but only such things as the other person has a full right to know, or at least a right which corresponds to the obligation lying upon me. And so I can rightfully keep silent upon what another has no right to learn of me, and which I am under no obligation to disclose. Aeschylus, *Choephoroe*¹ [582]: 'Silent if need be or the right word speaking.' (P.) Nay, when it works no injury to the right of another man, and neither my advantage nor that of another man can be secured nor safety assured in any other way, I shall be able to use signs that represent something very different 319 from my real meaning. For since that agreement about using signs in a special way looks to other obligations, the fulfilment of which is sought by those signs, it follows that when they cease, there is no reason why I may not use those signs in a different way, if I work no man an injury and can find no easier way to advance my own interest and that of other men.

8. Upon these principles one can easily decide what is the truth, which all men are obligated to speak, and what is a lie, a thing so detested by all honourable men and held among the basest reproaches to be thrown up to a man. Sophocles, Trachinian Women [454]:

The name of liar
Is to free-born man a deadly brand. (S.)

Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. ix; Bk. II, chap. xviii. Now the former consists in this: That our signs, and especially words, should in a convenient way represent our thoughts to another, in whom there lies a right to know them, and upon us there lies a perfect or imperfect obligation to disclose them to him; and this to the end that he may gain some advantage from his knowledge of my thoughts, or that he may not experience an undeserved loss by my signifying the opposite. And so to logical truth, which is a conformity of words with facts, ethical truth, which we are now discussing, adds the intention and obligation of the speaker. Hence it is that a man who speaks the truth by error or lack of foresight has not observed ethical truth, but only spoken logical truth. And he who has spoken the truth without regard for his obligation or the right of another will be held to have done more¹ chattering and gossiping than speaking of the truth.

It is easy to conclude from this what is the nature of a lie; that is, when signs or words represent our thought as being something very different from what it really was, and yet the man to whom those signs are directed had a right to know and judge of them, and an obligation lay upon us to make them in such a way that he would understand our feeling. I hold that on this reasoning it can be more clearly understood why I must by my words express my thoughts clearly, than if we should derive the evil of a lie from that general precept of natural law, namely, that 'No one should be injured', as if all the force of a lie lay in the injury it works. For, strictly speaking, a man is not injured if things are not done for him to which he has only an imperfect right, yet the violation of such a right is enough to make a lie. In the same way there is little clearness in the reason put forward by Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. II, for the evil of a lie, when he writes that among the Hindus, if any one of them who had taken up the study of philosophy was ever detected in a lie, his punishment was that he could never fill another magistracy or office, 'because by his lie he had cheated the common society of men.'² But as in all acts which diverge from the law, error, imprudence, and rashness are distinguished from malice, so it cannot properly be said that a man lies, unless, with guile and malice aforethought, he tells another things different from the thoughts of his mind, to the end that he may injure him or deceive him by a false hope. And so when a man who has been deceived by another, tells what is false, although he himself believe it to be true, he is passing a falsehood, but he is not lying. Yet the man who spreads abroad among others everything that has appealed to his hasty credulity may not escape the censure of rashness and folly. And the imprudent spreading of another's falsehood, or of something imperfectly understood, can carry the obligation to make good the damage caused by it, especially when it approaches closely serious fault [culpa lata]. See the case of Caesellius Bassus, in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XVI, chaps. 1 ff.

320 9. Now that the real principle of truth and of a lie has been discovered, it is clear that those are mistaken who claim that there is no difference between a lie and an untruth; that a man who says something different from his own thoughts always lies; and so assert that it is essentially base to say anything different from what you think. Of course it is an untruth for you to use words in such a way that another may gather from them a meaning quite the opposite of your real thoughts. And yet, if another man has no right whereby he should know exactly what is in my mind, and if he receives no hurt beyond his desert, there is no reason why, if it is to my advantage, I should not use the words in question to my own advantage rather than to another's. Therefore, every lie is an untruth, but not every untruth can be called a lie. And if this interpretation is to be given to the statement of Aristotle [Nicomachean Ethics, IV. xiii] that 'Falsehood in itself is base and censurable' (W.) there is no need for the limitation of Grotius, Bk. III, chap. i, § 9, who explains 'in itself' as what may be interpreted 'generally', that is, 'considering the thing without regard to attendant circumstances.' (K.) For an untruth, which may escape censure because of certain circumstances, should by no means be branded a lie. But that every lie, properly so called, is disgraceful, goes without saying.

In this connexion it should be observed that an untruth can sometimes produce the effects of a lie. This is the case not only when a man speaks the truth, yet as though he were lying, and, by the attitude, gestures, and nods with which his speech is usually animated, makes his audience believe the opposite of what he is saying; as Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. I, chap. v, shows that, like a solecism, a lie can also be conveyed by a gesture, when one impression is given by the voice, and another by a nod or gesture; but especially when this is done by those who, because of their many lies, have destroyed all confidence in their word. Just as no one finds it easy to believe them, even if they make every endeavour to tell the truth, so they can use the diffidence of others for their deception, because, in the belief that such men are always consistent in their knavery, they are imposed upon by their believing the opposite of what is said. This is like the boy in the fable who had so often tricked the farmers by his pretended cries for help that, when at last the wolf actually came, he could get no aid from them in his real need. [Aesop, Fables, 353]. Agesilaus used this scheme in his strategy. For since a general is not expected to announce openly what he has in mind, and therefore the enemy do not usually credit what is scattered about with little care, he cleverly used that impression to induce the Persian satrap to lead his troops in a different place from where Agesilaus had announced he would go. Xenophon, Greek History, Bk. IV [III. iv. 20-1]; Cornelius Nepos, Agesilaus, chap. iii. Another instance is the cleverness of the old fox in Terence, Self-Tormentor, Act IV, sc. iii [679 ff.].

Just as no one will dare to impugn the dignity of an Epaminondas who would not tell a falsehood even in jest, so it is very simple to believe that a man owes some penance if he tells something the opposite of his own thoughts, when it works no one an injury, and even leads to some advantage to himself and others. One might, indeed, express the wish with Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xv]: 'that pretence and dissimulation might be banished from the whole of life'; (E.) and that therefore all men would be so constituted, that no one would envy the property of others or lay snares for them, nor use their guilelessness to work some trickery upon them, or to resist sound reason. Such a man Achilles boasts himself to be in Homer, Iliad, Bk. IX [312-13]: 'For hateful to me even as the gates of hell is he that hideth one thing in his heart and uttereth another.' (L.) But since the man who carries all his thoughts before him like an open book is exposed to the deceits of depraved men, and since most men like to be led by empty professions rather than by solid accomplishments, we will not banish from human intercourse the harmless artifices of dissimulation and evasion, until all the malice or folly of men has been changed into probity and wisdom. Pindar, Nemean Odes, v [30 ff.]: 'It is not every truth that is the better for showing its face undisguised; and full oft is silence the wisest thing for a man to heed.' (S.) And it is an idle prayer of Theseus in Euripides, Hippolytus, lines 925 ff. Although it is certain that, if a man makes more use of the artifices of dissimulation and evasion than is necessary for his own protection, he destroys in himself every ground for confidence and makes of himself a man with whom no one can deal in good faith, since the words and deeds of such a person cannot fail to be suspected.

The arguments whereby some wish to prove that every untruth is wicked in itself, carry no weight. They say that he who tells an untruth defiles by such misuse his own tongue, that most noble instrument, and robs himself of all trustworthiness; not to mention the interference with a great many duties, which might otherwise be mutually fulfilled by men, since among other things a liar gains the distinction of being never believed, even if he does speak the truth. But all this is true of actual lying, not of that untruth which wisdom often persuades one to use.

They add that a lie proves a man's humble and abject spirit; for when a man can rely upon solid accomplishments and truth, why should he take refuge in such deceptions? Yet untruths that are necessary and free from guile do not always proceed from an abject spirit, and solid accomplishments can often be preserved among wicked men only by indirect dealings.

Others like the argument that speech was given to be the interpreter of the mind; that since untruth is opposed to this end, it may properly be held to oppose the order of nature; and that there is discord in the harmony of the faculties of man, if his speech does not accord with his mind. We freely admit the truth that speech is the interpreter of the mind, but in this way, that it shall not babble forth more than the mind commands, with which remains the decision as to what may advantageously be disclosed, and what must necessarily be withheld.

10. Not all men are agreed on the nature of that right which we have said is violated by a lie, and on how men have secured it. Some maintain that because there belongs by nature to men, as to God, a faculty to know the truth, which faculty is hindered by lying, they therefore are entitled to exact the right from others that their words express facts in such a way that these can be understood as they actually are. Now there can be no question of this right in regard to God. For not only would it be highly irreverent to use any untruth toward Him, as if the simple truth were not so efficacious with Him as a show of outward forms, but the greatest folly as well, since He has no need of our information to know the truth. Hence it was both impious and silly of Cain to attempt to conceal from God the murder of his brother, especially by a reply so impudent and rude. And the remarks of Sophocles, Antigone [495 f.], accord with what has thus far been said:

More hateful still the miscreant who seeks
When caught, to make a virtue of a crime. (S.)

And yet it does not follow that, because a man can naturally understand something, he therefore has a right to understand it; for a moral faculty is not without further ado to be inferred from a physical one. But what others add at this point: that he who hears an untruth understands it, and that therefore the right of understanding is not destroyed by false speaking—all this has nothing to do with the case.

For such a person understands not the actual fact that he wished to, but only some idle invention in its place.

Others seek that right which is violated by a lie, not from nature but from an institution of men, and indeed from some tacit pact. For, they say, once speech and other similar tokens have come into use by the institution of men, men thereby bound themselves by a mutual obligation to use them in such a way that others might be able from 322 them to judge the thought of the one with whom they are speaking. For were there no such obligation, and if a man could use words as he pleased, and in such a way that no other could be sure of his meaning, that invention of signs would have been useless. This is the view of Grotius,¹ Bk. III, chap. i, § 11, on which it should be observed that a careful enough distinction² is not made between an obligation that concerns the proper use of signs, so that another can gather our thought from them, and that obligation which is concerned with the question, whether we shall tell our³ thoughts to another by those signs. These are two very different obligations, and they arise from different principles. For since words acquire their significance from imposition, it is understood that an agreement has passed between the men who use the same language, that in common usage they should indicate certain things by certain words. But that obligation actually to make known those signs to another, or to disclose to a person my thoughts on a certain subject arises, as has been shown above, either from some general precept of natural law, or else from a special pact.

From this last point it is clear what judgement should be passed on the position of those who deny that the nature of a lie must be sought from the violation of some pact, maintaining that whatever depends not on nature but on the pacts of men, and those for the most part tacit, is to be traced to and measured by its utility⁴ and this alone; that it cannot be shown to be a thing of such great value for us to understand all that another says; but that, on the other hand, it is a matter of much concern that a man preserve unimpaired his liberty to cover by silence, or by sufficient evasions,⁵ whatever can remain secret without injury to another and with advantage to himself.

But there is a confusion here of things that should be accurately distinguished. For no advantage lies in one man knowing the thoughts of all other men, or of their knowing his, nor were men mutually obligated in this way upon the introduction of speech. We have already discussed sufficiently the question, how far a man is supposed to tell his thoughts to another, and what right the other has to know them. But upon the supposition of an obligation to communicate our thoughts to another, a pact, which accompanies the introduction of languages, thereupon exerts its force to require such a use of words that our thoughts may be known by another. This pact has so much advantage that, without it, speech would be of no use.

II. From these premises it will be easy to judge by what right things are commonly branded as lies, when only something that is not a fact has been stated. At the outset, some draw a distinction between speaking an untruth and not saying a part of the truth, or dissimulating, where the former is unlawful, while the latter, they say, is often blameless. Here it should be noted that although not to speak, that is, to keep silent, cannot be, properly speaking, a lie, especially if no sign equivalent to speech has been used, yet for another reason silence may be a criminal act; if, for instance, it leads to the prevention of some good which a man should have procured, or to the doing of some evil which he should have warded off. Silius Italicus, Bk. XVI [610]: 'It is a sin to defile my conscience by keeping quiet.' Thus, if a man has been put in a look-out to announce the approach of the enemy, he will be severely punished if he has kept silent. Nay, Polybius, Bk. XII, chap. vii, calls it no less a lie for a man who has undertaken to write a history, to fail to record what took place. Yet when I am not obligated to tell another some matter, it is proper for me to tell but a part of it, if I cannot safely conceal it all. Here they cite the illustration from Jeremiah, xxxviii [24 ff.], where the prophet prudently conceals before the princes, at the command of the king, the fact that he had been questioned by the latter on the outcome of the siege, giving some other reason, though not a false one. For he told only a part of the truth, being in no way obligated to tell it all to them.

323 The same is true of Athanasius, who replied to the questions of those who had been sent to arrest him, that Athanasius had just passed by this way, concealing the fact that he had just now gone back on the ship, for he was under no obligation to betray himself. Touching the case of Abraham, in Genesis, xx. 12, some question whether that holy man acted prudently in concealing his marriage with Sarah and calling her his sister, because he knew that her beauty was such as to arouse the love of others, and that maidens were more easily approached than married women. They add that the complaint of Abimelech was not unjust, and that it was unnatural of Abraham to presume that there was no respect for piety and justice in any state, until he had taught it to them. Yet others undertake to excuse his action, on the score that the hope of life usually weakens great minds, and scarcely anything that may avoid death should be considered base. But this matter we leave undecided.

12. Grotius, loc. cit., § 8, also distinguished between those signs which have been invented to signify some things μετὰ συνθήκης or that carry a mutual obligation, and other things regarding which there is no such agreement. (For whenever something has been limited by a pact, it can thereafter be used in only a uniform manner.) And he feels that signs of this latter kind can be used, even if we foresee that another will draw a false conclusion from them; provided no other hurt follow, or such a hurt is lawful, apart from the effect of the guile, and could have been openly done him. This we freely admit. For since there is no general or special agreement that the thing in question must be used in this manner and no other, to the end that the other may learn therefrom my thought, it follows that it is understood that full liberty has been left me as to its use, provided that no man receives any hurt therefrom by way of injury. For the other man is himself to blame for the false idea he receives, since he was surely over-curious in drawing conclusions about the affairs of other people.

Nor am I supposed, in the exercise of my own right, always to take care that another man may not conceive a false opinion, otherwise harmless. For instance, if a man keeps a light going in his bedroom, in order to dispel the fears of the night, or to have it at hand in case of need, he is not obligated to extinguish it, however much a neighbour may believe that he is using it for purposes of study. The example in Luke, xxiv. 28, is quite plain. For every one is allowed to make such a gesture, and nothing is more usual in social intercourse than for us to make a move towards leaving, so that we may know whether or not we are welcome guests. For we seriously intend to leave, unless we are strongly urged to remain. The case in Acts, xvi. 3, seems a question of higher consideration. But that an enemy whom one can openly combat, may lawfully be deceived by such stratagems as flight, the use of uniforms, insignia, and arms admits of no question.

13. The same writer, in the passage cited, asserts that we do not always receive the censure of lying, if we use an ambiguous word or phrase, which has more than one meaning, be it by common usage, or by the custom of some art, or by an unusual figure or trope, provided our thoughts agree with one of those meanings, even though it be expected that the hearer will take it in another way. But he adds very properly that such speaking is not to be rashly approved, unless it be used in instructing a person who has been entrusted to our care, or in avoiding an improper question (see Seneca, Troades, 597 ff.), or in securing for ourselves some advantage without injury to another. 1 Samuel, xxvii. 10. For, on the other hand, if you are obligated clearly to tell me your thoughts, it makes no difference whether you deceive me by a direct lie or by an ambiguous statement. Especially since the latter must, if it is to serve your purpose, be so couched that I accept 324 the more common meaning, while the more abstruse and less common corresponds to your thoughts. For should both meanings be equally probable, no one would be so careless as not to ask in what sense you wish your statement to be taken. But to speak ambiguously or obscurely to one whom you wish to instruct, or whose proficiency you would test, can come in for no censure in any respect, if that end can be obtained by such a course better than by open speech. Here belongs the illustration in John, vi. 5. Thus, supposing there is a person to whom I am under no obligation at all to disclose my thoughts, and yet I cannot keep silence, nothing prevents me from supplying him with a false opinion in exchange for his simple ignorance, provided that he incur, besides his error, no other damage which he does not deserve. Thus, no one would condemn Athanasius because upon being asked by a man sent to run him down, how far away Athanasius was, he replied that he was not at a great distance. In Theodoret, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. III, chap. viii.

From what has been said it appears that Grotius, in the passage cited, is to be taken with caution, when he declares that, 'in order to exemplify the idea of falsehood, it is necessary that what is spoken, or written, or indicated by signs or gestures, cannot be understood otherwise than in a sense which differs from the thought of him who uses the means of expression.' (K.) For when a man is obligated to express his thoughts clearly, his speech should be so delivered that the sense which the business in hand or the common usage of language suggest should also agree with his thoughts. Nor should he order the other to lay at his own door his error or loss, because he did not delve into all the less common and the intricate senses of his words, allied to the present matter, or because he was not a diviner. Isocrates, Panathenaic Oration [240]: 'If you engage in litigation about contracts and profits, it is disgraceful and no slight indication of rascality.' (F.)

14. Much more to be detested are those mental reservations which some men have devised by disgraceful scheming, to twist the sense of clear words into an opposite meaning, and that, too, even in those matters where there was an obligation to tell the truth, and in the case of assertions confirmed by an oath. As a result of these mental reservations a man appears to affirm something which he inwardly intends to deny, and vice versa. By this every use of speech is destroyed, and a man can no longer be certain in what way he should take another's words. And yet that invention is highly absurd as well. For since speech was introduced that we might express what we have in our mind; and yet our thoughts are without effect in human intercourse so long as they are not expressed; in what way may that tacit mental reservation, so abhorrent to common usage, take away that effect which spoken words would otherwise naturally produce?

It very frequently happens that, from the matter concerned, or other circumstances, there is added to a general statement a tacit condition or restriction, whereby the statement is neatly turned to fit the business at hand, and freed from any impropriety. But where is the rationality or subtlety if, upon being asked whether I did a thing I should swear that I did not do it, referring either to a different thing, or a different day from that which was meant in the question? Or if I should say to a man who asks me for some money, 'I do not have any,' meaning 'I have none to give you'? Or if I should say 'I promise to give it to you', meaning 'only as a matter of form'? It is foolish to try to free such a person from the crime of lying and perjury, on the argument that 'he does not speak the single determinate truth which his hearers understand the words to signify, but he speaks another truth of a different kind'. As if my question is met satisfactorily, when I hear some truth of a different¹ kind, and one that has no connexion with the present business; or as if a man had met my question directly who talked to me about garlic,² when I asked him about onions!

No less absurd is the position of some, that out of the open statement and the mental reservation there is made a complete statement, in which, as made up of two parts, there is no falsity. For instance, if a man says: 'I am not a priest' with the reservation 'that I need tell you', the complete statement will be true: 'I am not a priest that I need tell you.' But just as speech was contrived for the sake of others, and not that a man might mutter to himself, so its truth and falsity is judged by what is openly addressed to others. Lud. Montaltius [Pascal], Lettres Provinciales, ix.

15. It is generally asserted, and therefore held permissible, that one is guilty of lying in telling something to a child or a demented person, which bears a false signification. Lucretius, Bk. I [935 ff.], illustrates this truth: 'That unthinking childhood may be deluded.' (R.) Theocritus, Idylls, xv [40]: 'No; I'm not going to take you, baby. Horse-bogey bites little boys.' (E.) The reason given by Grotius, loc. cit., § 12, is: 'Since they do not have liberty of judgement, it is impossible for wrong to be done them in respect to such liberty.' (K.). This reason does not seem to me entirely satisfactory. For, to speak especially about children, it is, of course, well known that they are so lacking in the faculty of judgement that they accept in all simplicity and with no reserve, whatever is told or represented to them in a false manner, and know not how by reasoning to separate the true from the false. Yet because, by virtue of their being part of mankind, they have the right that they be not injured by others, that they receive offices of humanity, and that they be in a special way imbued with every good principle by their parents and instructors (add Matthew, xviii. 10); and because they have at least the faculty of understanding simple matters, it should be maintained with all strictness that they share the same right with their elders, in so far as what ought to be told them should be presented in such a way that they can understand it.

But since they usually reject the simple truth because of the immaturity of their minds and the vehemence of their passions, it is more effective to instruct them by stories, or to restrain them with fabled terrors, until they have learned to apprehend and weigh the true and the false. And so we employ fictions with them, not to make sport of them or do them harm, but only because they cannot conveniently be instructed by more serious reasoning. So the passage of Lucretius, Bk. I [935 ff.], mentioned above, is quite to the point:

When healers essay to give loathsome wormwood to children, they first touch the rim all round the cup with the sweet golden moisture of honey, so that the unwitting age of children may be beguiled as far as the lips, and meanwhile may drink the bitter draught of wormwood, and though charmed may not be harmed, but rather by such means may be restored and come to health. (B.)

Strabo, Bk. I [ii]:

The poets were not alone in sanctioning myths, for long before the poets the states and the lawgivers had sanctioned them as a useful expedient, since they had an insight into the emotional nature of the reasoning animal; for man is eager to learn, and¹ his fondness for tales is a prelude to this quality. It is fondness for tales, then, that induces children to give more attention to narratives and more and more to take part in them. The reason for this is that myth is a new language to them—a language that tells them, not of things as they are, but of a different set of things. And what is new is pleasing, and so is what we did not know before; and it is just this that makes men eager to learn. But if you add thereto the marvellous and the portentous, you thereby increase the pleasure, and pleasure acts as a charm to incite to learning. At the beginning we must needs make use of such bait for children, but as the child advances in years, we must guide him to the knowledge of facts, when once his intelligence has become strong and no longer needs to be coaxed. (J.)

See the special commendation given the fables of Aesop in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, Bk. V [v]. It is proper also to pacify² even the insane by fictions, in cases where they can understand in no other way.

16. Nay, all people in general, for whom we cannot gain some well-intended end by plain speech, can, without being blamed for lying, be led by fictions into a mistake that is for their own interest. 326 Nor is it necessary to say, as a ground for our licence, that it is presumed that the other will not take offence at the infringement upon his liberty of judgement, but will rather be grateful for the benefit which he thereby secures; and that an injury is not done to him because of his approbation. For he had the right that by our speech some good would be secured for him or some evil avoided, but not in the manner of our speech, which would have produced just the opposite effect. And this it would have done, if he had grasped the matter as it really stood, without artifice and at its face value. Therefore, in such a case, the speech should be tempered to the nature and condition of the hearer, no less than a physician adapts his medicine to the strength and state of a patient. Since, then, no person can have a right to be addressed in such a way that he hears a speech so framed that it will be to his hurt, it is not proper to say that any right has been waived in the case before us. And then, on the side of the speaker, since he was supposed to perform his duty to the other by the use of speech, from the law of humanity or some stricter obligation, it is clear that the obligation did not dictate that he should so frame his speech that it would fall short of its purpose.

Therefore, such feigned speeches as protect the innocent, appease the wrathful, relieve the downcast, or bring any advantage which could not have been secured by plain speaking, are free from every taint of lying, and even merit praise for their prudence. See Exodus, i. 17, 19; 1 Samuel, xix. 12 ff., xx. 5, 28-9; 2 Samuel, xiv. 4 ff.; 2 Corinthians, ix. 2-4; Pliny, Letters, Bk. III, ep. xvi, on Arria; Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode ii [xi. 35-6], on Hypermnestra,¹ whom he calls 'gloriously false, a maiden noble for all time to come'. (B.) Euripides, Phoenician Maidens, line 998; Sadi, Persian Rosegarden, chap. i: 'A lie that does a kindness is better than a truth that brings ruin.' Heliodorus, Ethiopica, Bk. I [26]: 'At times even a lie is a fine thing, namely, when it helps the tellers and does not hurt the hearers.' Another case in point is that of Rahab in Joshua, ii. 4, where we cannot approve of what Grotius, on Hebrews, xi. 31, James, ii. 25, has to say on that affair: 'Before the Evangel a lie that looked to the safety of worthy men was not held a fault. This act is praised as suited to those times.' For we hold such a thing to be still lawful, provided it violate no civil obligation. Add Socrates, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. III, chap. xii.

Under the same head come those who raise the drooping spirits of their troops in battle by a false report, and thus spur them on to win for themselves victory and safety, or who belittle before a battle the number of the enemy. See Cornelius Nepos, Eumenes, chap. iii, and scores of such instances among the historians. Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. IV [ii. 17]:

If a general, seeing his troops demoralized, were to invent a tale to the effect that reinforcements were coming, and by means of this false statement should revive the courage of his men, to which of the two accounts shall we place that act of fraud? On the side of right, to my notion. (D.)

Sophocles, Philoctetes [108-9]:

NEOPTOLEMUS. Thou deem'st it, then, no shame to tell a lie?

ODYSSEUS. Not if success depends upon a lie. (S.)

Add Frontinus, Stratagems, Bk. I, chap. xi; Bk. II, chap. vii; Polyaenus, Stratagems, Bk. I [xxxiii], on Leotychides. Maximus of Tyre, Dissertations, 3 [xiii. 3d]: 'It is nothing so very remarkable to speak the truth, except it be for the good of the auditor. For the physician frequently deceives the sick man, the general his army, the skipper his sailors, and there is no harm done. Nay, more, a falsehood has often helped men, and the truth hurt them.'

Yet I question whether we can approve the act of Agesilaus, who, upon seeing his troops in consternation at the multitude of the enemy, wrote the word 'victory' upon his hand, and snatching the liver from the soothsayer, held it in his hand against the letters until¹ they appeared on the liver. Then he shows the writing to his companions, saying that the gods promise them victory, Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms [p. 214 E]. Thus physicians are not liars if they undertake to convince a fastidious or irritable patient of the sweetness or mildness of their medicine. Libanius, Declamations, xxix [p. 664 D]: 'We see physicians beguiling with deceit the desires of the sick. We do precisely the same thing to the well whenever it would be better for them to be deceived than to hear the truth.'

But I doubt whether one should place in this class the stratagem of Erasistratus, the physician of King Seleucus, who represented to his patron that his son Antiochus was in love with his wife, Lucian, De Dea Syria.² You may list here the deed of Joseph who, by false charges, kept his brothers in a state of anxiety for a long time, so that he might awaken in them the real repentance for having sold him, and might know their real feeling towards their father and his brother Benjamin. Genesis, xlii; Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. II, chap. iii. Finally, it is easy to allow the tales of the poets, in which the truth is concealed under a pleasing cloak, to be excluded from the class of lies. See Plutarch, De Audiendis Poetis. And to this extent the words of Sophocles, Electra [61], can be allowed:

The end, methinks, gives any fraud excuse. (S.)

17. The heads of states may also sometimes avail themselves of false speech, since if their counsels and designs are divulged, they often are brought to naught, or else cause damage to the State. When these are not sufficiently protected by simple silence, it will be permissible to conceal them, misleading the curiosity of other men with feigned language. Plato, Republic, Bk. III [389 B]:

If a lie is useful only as medicine to men, then the use of such medicines will have to be restricted to physicians; private³ individuals have no business with them [. . .]. Then the rulers of the state are the only persons who ought to have the privilege of lying, either at home or abroad; they may be allowed to lie for the good of the state. But nobody else is to meddle with anything of the kind. (J.)

An illustration of this is the decision of Solomon, 1 Kings, iii. 25. Suetonius, Claudius, chap. xv: 'When a woman refused to recognize her son, and the evidence on both sides was conflicting, the emperor forced her to admit the truth by ordering her to marry the young man.' (R.) Thus when a father and son were brought to justice for the murder of a priest, and it could not be established which one was guilty, since neither wished to betray the other, Charlemagne is said to have ordered that both be put to death, whereupon the father confessed that he was the author of the crime. There is a law in Spain that, if a female slave has had a child by her master, she shall become free. On one occasion a nobleman's maid bore a child by her master and he denied it. Since there was insufficient proof, King Alphonso ordered the child, who was a boy, to be publicly sold into slavery. On hearing this the father declared himself; Panormitanus, De rebus gestis Alfonsi, Bk. II. When the soothsayers announced to Neleus, on his departure to plant a colony, that his band should be cleansed of all polluted men, 'He himself pretended that he had killed a boy and needed to be purified. So he prevailed upon others who were conscious of their guilt to do the same; and when in this fashion he had discovered those who had contaminated themselves, he sailed away and left them.' Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. VIII, chap. v. There is a saying among the Spaniards: 'Tell a lie and you will ferret out the truth.' Of the same nature are false reports on the health or death of a ruler, that the people be not disturbed; yet I would not agree that such can be brought to include the falsehoods of Numa. Add Polyænus, Stratagems, Bk. II, on Epaminondas, n. 6, 12; Polybius, Bk. XVI, chap. xi. Thus such a licence can by no means be extended to promises. Add Bacon, Essays, chap. vi.

18. After Grotius [III. i], § 13, has declared that a lie arises 328 from a violation of the right which a man has to know the thought of another, he draws the following conclusion from his statement: That it is not a lie when we make a false statement to another person, who is not deceived thereby, even though a third party may receive from it a false impression. For it is supposed that it is a private business between me and a second party, and that a third party has no concern in it. Therefore, the other person is not deceived by my feigned remarks, since he fully understands my thought from what I have said, just as if I should spin a fable, or use some irony or hyperbole to one who understands my meaning. But I cannot be blamed with a lie to the third party because my business is not with him, and so he has no right whereby he should know what is in my mind. Whatever opinion he forms upon that which is said not to him but to another, he can lay to his own curiosity. But to prevent this privilege from being abused, it should be observed that two men should not agree to use such occasions to make sport of a third. For even though that third party has no full right to understand me, the law of humanity and charity nevertheless requires that my speech should not be the occasion of his receiving an injury beyond his desert. Therefore, the distinction should be carefully observed between the case in which a man hears the remarks of others through no fault of his own, and that in which he listens in on their secrets from wantonness or malicious inquisitiveness.

This principle, therefore, is to be invoked especially against those ὠτακουσθαί [busybodies] who strive secretly to overhear, with designing ears, the conversation of other men. When we do not wish to keep silent altogether, we usually avoid the importunate curiosity of such men by turning our conversation to some other matter, or by agreeing to invent some tale for which the hearer will be laughed at if he pass it on to others, in the persuasion that he has happened upon some great secret. And this is proper, provided neither he nor others suffer therefrom any further harm.

We know, of course, that no one should detract from another's honour and position, and make him a laughing-stock. Yet just as we feel that we have not sinned if we disclose another man's error, provided it be done without rancour and insult, which are so unworthy of men of breeding, and even though it detract somewhat from his reputation rather than add to it; so nothing prevents us from correcting, even by making a man an object of ridicule, some defect in his character which is troublesome to us, so that he may rid himself of it. For it is not judged unlawful to correct and reprove others, merely because that tends to lessen their reputation of excellence. Thus, since it is universally to the advantage of mankind that men should not know the private matters of all others, it is established by the tacit agreement of all peoples that sealed documents are to be opened only by the one to whom they are addressed. Therefore, if I observe that some one is prying into the private matters of my correspondence, I will surely do no wrong in putting into a letter which he will open some matters which he will get no great pleasure from reading. So if there is a boy in the house who regularly gets into all the food stored in the pantry, no injury will be done him if we reprove his greediness by putting among the jars one of very bitter content. You may bring under this heading the story given by Herodotus, Bk. I [clxxxvii], of Nitocris or Semiramis, who had the following words carved on her tomb: 'If any king of the Babylonians is greatly in need of treasure, let him open my tomb and take as much as he chooses.' But when Darius opened the tomb, he found instead of a treasure only the following words: 'Hadst thou not been insatiate of pelf, thou wouldst not have broken open the sepulchres of the dead' (R.); or as Maximus of Tyre [xx. IX e] gives it: 'O greediest of men! who had the audacity to touch a corpse in your passion for gold.' See also Ad. Olearius, Itinerarium, Bk. IV, chap. vii. 329 Indeed, to put confidence in such inscriptions is evidence as much of credulity as of avarice. They were in the right who, in the story given by Gellius, Bk. I, chap. xxiii, of the incident of Papirius, praise the force of his argument, that is, the wit and discretion of one so young, but censure his address, as lacking in the respect due his mother, especially since his jest produced a petition, surely of little credit to matrons, that 'One wife would better have two husbands than two wives one'. Yet I have never yet been able to bring myself to any great anger towards that husband, who, in Plutarch, De Garrulitate [p. 507 B ff.], to meet his wife's incessant curiosity to know the deliberations of the senate, told her about a quail which was seen flying across the forum with a gold helmet. Yet he should have seen to it that others should not be frightened for nothing, nor suffer any damage by his wife spreading the tale. For the subsequent enjoyment of the story easily made up for the temporary mistake.

Now if care must be taken to keep a third person from being deceived by the one who deserved the ridicule that we laid upon him, all the less will it be permissible to persuade a man to something that is not so, to the end that he may deceive a third person, although the man himself may possibly receive no injury. For it is offensive to be used as the instrument to deceive another, while we ourselves are the ones who deceive a person, whether we do it directly, or through another person suborned by us. Although not a few have taken up the art of first cheating those by whose agency they plan to cheat others. See Seneca, Thyestes, line 320. Of course, because '[Does it make] so little difference whether you say things honestly and naturally or after preparation?' (S.) Terence, Andria, Act IV, sc. iv [794]. Add also Gellius, Bk. XII, chap. xii.

19. It is clear that since the obligation to disclose our mind ceases between enemies, a man can, without censure of lying, make false statements to them, and terrify them, or inflict some damage upon them by false reports, provided no undeserved damage arise therefrom to a third party who is our friend. For what prevents us from inflicting damage upon one by cunning and without any peril to ourselves, whom we may hurt by open violence? The reason why some have spurned this manner of injuring an enemy is not because they believed that it violated some right, but because among more hardy spirits glory only attaches to those acts against an enemy, which show a certain vigour and dash on the part of mind and body.

But what is said about deceiving an enemy should in no wise be extended to any pacts entered into with the enemy about concluding peace, or about an armistice. For since the law of nature commands that peace be maintained as far as possible, and that any violence offered it be healed, it is also understood to enjoin the use of the means without which that end cannot be attained. And yet enemies cannot meet together again to make peace, unless there is a mutual obligation clearly to reveal their thoughts on the present matter, and consequently¹ unless the necessity of their mutual suspicion is removed by an obligation to speak the truth in their negotiations for peace. And when it is said that it is lawful to deceive and injure an enemy by false speech, that should under no circumstance be so extended as to allow the dissemination of false crimes and atrocities about the enemy in order to impair his reputation. It is true that the state of hostility makes it allowable for me to conceal my thoughts from the enemy, or to find a way to injure him by the dissemination of false reports; but if a man, who undertakes to accuse an enemy of a crime, wishes his word to be believed among those who are neutral in the conflict, he should lay aside designs of war, and deport himself as a purveyor of the truth, and assume before his audience the attitude of an historian. If, then, he wilfully strays from the truth of matters, he will be unable to escape the censure of being a liar and a calumniator. But to accuse falsely an 330 enemy to his face is the act of an impotent reviler; while to meet lies with other lies is merely to copy the fruitless example of the enemy. Add Ludovicus Montaltius [Pascal], Lettres, xv, and notes. But when Lipsius, Politica, Bk. IV, chap. xiv, n. 32, joins foreigners with enemies as those against whom dissimulation and evasion should be used, his statement can be admitted only in so far as it is to our advantage to hide our counsels and affairs from their knowledge. For the common kinship of all men does not permit us at our will to bring any loss to such persons by false statements.

20. It is more difficult to decide whether a defendant may deny a crime with which he is charged, or evade it with false arguments, and yet not be guilty of a lie. There is here no reference to the divine tribunal before which one would do best to make his humble confession and implore forgiveness. Surely it would be no less impious than foolish to endeavour to avail oneself of evasion and negation before the Omniscient God. On this reason rests the plea in Joshua, vii. 19-20, for the guilty person there was pointed out by the divine witness. Therefore the question concerns human judgements, and these have two ends in view: First, that each person may receive what is owed him; and second, that those men may be restrained by punishment who either have already dared in their wickedness to violate the rights of others, or would violate them because of their sluggish regard for justice, did they not fear that the punishments which have befallen others would likewise be their fate.

Some feel that it is not proper to use falsehood in order to avoid the severity of punishments, primarily because the judge has a right to know the truth. And that neither the sanctity of judges, who act in the place of God, nor the necessity of obedience, gives any room for circumvention or contumacy. They add that confession is not so much necessary as denial is dangerous, for once the crimes have been disclosed the punishment is all the greater. And this especially when not deeds but false propositions are advanced, since to do this is prejudicial, first in itself, and secondly, because one false statement gives rise to no end of others.

But the opposite opinion seems preferable to others, who feel that a distinction should be drawn in every offence between the damage inflicted and the guilt itself, to the former of which corresponds restitution, to the latter the punishment proper. By natural law every man is supposed to make restitution for any damage occasioned by his transgression; but on the other hand every one that repents and makes restitution should be granted pardon. Therefore, every man who commits an offence is bound by an obligation, properly so called, to stand always ready to make reparation for damage caused by himself. But no man is required to give himself over of his own accord to punishment, or to inform against himself. When the offence is still concealed, and restitution cannot be made openly without confessing the crime, it should be made indirectly and in some secret manner. For punishment should be inflicted on a man against his will, since otherwise it cannot obtain its end, which is to deter by fear the guilty one and others from sinning. But whatever we are obligated to do should be done willingly, and without coercion. Since, therefore, no one is obligated to invite punishment upon himself (see Digest, XLVIII. xxi. 1), and a man cannot naturally avoid shrinking from such a thing in every way open to him, especially when it may mean even death or some other serious evil, there appears no good reason why a person may not avoid it in any way possible, provided no injury be done a third party. Compare, however, Digest, XLVIII. iii. 13.

Nor is it to the real interest of a State that, after the damage for an offence has been made good, it should be punished while yet unknown to the public, and for that reason able still to be covered over or excused with some show of reason. Therefore, as only a fool will deny manifest misdeeds, so it seems possible to conclude, from what has been said, that the charge of guilt may also be evaded by a false defence. But it is idle for the prisoner to adduce false propositions, for it is supposed that the judge is cognizant of the law. Indeed, the judge has the power to 331 extort the truth by every means possible, provided the matter is of such importance that the safety of the state absolutely requires punishment for it. Therefore a judge is free from the censure of having lied, if he contrives some falsehood in order to worm out his crime from the prisoner; suppose, for instance, he says that he has knowledge of the matter from another party, or that he will do such and such a thing, if he persists in his denial, and the like. (Although Grotius on Deuteronomy, xiii. 8, observes that the Hebrews allowed the use of deceit in order to find the guilty party, only in the offence of enticement to the worship of false gods.) But it does not follow at once from this that the defendant is himself bound to confess his crime. For not every faculty, which implies the mere exercise of some act, has a corresponding obligation in its object; while there are other means of getting at the truth of the matter, such as by arguments and the evidence of witnesses. These last, even when unsworn, are obligated at the command of the civil power to tell the truth when questioned about the offence of another person.

Furthermore, so much favour is allowed self-defence that it is held even odious to condemn unheard patent criminals; and it is not held against a man if he advances any kind of plea for his deed. See Digest, XLVIII. xvii. 1 pr., and the remarks upon that section by Grotius, Florum Sparsio. No human tribunal has all the attributes of the divine, nor does a judge on earth preside with such majesty as does God.

Yet if a defendant is not bound to confess his own offence, his negation in no way infringes upon his duty to obey the civil power. Yet usually a crime is more severely punished because of the contumacy shown by the defendant in his denial, since a voluntary confession would seem to indicate penitence which greatly decreases the offender's guilt. But the question as to whether it is more advantageous to enter a crafty¹ denial than to embrace the ingenuousness of an open confession, belongs to a discussion of a different nature, not to the point now before us which concerns what a man is or is not obligated to do. Which of these opinions is to be preferred to the other, any man who knows how to weigh the force of arguments will easily recognize. It is a very interesting thing which is told us by Haythonus, chap. xlviii, History of the Tartars. Although they are confirmed liars in general, in two cases they will not lie: not one of them ever lays claim to any brave deed which he has not actually achieved; and if a man has committed a crime, for which he knows he may even be put to death, he never conceals the truth when questioned by his lord. Furthermore, among the Japanese it is a capital offence to be caught in a lie before the judge.

21. But what licence will be allowed the advocate in such matters? Here we must distinguish between civil and criminal cases. In the former it does not appear that the advocate can with good conscience hinder the other party from getting his right at the earliest opportunity. And so in such cases we hold unlawful not only false claims and fictitious arguments, but also dilatory quibblings, since they all delay the one in delivering what he owes, and the other in receiving what is due him. Cf. Digest [Code] IX. xxii. 9, § ult. But in criminal cases, where the only issue is the penalty, I should feel that the further point should be considered whether, namely, the advocate has been appointed by the court to take the case of the defendant, or whether he has been retained by the latter himself. In the former case it does not appear that he has been allowed to use false charges or specious pleas, since he is appointed by the court to repel any calumnies directed against the defendant, and to see that no injustice is done him. This purpose is served by his merely testing the arguments of the prosecutor. But when the advocate has been retained by the defendant to defend him, I should feel that he can use the same means of defence as the defendant could, were he to plead his own cause, since the advocate acts only as his spokesman. Cicero, For Cluentius [1]:

Whoever thinks that he has my positive opinions recorded indelibly in those orations which we have delivered in the courts of justice is greatly mistaken. For all those speeches are speeches of the cause, and of the occasion, and are not the speeches of the men or of the advocates themselves. (Y.) 332

The same author, On Duties, Bk. II [xiv], maintains that it is not contrary to any moral duty to defend now and then a guilty person. Nor, indeed, will justice be in great danger from this permission, for inasmuch as a knowledge of the law is supposed on the judge's part, the advocate will not accomplish anything in adducing fictitious laws or false opinions. Nor is any credence given to a man who advances facts, unless he has shown sufficient proof for them. If, therefore, sometimes the guilty escape punishment by such arguments, the blame will lie not with the advocate or the defendant, but with the judge, who did not have wits enough to distinguish between real currency and stage money. Yet Plato, Laws, Bk. XI, towards the end, apparently does not sanction such practices in his ideal state, and according to Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvi, the ancient Egyptians felt that the speeches of such pleaders obscured the law in a heavy fog. Especially since, as Euripides, Phoenician Maidens [471 ff.], says: 'Truth deserves a simple speech,' and therefore such as stands in no need of the divers evasions of interpreters;

But the unrighteous plea,
Having no soundness, needeth cunning salves. (W.)

Pindar, Nemean Odes, vii [70-1]: 'For an honest cause three words will suffice.' (S.) Isocrates, To Demonicus [37], also has this good advice: 'If the cause is bad, do not support it or plead for it; for it will be thought that you are doing yourself what you assist others in doing.' (F.)

It is clear, from what has been said, how far we should admit the following statement of Quintilian, Institutes of Oratory, Bk. II, chap. xvii [27]: 'To tell a falsehood is sometimes allowed, even to a wise man; and the orator will be compelled to appeal to the feelings of the judges, if they cannot otherwise be induced to favour the right side.' (W.) And his further statement (XII. i [41]): 'Even that which appears, when it is first stated, of so objectionable a character, that a good man, in defending a cause, may sometimes incline to withhold the truth from the judge, reason may find cause to justify.' (W.) Yet the illustrations which he advances in this passage require a more accurate consideration. He says: 'Misrepresentations can be used in the defence of a man who has made an attempt upon the life of a tyrant.' (W.) This comes from the principle of the Greeks, that the murder of tyrants is lawful. But it is otherwise unlawful to defend by false arguments a man guilty of treason against his sovereign, to whom he has sworn faith, for the reason that every citizen is obligated to defend him with all his might. This obligation cannot accord with the attempt to free a traitor to his sovereign from his just penalty.

He continues: 'Or what if a judge would condemn a man for something that was done with justice, unless we convince him that it was not done: would not an orator, by producing such a conviction, save the life of a fellow-citizen, when he is not only innocent, but deserving of praise.' (W.) But such a case is scarcely imaginable. For that which should go under the name of a good deed, must necessarily accord with the laws of the State. And it does not appear how a man may be called into court for such a deed. Let us grant, therefore, that a man by some good deed has incurred the envy of wicked citizens who have later secured possession of the courts. If such a deed was well known, and a disgraceful charge is levelled against the defendant because of it, there is no use in his undertaking to deny it. Thus, if Cicero had been called to judgement for the execution of the associates of Catiline, it would have been folly for him to undertake to deny the charge. But when the deed can still be denied with some plausibility, surely nothing will prevent an innocent defendant from¹ defending himself before wicked judges with false arguments as well as true.

In another case offered by Quintilian, where the orator wishes to plead against such things 'as are just by nature, but disadvantageous to the State in the condition of the times', there is no advantage in trying to show by false argument that those just things are unjust. It is enough to point out that what can be done justly should not necessarily be done at all times; and that the present times require that the useful be preferred to what seems just and right. And this can be urged also by true arguments.

The hope of the future reform of the defendant may lead the advocate to hesitate less¹ in lending the aid of his wits to his client to help him avoid punishment, since the advocate knows that acquittal will not be to the prejudice of the State. Fictitious arguments will be of no avail to rescue from punishment a good general who is manifestly guilty of crime, but whose services are necessary, if the State is to be victorious. The simpler course to follow is that used by Marcus Antonius in defending Manius² Aquilius, as Cicero tells us in his Against Verres, Bk. V [i. 3]. 333

WE must now consider the nature of an oath, something that is looked upon as adding great force to our speech and all acts which are framed upon speech. Although it could well be discussed below, where we treat the enforcement of pacts, yet we have preferred to take it up at this special place, because not only pacts, but mere speech as well, are usually confirmed by an oath. Hence it is that among the Hebrews it was not felt that oaths as well as vows carried any obligation, unless they were delivered in speech. See Grotius on Leviticus, v. 4, and Numbers, xxx. 3, Deuteronomy, xxiii. 23. But among the other ancient peoples the greatest force and sanctity was attached to an oath, so that it was held that the most severe penalty awaited perjurers, and even passed down upon their descendants; and the mere will to commit perjury, without the act, incurred a penalty. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiii, § 1; Philo Judaeus, De Sacrificiis [Abelis et Caini, xxviii]: 'Our opinions are confirmed by an oath; but an oath itself is confirmed by the addition of the name of God.' (Y.) Among the Egyptians¹ 'Those were to die who were guilty of perjury, being such as committed the two greatest crimes; that is, impiety towards the gods, and violation of faith and truth, the strongest bonds of human society.' (B.) Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxvii.

2. An oath is a religious declaration, whereby we renounce our claim upon God's pity, or call down His punishment upon us if we do not speak the truth. For that this is the nature of oaths is easily discernible from the formulæ in which they are usually couched; such as 'So help me God'; 'God be my witness'; 'God be my judge', or their equivalents, which amount to practically the same thing. For when a superior having the right of punishment is called in as a witness, vengeance for the perfidy is at once sought of him; and He who knoweth all things is the avenger, because He is the witness. In this very fact lies the most severe punishment, if God in His mercy does not come to man's aid. Plutarch, Roman Questions [xliv]: 'Every oath ends in a curse of the perjurer.' (R.) In the same passage he has this to say 334 on the reasons why the Flamen Dialis among the Romans was not allowed to take an oath:

Is it because an oath is a kind of freeman's torture, and both soul and body of the priest must be untortured? Or because it is absurd to distrust in trifles one who is entrusted with all-important divine affairs? Or because every oath ends in a curse on the perjurer, and a curse is an ill-omened thing and unlucky? This is why priests are forbidden to curse others also. We know that that Athenian priestess who would not curse Alcibiades at the people's bidding was well thought of; she declared that she was made priestess to pray, not to curse. Or because the danger in case of perjury is public, if an impious and perjured man takes the lead in vows and prayers on behalf of the State? (R.)

But it should not be inferred from the fact that God is said to be called in as a witness in an oath, that an oath is to be taken as the witness of God, or that God himself is made a witness to the veracity of the swearer, as apparently is the view of Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Oaths, Prelection I, § 6. But to call in the all wise and all powerful as a witness or arbiter, as well as a vindicator, is itself a presumption of truth, since no one is supposed to be so impious as to dare lightly to call upon himself the vengeance of Almighty God. And so perjury is by far the most monstrous of sins, since the perjurer witnesses thereby that he despises God, but fears men, and since he shows himself bold before God, and timid before men. See Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. III, chap. x, n. 7.

Also the end of oaths may suggest their real sense. This is that men may be more strictly held to tell the truth and keep a promise of their fear of God as omnipotent and omniscient, whose punishment they call down upon themselves because of the oath, if they knowingly deceive; while otherwise their fear of men did not seem effective enough, since they hoped that they could despise or evade their strength, or deceive their knowledge. Lucian, Phalaris, I [i]: 'Although mere men are no doubt easy to cheat, a god [. . .] cannot be hoodwinked.' (H.) Pliny, Letters, Bk. IV, ep. xxv: "'Who will find out?'" is the argument that most of all emboldens little and base men to act in this way.' (B.) For when the man who deceives us in bare promise or asseveration, cannot conceal himself or avoid human punishment, it seems superfluous to require an oath. Demosthenes, De falsa Legatione [lxxi]: 'For the man that escapes you, leave to the gods to punish; but do not leave to their judgement any one whom you once get your hands upon.' (K.) For this reason I should judge that it was absurd for the Roman law, on the other hand, to permit a woman to swear that she is not pregnant. See Digest, XII. ii. 3, § 3. And this is all the more true because respect for an oath loses much of its force among many people by its excessive use. Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ii, § 23. And I like much the tenet of Pythagoras [Diodorus, X. ix. 2], who used to command his followers 'rarely to make an oath, but, when once they had done so, by all means to stand by it'. A similar advice is that of Isocrates, To Demonicus [23]: 'For money's sake swear by no god, not even if you intend to swear a true oath; for those who do not think you are swearing falsely will think you are grasping.' (F.*) Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. II, chap. x, § 2 ext.: 'The most faithful of mortals are those whose only oath is to keep their word'. See Curtius, Bk. VII, chap. viii [29]. Oedipus speaks thus in Sophocles, Oedipus at Colonus [650-1]:

OEDIPUS: No need to back thy promise with an oath.

THESEUS: An oath would be no surer than my word. (S.)

335 Epictetus, Enchiridion, chap. xliv, and Simplicius, on the passage.

Now just as it is proper that the greatest religious scruples be attached to oaths, so it is presumptuous to expect¹ or demand that the truth or falsity of oaths be proved by some immediate miracle, as if God were bound to exercise His function at the whim of men's judgements. Yet this belief prevailed not merely among the non-Christians, but was most common as well among Christians in the barbarous ages. Sophocles, Antigone, 269 f. [264 f.]:

We challenged each
The ordeal, or to handle red-hot iron
Or pass through fire, affirming on our oath,
Our innocence [. . .] (S.)

See the formulae of exorcism in Marculphus. Phil. Baldaeus, De Idololatria Indorum, the last chapter, reports that among the Malabars a man who is going to take a purgative oath has the first three fingers of his hand dipped in boiling butter, wrapped in a leaf, and then inspected after three days. Others are commanded to swim across a stream, between Cochin and Cranganor, that is infested with crocodiles. Still others must pluck an apple out of a jar filled with serpents. If they do all this without injury they are adjudged to be innocent. See also Bernhard Varenus, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xviii, and Jodocus Schouten, Descriptio Regni Siam, where he described the process¹ of their judicial procedure. Eusebius, in Stobaeus, Florilegium 27 [III. xxvii. 13]: 'Many exhort men to keep their oaths, but I regard it as a man's duty not lightly to swear in the first place.' Add Grotius on Matthew, v. 34.

And if we should confess the real truth, oaths prove or presuppose man's lack of confidence, unfaithfulness, ignorance, and passion. For what use would there be for oaths, if we had sufficient confidence in the faith and constancy of another, if there were no instances of perfidy, or if we had enough strength to force him to fulfil his obligation? Why, finally, should a judge try to find out a matter from sworn witnesses, if he were not ignorant of it himself? This principle is, in my opinion, the basis of that statement of Frederick in Gunther, Ligurius, Bk. III [511 ff.]: 'Right and reverence,² above any oath, doth abide in the naked words of a king.' And this not only because it is of the greatest interest to rulers that their honour should be held sacred, but also because their majesty is tarnished if even a suspicion of perfidy, falsehood, or deception seems to touch them. Thus Garcilasso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. II, chap. iii, tells us that among the inhabitants of Peru no use was made of oaths, but those who were going to testify merely promised that they would tell the truth to the Inca.

3. Now since there is nothing omniscient or omnipotent besides God, it clearly follows that it is absurd to swear by anything which is not held to be divine, at least in the sense that that thing is called as a witness and an avenger of perjury. Therefore, the heathen commonly swore by the heavenly bodies, because they were believed to be gods, but for Christians to imitate them in this would be impious and absurd. But undoubtedly some oaths should be taken as mere jokes, such as those of Socrates, 'by the dog,' 'by the goose' (whatever may be said to the contrary by Porphyry, On Abstaining from Animal Food, Bk. III [xvi]), 'by the plane-tree,' that of Zeno, 'by the caper-bush,' or of others, 'by the cabbage.' See Athenaeus, Banquet of the Learned, Bk. IX, chap. ii [IX. ix]. They swore by such as these, not that they might swear by the gods, but to avoid swearing by the gods, as Apollonius of Tyana expresses it, in Philostratus, Bk. VI [ix], after there had grown up among most men the evil custom of using oaths as a kind of adornment and supplement to their speech.

But the most frequent by far of the oaths among the ancients were those by things which a man held dear or valued highly. Ascanius in 336 Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. IX [300], says: 'By my head I swear, by which my father swore before me.' (B.) Thus you may read everywhere of a man swearing by his own head or soul, or those of his dearest friends. Lovers held most sacred an oath by the sparkling eyes, the sweet lips, the golden locks of their sweetheart. Ovid, Amores, Bk. III, el. iii [13-14]: 'By her own eyes not long ago she swore, I mind me, and by mine—and mine have been the ones to smart!' (S.) All these cannot have the meaning that such things are invoked as witnesses and as avengers of perjury, which is believed, among others, by Apuleius, De Deo Socratis [5]; or that they are called as witnesses, as though, created by God, they shared in His attributes, showing forth, that is, His truth, goodness, power; and that a person both recognizes that he enjoys them by God's mercy and would not be deprived of them by His justice, as if they would say, 'I swear by my life', that is 'by God, to whom I am indebted for my life'. This is the view, among others, of Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Oaths, Prelection I, § 4.

But they called God to witness, so that He might take vengeance for their perjury on such things, as being most dear to them. Ovid, Tristia, Bk. IV, el. iv [45-6]: 'Swearing it by his own life and by thine which I know he counts not cheaper than his own.' (W.) Just as it was the custom among the Athenians in their oaths to condemn themselves and their family to death, if they broke their word; and, on the contrary, to ask from the gods every blessing on themselves and theirs, if they swore truly, as is to be found frequently in Demosthenes. Add Antiphon, Orations, XV [v. 11]. And they believed that the violation of such an oath brought down the wrath of the gods on the heads of others as well.

An interesting example of this last is in Pliny, Letters, Bk. II, ep. xx, where he tells how Regulus once visited Verania who was seriously ill, and persuaded her that he knew from his observation of the stars that she would get well:

Upon this the good woman, whose danger made her credulous, calls for her will and gives Regulus a legacy. She grew worse shortly after this; and in her last moments exclaimed against this wicked, treacherous, and worse than perjured wretch, who had sworn falsely to her by his own son's life. (Pliny adds): But imprecations of this sort are as common with Regulus as they are impious; and he continually devotes that unhappy youth to the curses of those gods whose vengeance his own frauds every day provoke. (B.)

Lysias, Oratio adversus Diagitonem [Orations, xxxii. 13]:

I am ready,¹ whenever you please, to swear an oath by the heads of those children and of the others that were later born to me. And yet I am not so miserable nor do I value money so highly, as to care to die² after calling down a curse upon my children, and to take away property from my own father unjustly.

In this connexion you may, in passing, mention that among the Banjans of India, who hold in greatest esteem the worship of cows, one of their most sacred oaths is to hold up a butcher's knife beside a cow and say: 'If this is not true', or 'If I do not fulfil my promise, may

² [So most modern texts. Pufendorf follows a version which would mean: 'to secure a livelihood for my children by calling down', &c.—Tr.]

this cow be struck through with this knife.' Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. iii. 3.

From these facts the meaning is also clear of those oaths which used to be made by the head, or genius, or safety of the ruler, as is still done among the Persians, and, according to Petrus de Valle, Viaggi, Pt. II, ep. i, are held more sacred than oaths made only in the name of God. The reason for such oaths is not because they believed that there was any divinity in their rulers while still alive, nor because they called down the wrath of their sovereigns upon themselves if they played false, but because many men, seriously or in flattery, wished to appear to value the safety of their ruler above their own, and therefore to hold it more heinous to bring down the wrath of the gods upon his head than upon their own. Therefore, the meaning of such oaths is properly as follows: 'May the health of my prince be so as I shall do this', that is, 'If I do not perform my oath, I pray that God may vent his wrath upon my prince.' Augustine has well said, as quoted by Grotius, Sparsio Florum, on Digest XII. ii. 33 [Sermones, clxxx. 7]:

What else is swearing [iurare] but paying your due [ius dare] to God, when you swear by God? paying your dues to your children, when you swear by your children? Now what right do we owe to our safety, to our children, to our God, except that of love, and truth, and not of falsehood? [. . .] When any man says, 'By my safety', he engages his safety to God, when he says, 'By my children', he consigns his children as a pledge to God, implying that whatever falls from his lips shall light upon their heads, truth if he speaks truth, falsehood if he speaks falsely. Whatever, therefore, a person names in his oath, whether it be his children, his head, or his safety, he puts those under obligation to God. 337

Therefore, although Philo Judaeus, On Special Laws [II. i], is entirely to be commended when he condemns profane looseness in taking oath, yet the following words do not merit a vote of approval:

Even if particular necessities shall compel a man to swear, then he should make the witness to his oath the health or happy old age of his father or mother, if they are alive; or their memory, if they are dead. And, indeed, a man's parents are the copies and imitations of divine power, since they have brought people who had no existence into existence [. . .]. And those men also deserve to be praised, who, when they were compelled to swear, by their slowness, and delay, and evasion, cause fear not only to those who see them but to those also who invite them to take an oath; for when they do pronounce the oath they are accustomed to say only thus much, 'By the —'; [. . .] without any further addition, giving an emphasis to these words by the mutilation of the usual form, but without uttering the express oath [. . .]. For a man can add, if he pleases, not indeed the highest name of all, and the most important cause of all things, but the earth, the sun, the stars, the heaven, the universal world. (Y.*)

Nor can I see how any excuse can be offered for that oath of Christian soldiers, given by Vegetius, De Re Militari, Bk. II, chap. v, embodying a far too rude and excessive reverence for their emperors: 'They swear by God, and by Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the majesty of the Emperor, which next to God is to be loved and cherished by the human race. For when our Emperor has taken on the title "Augustus", he must be served with a faithful devotion, and presented with a watchful service as though he were God present in the body.' For even if we concede the truth of the reason which he adds, namely, that 'a civilian or a soldier, then, serves God when he faithfully loves him who reigns by God's authority', that is no reason why an oath should be taken by the majesty of the Emperor, in the same way as by the name of God. Nor do common soldiers have such subtlety as to be able to use in the same formula the word 'by' in two senses, as they speak of God and of the emperor respectively. Indeed, according to Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, Bk. IV, chap. xiv, it is clear that to swear by the fortune of the emperor, which Polycarp steadfastly refused to do, was one of the proofs that a Christian had renounced his religion. Thus I question whether the form of oath is to be approved, which Charles Gonzaga instituted for his new order of knights: 'I swear by the eternal God and the ancient nobility which I profess' (Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. V). It is obvious also from this that it was not without reason, in former times, that they who had sworn falsely by the head or safety of their prince were severely punished, since it was believed that by so doing they had made their prince, with whose fortune the safety of the State was so intimately connected, liable to the punishment of heaven. See Digest, XII. ii. 13, § f. [XII. ii. 13, § 6]. Thus we are told in Herodotus, Bk. IV, that when their king fell ill the Scythians used to inquire whether any citizen had sworn falsely by the king's throne; and that, if such was the case, the perjured man was executed. In Zosimus, Bk. V [li], the magistrates replied that the demands of Alaric, fair enough though they were, could not be granted, since they had sworn by the head of the emperor that they would make no peace with him: 'If their oath had been made to God, possibly it could have been neglected, relying upon the divine mercy for pardoning such sin, but since they had sworn by the head of the emperor, it was morally impossible for them to transgress so solemn an oath.' In Capitularies of Charles, Bk. III, chap. xlii, a man is forbidden to swear 'by the life of the king or of his children'. In Digest, XII. ii. 33, Ulpian admits that it is an oath when a man swears by his own safety, but he says that it is not binding unless the oath was delivered to him in that particular form. Add Digest, XII. ii. 3, § 4; ii. 4; ii. 5 pr. And that was because oaths are taken for the sake of the person who delivers them. For this reason it is customary for oaths to be taken in 338 the words given by him who delivers them, in order that they may be binding in the meaning which he intended (cf. Livy, Bk. XXII, chap. xxxviii [1 ff.]); and that the swearer might not attempt to avoid the force of the oath by using oaths couched in scheming or ambiguous terms. Another reason is because such oaths lose their reverence by virtue of constant use, and so one person is not obligated to accept as a solemn oath the trite formula of another person, which often enough punctuates his speech, without his thinking about it. Nay, Hobbes, Leviathan, chap. xiv, is right when he says that such asseverations are not oaths, but an abuse of the name of God, arising from a depraved habit of men who make all their asseverations too vehement.

From what has been said, it is clear that even though execrations, taken in their special sense, as when a man merely calls down evils upon himself or others, or offers himself and others to dire punishment, are not oaths, they nevertheless are to be taken as part of an oath, in so far as they are directed to an assertion or promise of ours. Cf. Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiii, § 10. And this attitude should be extended to those petitions wherein a man prays that some good may befall him, according as he keeps his oath. An example of such is the following in Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XII, chap. ix: 'So may I dash out the brains of Timesias.' Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXIV, chap. v [39]:

But Julian encouraged his army not by the idea of their families, but by the thought of the greatness of the enterprise on which they were embarked: < continually making vows >—'So might he be able to make the Persians pass under the yoke'; 'So might he restore the Roman power which had been shaken in those regions,'—in imitation of Trajan, who was accustomed frequently to confirm anything he had said by the imprecations—'So may I see Dacia reduced to the condition of a province; so may I bridge over the Danube and Euphrates.' (Y.)

Add also Grotius on Genesis, xxiv. 2. Thus the Patanes of Hindustan are such a proud people that they often use as their oath, 'May I never be king in Delhi, if this be not so.' Whence, also, we see the proper explanation of those oaths which occur in the Holy Scriptures, where even godly men mention created things. See Genesis, xlii. 15; 2 Samuel, xiv. 19; 1 Samuel, xxv. 26; 1 Kings, ii. 23; 2 Kings, v. 4 and 6. So also it is shown by Matthew, xxiii. 16 ff., that the Jews of a later time very frequently swore by the head, the heavens, the temple, its gold, the altar, and by victims. Our Saviour in that passage severely criticizes the profane abuse of such oaths and their petty distinctions. Didymus in the Scholiast on Homer, Iliad, Bk. I, 234 [Scholia A], explains the words: 'Yea, by this sceptre,' in this wise: 'We must realize that in mentioning the sceptre he swears by God, the protector of the throne.' That passage of Homer has been imitated by Valerius Flaccus, Argonautica, Bk. III [707 ff.]:

This spear, the spoil of great-hearted Didymaon, which shall never put forth green branches, nor shade, now that it has once been torn from the ridges, and its mother has been slain; and sternly meets its faithful ministrations and hard battles—this spear I call upon, and this I swear to thee, O leader, by every deity.¹

Cf. Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. XII, line 396. Yet Ovid, Remedy for Love, Bk. II [783-4], says: 'For, inasmuch as the son of Atreus swore by his sceptre that the daughter of Briseus had never been touched by him; 'tis clear that he did not think his sceptre was the Gods'.' (R.) Add Grotius, loc. cit., § 11. The Persians in later times used to swear by salt, according to Procopius, Persian War, Bk. I, chap. iv. And Ducas, Historia Byzantina, chap. xxiii, writes that the Turkish emperor Mohammed took an oath to Bajazet, his vizier, by bread and salt.

4. Now that formula in oaths, by which God is called upon as a witness or avenger, should be taken in accordance with the belief or religion which the swearer entertains towards God. For it is idle to try to hold a man to an oath by a god whom he does not believe in, and so is not afraid of. And no man thinks that he swears by God in any other formula, or under any other name, than such as is contained in the precepts of his religion, the only true one in the opinion of the swearer. Hence it follows that he who swears by false gods, whom he holds to be true ones, is bound by his oath, and if he plays false, is guilty of actual perjury; for he had before his eyes a concept of God of some nature or other, and so, in knowingly perjuring himself, he violated, so far as he could, his reverence for the divine majesty. 339 Juvenal, Satires, XV [37-8]: 'Each place hates its neighbour's gods, and believes that those only ought to be held as deities which itself worships.' (E.) Add Digest, XII. ii. 5, § 1, which is not opposed by Digest, XII. ii. 5, § 3, and [Gratian], Causa xxii, Quaestio v, chap. 10. But if a man accepts an oath in a formula of that religion which the swearer holds as true, but he, the recipient, does not, the latter does by no means thereby give the seal of his approval to that religion, or hold it to be true. Thus, the man who accepts an oath from a Jew does not approve the tenets of a man who denies that the one God, Creator of heaven and earth, is the father of our Lord Jesus Christ. But I question whether the illustration taken from Genesis, xxxii. 53, by Grotius, loc. cit., § 12, applies in this case, for the God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, and of their fathers, was the true God. Add [Gratian], Causa xxii, Quaestio i, chap. 16.

5. If an oath is to obligate one it is necessary that it be taken with deliberate thought. And so that man will not be bound by an oath, who, not realizing that he is swearing, repeats the mere phrases of an oath, who simply recites an oath and nothing more, or who dictates to another such words framed in the first person, as it is called. Add Digest, XLIV. vii. 3, § 2. And to this extent the saying of Lucian, Pro Lapsu inter Salutandum [xviii], can hold good: 'Never mind what he said; it is what he meant that matters.' (F.) Therefore, it was idle of Cydippe to create for herself a religious scruple when she had read the oath which Acontius had written on the apple. And she is right when she says in Ovid, Heroides [XXI. 135 ff.]:

It is the mind that swears, and I have taken no oath to that. It is counsel and the prudent reasoning of the soul that swears, and, except the bonds of the judgement, none avail. You possess in vain but words without a force of their own. I took no oath—I read words that formed an oath, &c. (S.)

A similar story is told by Antonius [Antoninus] Liberalis, Metamorphoses, at the beginning, of a maiden, Ctesylla of Ceos, whom an Athenian, Hermochares, beguiled by the same device.

But it would certainly be most absurd if a man, wishing to take an oath or showing every intention of doing so, is still unwilling to be obligated, and if he should say, that, when the oath was administered to him he intended to go through the mere recitation of the words and not to lay an obligation from them on his conscience. The real reason for this is not so much that an obligation is inseparable from an oath, and is its necessary effect, as that on such reasoning all use of oaths, indeed every manner of obligating oneself by an exchange of signs, would be taken from human intercourse if a man, by his own secret intention, could prevent an act having the effect for which it was instituted in the first place. Therefore, you will most surely be bound by your oath, whatever you may have in mind when you swore it, provided the man to whom it is made accepts your words as indicative of an oath, and you, when you tendered it, made every sign of acting seriously in the matter, and not of taking it as a jest. And, as a matter of fact, it is a pure contradiction to be willing to take an oath and yet to be unwilling to be obligated by the oath, to be willing to promise, and unwilling to be held by the promise, to be willing to speak in all seriousness, yet not in such a way that your words shall afford the use which common agreement has assigned them. And so it was a stupid reply of the people of Milan to Frederick I, when they said: 'It is true that we gave our oath, but we did not promise to keep it.' Radevicus, Bk. II, chap. xxv. Add Grotius on Matthew, v. 33. Here belong also the remarks of Petrus Suavis, History of the Council of Trent, Bk. I:

Whenever the papal seat is vacant, the cardinals usually draw up a number of articles into a document to reform the papal regimen, which they individually swear carefully to observe, if they are elected to the papacy; yet it is the witness of experience throughout all the ages that no one of them ever intends to abide by his oath, since immediately upon their election as Pope they claim that they could not be obligated, or that the assumption of that office has released them from the restraint of their oath.

Add Idem, Bk. V, p. 358, ed. Gorinch, 1658.

But if a man shall prove to have had such an absurd design in 340 taking an oath, the conclusion will be that he was only jesting. For instance, when the title of Doctor has been conferred upon a person in the accustomed manner, he shall be none the less a Doctor, even though the one who gave him the degree, all the time he was reciting the usual words, may have thought that he was investing an ass. But if an actor upon the stage with all pomp and ceremony bedecks a man with the robes of that degree, the man will be no more a Doctor than before. 'The very situation shows that the action is fictitious.' Quintilian, Declamations, cccxlii. From this it is clear that it is absurd to ask whether a man is obligated who repeated an oath with deliberate thought, but without the intention of actually swearing. For if he merely recited the words it is obvious that he did not swear and is not obligated. But when the thing was done in all seriousness, that is, when he who repeated the words gave every appearance of one who takes an oath, and the other party took his declaration in that sense, he unquestionably took an oath and is under an obligation, no matter what the swearer may secretly have had in his mind.

6. But this further point should be carefully noted: Oaths in themselves produce no new and distinct obligation, but come in as a kind of accessory bond to an obligation already valid in itself. For in the taking of an oath we presuppose something, upon the non-fulfilment of which we call down upon our heads the punishment of God. And this would be useless were it not unlawful to omit that which is presupposed, and, therefore, unless we were already obligated. Although a single sentence may often include both the principal obligation and the accessory bond of the oath, as if I should say: 'May God so help me as I will pay you one hundred something or other.' Yet an oath is not superfluous merely because it is added to an obligation that is already established. For although all men except atheists believe that God punishes the violation of promises, even though they have not bound themselves by an oath, still they are justly persuaded that those who have expressly called down the wrath of God, and to the best of their ability shut themselves off from His mercy, are punished all the more severely; since such a man perseveres in his evil course, with an intention so firm as to show that he does not care whether he displeases Him who has the power to dispense the greatest good as well as the greatest evil.

From what has been said, we conclude that those acts in which some intrinsic blemish, which prevents the rise of an obligation is inherent, are not obligatory, even when an oath is added to them. In the same way a preceding valid obligation is not destroyed by a subsequent oath, nor is the right which it gives a man thereby removed. And so it will do no good for a man to take an oath that he will not pay another his due.

7. It follows, also, that since in promises and pacts consent secured by error is not capable of producing an obligation, so an oath is not binding when it is established that the swearer supposed some fact, which was not actually as he thought, and that he would not have taken the oath, had he known that to be the case; especially when he was led to the error by the craft of the person to whom the oath is given. For here that fact has the force of a condition, the absence of which invalidates all that is based upon it. Thus, if a man brings me some good news from a distant place for which I promise him a reward upon my oath, I shall in no wise be bound by my oath after I have learned that he brought a false report. Grotius, loc. cit., § 4, adds the following on this case: 'If, however, it shall be doubtful whether a person would not have taken the same oath even without the erroneous supposition, he will have to stand by his words, because in an oath the greatest possible simplicity is required' (K.), and it must be clear of every kind of evasive explanation, and because the promise was not based on that error¹ alone, even though its scope may, perhaps, have been widened by virtue of that error. But the case is not yet entirely clear. For which of 341 the two will decide whether the promise would have been made, had the error been lacking? Surely not the man to whom the oath was given. For how may one person be able clearly to judge what the other's thought would have been if this or that condition had been true? No more can he who made the oath judge with sufficient certainty on this point; for of course the same thing is not equally pleasing to us at another time, nor if it is proposed at the same time, indeed, but in a different way. It seems probable, therefore, that such an oath is not even binding, at least in so far as it is built upon an error. But if a man out of respect for God decides not to recede from it altogether, he shall judge by the state of his affairs how far he can fulfil it conveniently.

In this place it may be to our purpose to make some comments on Joshua's fulfilment of his oath to the Gibeonites, Joshua, ix [3 ff.]. It should be observed, at the outset, that the cunning of the Gibeonites was not culpable, nor did it fall under the term of a lie properly speaking. For who may reprove a man if he tries by some false story to preserve his life from an enemy bent upon his destruction? In the next place, no damage properly speaking was caused to the Israelites by their stratagem. For a man suffers no loss if he is not permitted to shed the blood of another, whom he can, nevertheless, strip of all his property and keep in perpetual servitude, so disarmed and weakened that he can never afterwards rise in revolt. Therefore, the crux of the matter lies in this: Whether, namely, God by express command ordered them to put to death every one of the inhabitants of Canaan, even those who willingly bowed their necks to slavery and from whom no danger could come in the future. If this is absolutely affirmed, then the oath of Joshua was void; for it would only have served as a means of breaking the command of God, that is, Joshua would have called upon God to punish him unless he broke that command. Nor can it be said that Joshua wished to keep his oath, only in order that the respect owed Jehovah should receive no hurt among those peoples from his failure to keep a pact in which he had invoked the name of God. For no less prejudice would have followed if he had failed to execute some command laid upon him by God. And so Grotius feels that the injunction of Deuteronomy, xx. 16, had this added limitation: 'Unless they at once did what was commanded them,' for which he proceeds to point out several reasons. Add Selden, vi. 16, where he shows that such an extermination was not so much a command for the Israelites as an indulgence. And others feel that this position has added weight, from the consideration that the reason of that disposition is the following: Lest the people, at that time unusually inclined to follow strange beliefs, should imitate their idolatry, and furthermore, lest the ancient inhabitants, being left in large numbers, should order the new-comers to migrate again, especially if they lived with the latter on equal footing. See Judges, i. 34; ii. 2; iii. 5-6. With this danger removed, they say, some could surely be spared, and in particular such as had abjured the worship of idols.

However this may be, it is clear that when Joshua discovered the deception he nevertheless held to the letter of his oath. In a phrase much used by Orientals they had professed themselves servants of the Israelites and had requested a treaty. Joshua gives them their lives and enters into a treaty. By this their property and their liberty would have been left the Gibeonites, had they been what they claimed they were, that is, a nation beyond the bounds of those peoples whom God had destined for destruction. See 1 Kings, xx. 4. But, because of the deceit they had practised, he took their words in the strict sense, and left them nothing except their lives, and, as it appears, the bare means of existence. Add Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. x.

342 8. But what is to be thought of oaths extorted by unjust fear? Surely the man who by unjust fear has secured a sworn promise, is no less obligated to release the promise extorted by force, to which an oath was added, than if it had come from a person without an oath. Therefore, there seems to be no reason why, in this case as well, compensation may not be expected, according to the principles which we laid down above on fear. Indeed, Grotius, loc. cit., § 14, holds that:

If either the words of an oath do not have a man in view for the conferring of a right upon him, or if they do have him in view, but if there is something which can present an obstacle to his claim, then the force of the oath will be such that the man will indeed acquire no right, but nevertheless he who has sworn will be under obligation to God to keep his oath. (K.)

As an example of this he gives the instance of a man who has secured a promise by unjust fear. But an oath the words of which are directed not to a man, but to God, is entirely different in nature; for instance, if I say alone or before witnesses, 'I swear to God that I will give Seius so much.' (Add Paulus Servita, De Inquisitione, pp. 55-7, where he distinguishes between an oath directed to God and one placed in the hands of men.) Such an oath partakes of the nature of a vow, by which I promise God that I will fulfil something for His honour, and therefore by that I have resolved to confer a right not on a man but on God. But those oaths are different which are directed to a man, that is, when I promise a man something, calling on God as my witness, since in this case it appears that the obligation ceases, if there lies in the man to whom the promise is made some fault because of which he cannot rightfully accept the promise. For I did not promise God, nor did I say that I would give to a thief for the honour and glory of the divine name. And even though you grant that also this kind of oath has the force of a vow, yet a vow is not binding, unless it is accepted by God, and how shall I be assured that God is pleased that I, an innocent person, should deprive myself of my goods, and bestow them on an impious rascal, that his villainy may not go unrewarded? There should be no fear that the neglect of such an oath would lessen the honour paid God by a thief, since the man shows quite clearly, by the character of his life, how highly he esteems God. If, however, there is a man who, in order to prevent a scandal to the weak and in order not to seem, now that he is safe, to hold in any lack of reverence the name of God, which was his deliverer in perils, prefers to dispense the promised money, it will be a wiser investment, and one more acceptable to God, to spend it in pious works rather than to let it support the wickedness of some villain. And this procedure is all the safer when the swearer lives in some State, where the civil laws as well declare such oaths to be of no force. See Authentica Sacramenta Puberum [Frederick II], Code, II. xxviii. The examples which Grotius adduces for the opposite opinion will seem to any one who properly examines¹ the matter, to have nothing to do with the case. Add also Anton. Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XVI. v, on Digest XLVII, where I wonder how he approves the instance 'of Julius Caesar, who, on being captured by pirates, gave them his oath and paid his ransom; then collected a fleet, and captured and crucified them'. For neither Plutarch, Velleius, Suetonius, nor Polyænus, Bk. VIII [xxiii. 1], mentions any such oath of his, and Matthaeus seems in this case to follow those who think that an oath can be fulfilled by a mere payment at the moment, and then that the swearer of the oath can immediately, either by himself or by officers called to his aid, recover what he has given. Such, indeed, is but an idle and perfunctory performance of one's oath, since it is no payment when a person may at once recover what he has paid.

Also Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxix], maintains that 'it is not a fraud not to pay a price for your life, agreed on with a robber', and this for the reason that a robber 'is the common foe of all men, with whom neither should faith nor an oath be in common'. (E.) But Grotius, loc. cit., and Bk. III, chap. xix, § 2, disagrees with him, for the reason that, even though that special community of rights, which the law of nations has introduced among nations in the regular course of war, has no respect for a robber, yet because he is a man, he has a communion of natural right, which is the source of the principle that pacts 343 should be observed. Yet something can be said for Cicero's position: Since a pirate is the common enemy of all, that is, a man who without having been injured robs and murders any person whomsoever that he meets, and therefore, on his own confession, disturbs and destroys that social relationship between men which has been instituted by God; he has, in consequence, no right to avail himself of that bond, whereby men are accustomed to engage themselves to a social life, according to the command of God. And since his manner of life is an open profession of atheism, he should reap no advantage from religion; just as on the contrary no prudent person places any confidence in the oaths of such men. And a pimp in Terence [Adelphi, 188 f.] holds it to be one of the requisites of his trade, that he be a perjurer. Niccolò Machiavelli, Storie Florentine, Bk. III:

When religion and the fear of God are lost, the sworn word is measured and observed only for its utility; and men use it, not with the intention of observing it, but that by it they may deceive the more easily, while they think they have gained all the more praise and glory, according as they have practised deceit with greater ease and security.

9. A further requirement for the validity of an oath is that the obligation to which it is added be lawful. Therefore, a sworn promise will have no force, if made on a matter which is unlawful by natural and divine law, even if it be not opposed by the human law, supposing a man to live in a state. See the passages which Gratian, Causa xxii, Quaestio iv, has gathered from the fathers. A most notable example, first of all, is that of David in 1 Samuel, xxv [4 ff.], who, having sworn in a moment of anger that he would destroy the house of Nabal for having with insulting words refused to do him a kindness, returns thanks to God, after being calmed by the words of Abigail, that he was prevented from incurring a greater sin in fulfilling his unlawful oath. So also it was a proper act of Alboin to recall the vow in which he had sworn to destroy with the sword the entire population of Pavia, because they had refused to surrender to him; Paul Warnefrid [Paulus Diaconus], History of the Lombards, Bk. II, chap. xxvii. Add Idem, Bk. V, chap. xl, at the end; Aeneas Sylvius, Historia Bohemica, chap. xviii. For it is absurd to invoke the divine vengeance, if you do not do something which God has forbidden upon threat of punishment, and thus to abuse the reverence due God by ignoring His will. In fact oaths are introduced among men in order to confirm lawful and good actions, not to render service to evil deeds. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. XI [xi]: 'The gods desire not to be called upon to secure the performance of shameful contracts, but of those that are honourable and just.' (S.) In the Koran, On Disputation, a man is forbidden to swear that he will never¹ touch his wife; and if a man has taken such an oath, he is commanded to manumit a slave, as expiation for his oath, before he approaches his wife. In the same place the further question is raised, whether a man who has fallen upon robbers, and, to save his life, is forced to swear eternal silence, and to guard them from punishment to the best of his ability, must keep his oath. This in our opinion should be answered in the negative, especially if his silence will be the cause of peril to many others. For it is not unlawful for him to grant them impunity, so far as he is concerned, but not if his so doing will lead to the death of many innocent persons. And to such a case may be applied the words in Tacitus, Annals, Bk. III [lxx]: 'Forbearing as the Emperor might be in regard to his own private wrongs, he should not be indulgent to an offence committed against the State.' (R.) In Gunther, Ligurius, Bk. VIII [793 ff.], Frederick issues the following order: 'Oaths forced by fear of death or by torment, and chiefly those which prevent one from telling abroad of designs which will do harm² to many persons, or from making complaint against cruel sufferings, we here declare to have no standing or weight.'

10. Nay, even though a thing which is promised be not in itself unlawful, an oath will still be invalid if it interferes with some greater moral good, when, for instance, we are prevented by it from performing 344 some deed of humanity and piety. Under this head you may list an oath by which a man binds himself not to share with another some art that is honest and of advantage to humanity. See Matthew, xxv. 27. Yet this statement should have the following limitation: Provided the needs of mankind can be sufficiently met by myself and by others, who are acquainted with the art, and provided no damage is done him who required the oath. Such an oath is in Lucian, Tragopodagra [271 ff.]: 'A mystic oath which I swore does not allow me to tell, and the final injunction of my father on his death-bed, who bade us to keep secret the great potency of this drug.' Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXV, chap. i [2]: 'To leave mankind uninstructed is looked upon as the high prerogative of learning.' (B. & R.)

Now this is true because we owe to God our accomplishment in some good thing, and every man is constrained to strive with all his might for the highest, so that we are not able to take from ourselves a liberty of this kind, nor by our own act free ourselves from a duty laid down upon us by the law of God. Such oaths were not at all uncommon among the Jews, on which see Grotius, loc. cit., § 7, and on Matthew, xv. 6; Selden, Bk. VII, chap. ii; Constantin l'Empereur, Baba Kama, chap. ix, § 20; Gratian, Decretum, II. xxii. 5. 22. Thus we hold the oath invalid by which Narses bound an old man not to tell any living soul of some gold he had dug up. But he, quite properly, upon the death of Narses, made it known to the emperor Tiberius. Paulus Diaconus, Bk. XVIII. Add also Gratian, Decretum, I. xiii. 2. And in this respect a vow is just like an oath, for the former also is not valid if it is unlawful, and even when only silly. An illustration of this is the famous saying of the Spartan, who had vowed that he would cast himself headlong from the promontory of Leucata, but drew back on seeing the height. And when his deed was thrown up to him, he replied: 'I had no idea my vow would stand in need of a still greater one' [Plutarch, Laconian Apophthegms, p. 263 D].

II. Finally, it is well established that oaths do not change the nature and substance of a promise or pact to which they are added. Thus, oaths on things absolutely impossible do not obligate, although a man is guilty of a grave offence if he makes a rash abuse of an oath by the name of God. Likewise, oaths added to a conditional promise in no wise change it into an absolute one, for an oath which supposes a condition stands and falls with that condition, no less than the promise made without the oath. But an oath, like any other promise, also ceases upon the termination of the quality under which the oath was taken; for instance, a magistrate upon quitting his office will no longer be held to the oath which he took on entering that office. And vice versa, citizens no longer owe obedience to one who has laid down or been deprived of his office, even though their obedience be not expressly abrogated, for that is understood from the very nature of the case. Add Grotius, loc. cit., § 18.

In the same way acceptance is required as much for a sworn as an unsworn promise; and he who secures a right from a pact, can remit its fulfilment, whether it be sworn to or not. Thus, it will also be decided by the nature of pacts, whether an act, admittedly contrary to an oath, be only unlawful or void as well. For unless he who swore to his promise has renounced his right to the matter, and has conferred it upon another, the act will not be void, if he afterwards actually give it to a third party; for instance, if a man has sworn that he¹ will bequeath something to a person, and afterwards sells the same thing to a third party, the sale will not be invalid, although the person has perjured himself. Thus if a man, while his parents are living, promise with an oath that he will not marry a certain woman, and yet upon their death he will stand, unless the civil laws dispose otherwise. Furthermore, according to the nature of a promise or pact to which an oath has been added, that oath will derive its efficacy either from natural or from civil law. For the oath itself does not have power to turn into a civil obligation that which otherwise produced merely a natural obligation, except it be that the municipal laws make a special ruling on this point.
 345 does marry her, he will, of course, be guilty of perjury, but the marriage

So also the same act does not change¹ its nature by the addition of an oath, as, for instance, a pure gift may not thereby become a burdensome contract, and vice versa. Here belongs the question whether a contract, sanctioned by oath, in which the swearer has been conspicuously injured, can be rescinded, and the swearer return to his former position of independence. Grotius, loc. cit., § 16, denies this, giving as his reason that, although nothing, or perhaps less than stated, is owed the other person, yet faith must be kept with God. This reasoning we rejected a few pages back. On this question the expounders of the Roman law dispute at great length, on Code, II. xxvii. 1, and the subjoined Authentic, of which many lawyers, especially those of France, claim that it works a hardship. And upon the rescript of Alexander, they reply that it had no universal force, but was directed to a special case. That is, a soldier, which means a man of mature judgement, at least eighteen years of age, was petitioning the emperor, and claiming, as is evident, no great injury, but his mere immaturity in years. The religious prince was unwilling to make the soldier's contract, confirmed by an oath, void, and it appears that he had in his thoughts the examples of Hercules, who, according to Plutarch, Roman Questions, chap. xxviii, took an oath but once in his life. But that the Authentic, they say, was wrung from Frederick by the Pope Honorius III, on condition of crowning him emperor, and that Frederick had decided to change it, but was prevented by death. Any one who is acquainted with the inner workings of the papal state will easily understand the reason why the pope was bent upon that decree. Mornay, on the passage in question, reports that this law is not observed in France. See also Augustinus Barbosa, on the passage in question, Groenewegen, De Legibus Abrogatis, on the passage in question, and others.

Our opinion is that, if we are to arrive at a clear solution of this question, we should note, first of all, that pacts in which there is an outstanding inequality, and in which there has been fraud, deceit, or unjust fear, and which are entered into without deliberate thought, labour under a natural and intrinsic defect, and that the law of nature, therefore, demands their abrogation or correction. But that the fact that a person is under twenty-five years of age does not of itself make a pact defective. Although it is easily presumable that some injury may have come to minors, because of the judgement that such an age is changeable and unstable, and opened to the wiles and deceits of many men. But when this injury is not apparent, there is no reason why a pact should be abrogated.¹

After premising this, we say that if a sworn pact or promise labours under no other defect, it cannot be abrogated on the sole ground that it was entered into by a minor, provided he was able to understand the matter before him. But if the other party was guilty of fraud, nay, even if without actual fraud but because of the mere imprudence of age a great injury has been done, the oath does not prevent the injured person, although he has sworn, from being able to seek an abrogation of his agreement, or at least its correction. For when a person under age confirms an argument with an oath, he presupposes that it has no defect, and the other party also gives him to understand that. A condition of this kind underlies an oath, and when it is not present the latter is also void.

But it is another matter if without the other party being guilty of fraud a youth of experience and forethought has given more than a thing is worth, for under such circumstances the transaction was a mixed act, made up of a contract and a gift. But it should be 346 observed in general that a person who is subject to the authority of another cannot obligate himself to more than is allowed him by that authority. When he has exceeded that, the transaction can be declared void by the one in authority at his pleasure, whether an oath has been taken or not.

12. But this much is effected by oaths, from the fact that appeal has been made to God, whom a man may not deceive, however cunning he be, and whom no one may beguile with impunity: All cavil must be excluded from undertakings to which oaths are added. And so the Roman censors were justified in condemning the trickery of a captive who had sworn that he would return to the enemy's camp, and, after going in that direction a short distance, turned back as if he had forgotten something, and afterwards remained in Rome, claiming that he was free from the obligation of his oath. Cicero, On Duties, Bks. I and III [xxxii]; Gellius, Bk. VII, chap. xviii. So also we should condemn the casuistry of Dercyllidas, who gave his oath to the tyrant of Scepsis that, if the latter would come out to parley, he could return at once into his city. And when² the latter had come out, he ordered him on pain of death to open the gates, saying: 'Now I am letting you go back into the city, for I gave my word; however I am going to enter also with my army.' Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. II [vi]. We must likewise condemn the wicked cavilling of the Locrians, given by

Polybius, Bk. XII, chap. iv; and this because, as Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xxxii], says: 'Fraud does but foster, nor absolve perjury.' (W.) Add Stobaeus, Anthology, III. xxviii, of Cydias. Tacitus, Annals, Bk. XII [xlvi]: 'Radamistus also made as though he did not forget his oath. He employed neither sword nor poison against his sister and his uncle; he had them thrown upon the ground, covered up under a pile of heavy clothing, and so smothered.' (R.) Thus Henricus Stephanus, in his preliminary treatise to the Apology for Herodotus, chap. xvi, criticizes the well-known evasion of merchants, when they swear that they cannot sell a thing at such and such a price, unless they are ready to lose money; observing that they have in mind the proverb: 'A merchant loses money if he makes no profit.'

I am uncertain whether we should class under this head the act of the Count of Fontane, who had himself carried in a chair at the battle of Rocroi, because, as he said, he had taken an oath never to fight against the French on foot or horseback, Benjamin Priolo, History of France, Bk. II. Or that of Alexander VII, who, on becoming pope, swore that he would never receive his relatives in Rome, and then, on the advice of the Jesuits, got around his oath by 'receiving' them first at Castel Gandolfo, and then bringing them with him to Rome, as the story is told by the author of Nepotismus, Pt. I, Bk. III. Or what Tavernier, Voyages, Pt. II, chap. xiv, recounts of the agents of the East India Company, who take an oath before leaving Holland that they will be satisfied with their salary and will not engage in business in their own name. But soon after they have landed in India many of them take wives, who carry on secretly in their own name the forbidden business. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. XII, chap. viii, tells us that Cleomenes the Spartan made Archonides a partner in his design, swearing to him that, if he was successful in his undertaking, 'he would do everything along with his head.' But when he had secured the control of the State, he cut off the head of his partner and put it in a jar of honey; then, whenever he had decided upon some course of action, he used to bend over the jar and communicate it. Polyænus, Bk. VII [xxxiv], tells how Aryandes swore to the people of Barca over a ditch, secretly dug and covered with small sticks and earth, that he would keep his agreement so long as the earth stood; thereupon he broke down the construction and rushed into the city which suspected no hostile act. Although the same deed is attributed to the Persians by Herodotus, Bk. IV, towards the end [cc].

On the same principle, if one of two thieves steals a thing, and the other secretes it, while the former swears that he does not have it, and the latter that he did not take it, they will both be guilty of perjury. So it was a most glaring evasion of Suleiman who, after swearing to Ibrahim Bassa that while he lived he would not take his life, ordered him

347 to be killed in his sleep; as though men while asleep cannot be considered alive. On the other hand the ancients praised the firmness of Q. Metellus Numidicus, because he refused to swear to the law of Saturninus, although Marius the consul and others told him that he could properly do so because of the condition of the State, and that the force of his oath could be destroyed by this unspoken condition, that he swore to the law, provided it was a law; that is, if it had been properly presented and passed. That it could be easily shown afterwards that the law was not valid, since it was passed while it was thundering, at which time it was illegal for the public assembly to transact any business. But he preferred exile to the use of such trickery, alleging that those who swore certainly gave the impression that they recognized an action to be a valid law. See Appian, Civil Wars, Bk. I [iv. 31]; Plutarch, Marius [xxix, p. 432]. But we hold, for our part, that Lycurgus was unduly scrupulous when he ordered his ashes to be scattered over the sea, lest they should be returned to Sparta, and the citizens should believe that they were freed from the obligation of their oath. For a man is not held actually to have returned to his country merely if his body is brought home. See Plutarch, Lycurgus [xxxii]; Justin, Bk. III, chap. iii.

13. Yet the interpretation of oaths is not for these reasons always to be extended, but at times to be held to with all strictness, if the subject-matter seems to require it; for instance, if an oath has been taken out of hatred to another, and to confirm not so much a promise as threats, which of themselves can confer no right upon a man. Under this head falls the famous case of the Israelites in Judges, xxi [7], who had sworn that they would not give their daughters as wives to the Benjaminites. But they afterwards urged the latter to carry off the maidens, and interceded for them with the fathers of the stolen girls. For it is one thing to give, and another not to recover what has been taken. And it was easier to allow this strict interpretation, because it would have been cruel to blot out a whole tribe for one offence, however frightful, and such a case they may have excepted in their oath. Add Josephus, Antiquities, V. ii; Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. III, chap. xiv. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, Bk. XXVII, chap. iv:

Since Athanaric (a judge of the Goths), alleged that he was bound by a dreadful oath, and also forbidden by the strict commands of his father ever to set foot on Roman territory, and as he could not be brought to do so, while, on the other hand, it would be unbecoming and degrading for the emperor to cross over to him, it was decided by negotiation that some boats should be rowed into the middle of the river (Danube), on which the emperor should embark with an armed guard, and that there also the chief of the enemy should meet him with his people, and conclude a peace as had been arranged. (Y.)

Thus, as Livy, Bk. XXXIX, chap. xxxvii, relates, when the Romans demanded of the Achaeans that they should rescind some of their decrees, they replied that they were prevented from doing so by their oath. But when Appius, the speaker for the Roman commission, said that he strongly advised the Achaeans to be glad that they could act on their own volition, lest they should later have to act unwillingly and perforce, they were struck with dismay, and asked that the Romans themselves make any changes they saw fit, and not force them to make void the things they had sanctioned with an oath. That is, they felt it was one thing to destroy their law of their own accord, and another thing through fear not to oppose its being destroyed by a greater power. You may also bring in here the account in Euripides, Hecuba [850 ff.], of Agamemnon refusing to punish Polymnestor the Thracian, because he was a friend of the Greeks, but promising Hecuba that he will not interfere with her taking vengeance upon him. Add Polybius, Selections on Embassies, viii, towards the end. Thus the worthless slave in Terence, Andria, Act IV, sc. iii [724 ff.]:

DAVUS. Take the baby, quick, quick, and lay it on our doorstep [. . .].

MYRSIS. Why don't you do it yourself?

DAVUS. Because if I happened to have to swear to my master that I didn't put it there, I might with a clear conscience. (S.)

But we feel ourselves that this was a lame subterfuge, since it comes to the same thing whether you place it there yourself, or have it done by some one else. Thus Aurelian quite properly put the strictest interpretation on his threat, in that he commanded his soldiers to scatter about in order to kill the dogs. Flavius Vopiscus, Aurelian, chap. xxii; add Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. iii, § 4. 348

Another illustration is the account that when Alexander had decided to destroy Lampsacus, he swore, upon the arrival of Anaximenes, that he would do none of the things which he wanted. Whereupon he asked that he destroy Lampsacus, and so the city was saved. In Herodotus, Bk. IV, when Etearchus secured the oath from Themison, that the latter would aid him in whatever he asked, he then demanded of him that he drop his own daughter into the sea; then Themison, putting out to sea, bound the girl with ropes and let her down into the sea, only to draw her up again unharmed. Here also belongs the story given by Plutarch, Demetrius [p. 890]: When Antigonus, because of a dream, had decided to slay Mithridates, and had disclosed his purpose to his son Demetrius, whom he had first bound with an oath to keep silence, the latter, fearing for the safety of the young man, took him aside from witnesses, and saying no word wrote with his spear on the ground while the other looked on, 'Flee, Mithridates.' A similar case is that of Caesar, as given by Suetonius, Julius, chap. lxxiv: 'Even in avenging wrongs he was by nature most merciful, and when he had got hold of the pirates who had captured him, he had them crucified, since he had sworn beforehand that he would do so, but ordered that their throats be cut first.' (R.) Here belongs also the oath which David gave for the safety of Shimei, 2 Samuel, xix. 23. Yet it did not prevent him later, as death approached, from commanding Solomon to see to it that this worthless fellow should not end his days without shedding of blood. 1 Kings, ii. 8. For David had promised him safety, only so far as he personally was concerned. Nor did he actually command Solomon to punish him for that old crime, but merely that he carefully watch the wicked man, and on no account spare him, if he happened to sin again. And Solomon acted wisely in the case in commanding that turbulent and foolish man to live in the royal city under his eyes, that he might not upon pain of death stir up some new revolt; which injunction Shimei himself agreed to. And it was not without the providence of God that, upon breaking this rule, he paid the penalty for his latest as well as his old offence. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. vii.

Another case that may be brought under this head is that of Maria, Queen of Hungary, and wife of the Emperor Sigismund, who promised with an oath immunity to Horvatus, governor of Croatia, who had captured and subjected her to hardships; but it is said that after she had gained her liberty she urged her husband to take vengeance, asserting that she had made no promise in his name. Bonfini, History of Hungary, Bk. III, chap. ii. I am uncertain whether we should class under this head the deed of Timoleon, while warring upon the tyrant Milarchus, who had overcome many men by his deceptions, and killed them without respect for his oath. The tyrant offered to face trial in Syracuse if Timoleon would not accuse him. The latter swore that he would not accuse him, and on his pledge Milarchus came to Syracuse. When Timoleon had brought him before the assembly he said: I will not think of accusing him, since my oath was to that effect, but I command his immediate execution: 'For when he has deceived so many others, it would be no more than right to be deceived himself once in the same fashion.' Polyænus, Strategemata, Bk. V [xii. 2].

14. An oath does not exclude tacit conditions and limitations which properly arise from the very nature of the case. Thus, if I have allowed a person the option of asking for whatever he pleases, I shall not be obligated if he asks for something unjust or absurd. For whoever promises something to a man who is making an indefinite request, before he knows what the other will ask for, presupposes that he will ask for what is honourable and morally possible, not what is absurd and prejudicial to himself or to others. Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. II [101-2], makes Phoebus say: 'It shall be given [. . .] whatever thou shalt choose. But, oh, make wiser choice!' (M.) A case like this called forth the famous saying of Hippolytus, in Euripides, Hippolytus [612], praised by Cicero:

My tongue hath sworn: no oath is on my soul. (W.)

For he had sworn to the nurse that he would not reveal what she would tell him; but when she proposed to him adultery and incest with Phaedra, his step-mother, he denied that he was obligated by his oath to keep silent on so great a sin. Yet Euripides in the play tells us that he did keep it secret out of respect for his oath. Nicomachus uses the same excuse in Curtius, Bk. VI, chap. vii: 'He exclaimed that he had not plighted his faith to be a party in the plot, and that no sanction could oblige him to conceal treason.' (A.*) Since, of course, a citizen is bound by an obligation not to keep silence if he detects any plots against the person or government of his ruler. Thus Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [x], says:

A promise and a paction may happen to be made, the performance of which is prejudicial to whom the promise was made. For (as we see in the play) had not Neptune performed his vow to Theseus, the latter would not have been bereaved of his son Hippolytus. For of the three wishes to be granted him, the third, which he made in a passion, was the death of Hippolytus, upon the granting of which he sank into the most dreadful distress. (Cf. Euripides, Hippolytus, line 1315.) 'Therefore, you are not to perform those promises which may be prejudicial to the party to whom you promise.' (E.)

Add also Diodorus Siculus, Bk. IV, chap. lxxv. So also Herod should not have given the head of John to the little dancer, his step-daughter, for just as one cannot be obligated to do what is unlawful, so it should be understood of a general promise that the person shall ask only what can lawfully be performed. Matthew, xiv [7]. So also Solomon did not keep his general promise, when his mother asked something which would have been prejudicial to his government, 1 Kings, ii. 20. Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XI, chap. lviii, has a story which is also worthy of our attention:

Xerxes longed to renew the war against Greece and required Themistocles to be general of the army; who assented, upon condition that Xerxes would swear that he would not undertake the war without him. Upon which a bull was sacrificed, and at the solemnity the king swore accordingly. Then Themistocles drank off a cup of the bull's blood, and immediately fell down dead, thereby causing Xerxes to give up his purpose. (B.*)

But surely if Xerxes had any other ground for undertaking a war against the Greeks, there was no reason why he should have been moved by that oath, in which he merely supposed the actual life of Themistocles; it was as if he had said that he would undertake nothing against the Greeks without that man's advice, so long as he lived. And so when the latter died, the force of the oath also expired. Add Digest, II. viii. 16. But Homer, Iliad, Bk. X, lines 307 ff., is scarcely correct in saying of Hector that 'he swore a false oath', because the tacit condition that underlay his promise was, 'if we get them and you return safe.' Unless we take the word ἐπίορκον in the sense of an oath which does not accomplish its end.

15. Now although the invocation of a divine being in oaths should be suited to the belief of the one who does the swearing, yet the sense of the whole statement will hold good, according as the man who requires the oath claims that he understands it, for the oath is taken for his sake, and not for that of the swearer. And so it is his task to frame the words of the oath with the greatest care possible, so that he himself shows what meaning he takes them in, and the swearer signifies that he understands clearly the other's meaning; and then the swearer should state them so distinctly that the other can on no score evade and make a mockery of them. Therefore, the men spoken of by Tacitus, Histories, Bk. IV [xli], attempted in vain to avoid perjury, who 'conscious of their guilt were agitated, and, by various subtleties, varied the terms of the oath'. (O.) Thus, in Dictys Cretensis, Bk. V [x], Diomedes and Ulysses craftily swear to the Trojans that 'they will abide by the agreement 350 which they had made with Antenor', since they themselves understood thereby the agreement of betrayal into which they had entered with him. But when the Romans, in requiring oaths, commanded a man to swear 'according to his mind', that did not mean that the oath had the force only as any man conceived it in his mind, but that men should show that they took the oath in all seriousness, not evasively, or with feigned meaning, or, indeed, as only a kind of jest. Thus the formula regularly used by the censors was, for instance, 'Have you, according to your mind, a wife?' A certain Roman knight, making an ill-timed jest at this formula, replied that he had, 'according to my mind, but not according to yours,' and was punished by the censors. There is an excellent passage in Cicero, Academics, Bk. IV [xlvi], towards the end, where he is showing that man can have only a probable knowledge of things:

This doctrine, he says, is confirmed by the diligence of our ancestors who ordained, in the first place, that every one should swear 'according to the opinion of his own mind'; secondly, that he should be accounted guilty 'if he had knowingly sworn falsely', because there was a great deal of ignorance in life; thirdly, that the man who was giving his evidence should say that 'he thought', even in a case where he was speaking of what he had actually seen himself. And that when the judges were giving their decision on the evidence, they should say, not that such and such a thing had been done, but that such and such a thing 'appeared' to them. (Y.)

Idem, On Duties, Bk. III [xxix]: 'That which is so sworn that the mind conceives it ought to be done, that should be observed. What is otherwise, if you perform it not, involves no perjury' (E.); that is,¹ if a man does not understand the mind of the one who requires the oath, but understands the sense of the oath in a different way, the failure to perform it does not constitute perjury. For when the understanding of the swearer is different from that of the man requiring the oath, the former is not understood to have accepted the oath offered him, and without acceptance there arises no obligation on the part of the promisor. 'For to swear what is false', continues Cicero, 'is not always perjury,' that is, to assert by error with an oath something which in fact is quite otherwise; 'but not to do that which you swear according to the sentiment of your mind, as it is expressed in our law form, is perjury.' (E.)

16. There has been a dispute also among some scholars of our time over an oath taken for another; that is, whether a man can take an oath in the place and name of an absentee, which binds the latter. Our position on this matter is as follows: Just as an absentee can contract an obligation in writing, since his consent can be expressed as well by that means as by the spoken word, so there is nothing to prevent an oath being taken also in writing. When this has once been formally recited, it will obligate a person as fully as if he had been present and given it by the spoken word. But it seems that he can recall it before it has been recited, and so a man is not guilty of perjury if he withdraws his sworn admission before it has been thus conveyed to the place where it was to go. But it seems scarcely appropriate that deputies should assume positions as if they were in fact to take the oath for themselves, or that, from fear that they themselves should appear to assume the obligations, they should usually change the final statement of the oath into 'So help him God'. For it would be quite enough for the oath of the absentee merely to be read from his missive. Yet since it has, with good reason, been customary among most peoples to make oaths more impressive by the use of certain solemn ceremonies, and so to set more clearly before the eyes of the swearer the reverence due God by some religious symbol, such as by the use of a victim, approach to an altar, or some similar means, I should conclude that if the matter is of great importance the absentee should solemnly take the oath in the place of his actual residence; especially since a 'corporal oath', as it is called, is absolutely required, which name cannot be given to that which is taken for an absent person in the usual manner. For it is surely something more to invoke God as a witness, in the midst of solemn rites which show forth with a kind of sacred awe the presence of God, than it is to write it upon a piece of paper, which does not blush. Nor is it without 351 reason that the evidence offered by absentees in writing is called 'blind testimonies'. See Law of the Visigoths, Bk. II, tit. iv, chap. 5.

17. Finally, the query is often raised whether, if at all, and to what extent, an heir is bound by an oath of the person to whom he succeeds. In this case it is clear that if the other party has acquired from the oath a perfect right which should be met fully or partially out of the property of the swearer, the heir is bound to fulfil it, since that burden, attached to the property, passed along with it to the heir. But when no person has acquired a perfect right from the oath, and the obligation was based only upon the piety, fidelity, or constancy of the swearer, it is clear that an heir is not bound, since he does not assume the person of the other in those obligations which ultimately and entirely terminated in his person. Thus, if a man has sworn or vowed with an oath, for instance, that he will fast one day in seven, that he will remain unmarried for five years, or that he will undertake a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and dies without fulfilling it, his heir will not be bound to do so. But it would be otherwise if this were the condition upon which a man was made an heir. Thus, if a man has sworn that in each of the next ten years he will give one hundred something or other to the poor, and he dies before the time has elapsed, his heir will not be obligated, unless definite individuals had acquired the right to require such a sum. For whoever does not confer upon a person the right to exact a promise, only wishes that recourse be had to his fidelity, not to his property, and so upon his death that obligation will not affect his property or his heir, unless he had expressly stipulated it in his will. On this point Grotius, Bk. II, chap. xiii, § 17, observes: 'If in consequence of some defect no right is created for a person but good faith is pledged to God, no binding obligation rests upon the heir of the man who took the oath.' (K.) This we concede, provided the man who took the oath, from generosity, or to avoid a scruple of conscience, had intended to fulfil his faulty oath, which he might have withdrawn on the plea of fraud or of unjust fear. For we have already shown that in such a case not even the original swearer is fully obligated.

But in case the heir does not fulfil a sworn promise or pact of the dead man, does he thereby incur the stigma of perjury? Apparently this question should be answered in the negative; for that which is added to a simple obligation by an oath in its strict sense, that is, by an appeal to the divine vengeance, does not pass beyond the person of the man who took the oath. It cannot be said that the heir was lacking in reverence for God, because it was not he who called upon God as his witness. Hence the heir in question will be guilty of merely simple perfidy. But it will be otherwise if the entire people of a State has taken the oath, for many hold that so long as that body stands, it is held by the perpetual bond of an oath. But it seems to me that this is open to some question. For an oath and the violation of an oath affect the natural will and that of individual men, but not the will of a moral person, except by derivation from individuals. And so a people, that is, a moral person, cannot call down the wrath of God upon itself, that being possible only for each physical person who goes to form the people as a whole. Therefore, when a sworn promise or pact has been violated by a people, only those who actually took the oath will be guilty of perjury, if they agreed to the violation of the oath, while the rest will be subject to the censure of simple perfidy.

And so I should not accuse the Spartans of perjury, because many centuries later they departed from the laws of Lycurgus; nor the Romans, if they designated their Caesars with the name of king, despite the oath which Brutus had once required of the Roman people. This will be all the clearer if we bear in mind that no man acquired any right from that oath, but that the Romans only wished by it to lay a restraint on the liberty of their will, so that it would not occur to them to restore that form of state once tried and found so unfortunate for them. By this oath they were able to obligate themselves not to set up a king in Rome, at least so long as the safety of the State did not require the kingship. For in such a case even those who had sworn are understood to be freed of their oath, since then the matter of the oath is made unlawful by the condition of the State, which, it is supposed, can no longer be safe without the kingship. But their descendants, who did not renew the oath, could not be bound by it, because, for one thing, it could not be imposed by any authority on them by their ancestors, and because they did not agree to it, as the present illustration supposes. Nor does it make any difference that the people remains the same, although the individual citizens change, and that therefore the act of one generation should apparently be passed on to another. For the act of one generation can bind another only when some man has acquired a right from it. But in such things as redound to a people from the acts of individuals, posterity does not always represent its ancestors, just as a lazy and degenerate posterity can in no way claim for itself the former martial glory that belonged to their nation. But it is a different matter, if such an oath has been repeated by posterity individually. On such oaths in general the statement of Sophocles, Antigone [388 f.], should be borne in mind:

No man should make a vow, for if
He ever swears he will not do a thing,
His afterthoughts belie his first resolve. (S.)

It is a good point made by Ioannes Labardaeus, Historiae de Rebus Gallicis, Bk. VI, p. 329:

Treaties with kings are more sacred than those with peoples, although they also control the State. For when an individual gives his faith, he is more likely to be scrupulous in observing it, than are the single members of a multitude, who have little or no part in the faith of the state, and so may lightly fall away from it.

Cf. Antonius Matthaeus, De Criminibus, XVI. v, on Digest XLVII.

18. Oaths may be, and usually are, taken with two ends in view: Either to make a promise with a special religious sanction, or to open the way to a decision on some point which is still not clear, and cannot be decided more conveniently in any other way. In this sense is to be understood the statement of Aristotle, Rhetoric to Alexander, chap. xviii [xvii]: 'An oath is an unprovable assertion combined with an appeal to the gods'; that is, a statement which is not demonstrated by arguments, but to which faith is attached merely on the pledge of the swearer. For when a matter can be demonstrated by clear arguments, it is not right to gather proof from oaths. But when the decision of a controversy is left to an oath, no further proofs are sought. It is, however, clear why recourse is had to oaths not in questions of law, but of fact, for an oath is not taken on the question whether or not a thing has been done lawfully, but on the question whether or not a thing was done actually. When this is known, a decision can be reached by certain proof on the law in the matter. The oath taken by judges is not assertive but promissory, whereby they undertake to render a decision on¹ the case before them according to the demand of right and equity. Therefore, of the two divisions of oaths mentioned above, we can call the former promissory, and the latter assertive.

19. Use has very frequently been made of promissory oaths in public as well as in private suits, and perhaps more often² than was necessary. Regarding such oaths certain authors observe that some, called promissory in species, are taken to give rise to an obligation, some only to confirm an act already existing. This division should not 353 be taken to mean that not every oath is accessory to an obligation, but rather that some promises include an oath in the very nature of the statement, as in the form, 'I swear that I will give you something'; while sometimes the principal undertaking is conceived separately from the oath. But the expositors of the Roman law are right in observing that, as we have shown above, those oaths are void which are added to undertakings that are unlawful and base according to the law of nature, are opposed³ to the public good, or tend to the damage of a third person. But that there are transactions, which are in themselves invalid in a civil court, but are made valid by the addition of an oath, the reason being not that they labour under any inherent fault, but that they may easily furnish the occasion for an injury to the person who undertakes them. However, since every man can refuse a kindness offered for his own advantage, it is presumed that the man who is willing to confirm an undertaking by an oath has considered in all seriousness whether or not it is to his advantage.

20. Now assertive oaths, or such as are used to decide controversies, the settlement of which cannot be effected by other arguments, are taken either by the person who is engaged in the undertaking, or by a third party. Those who take an oath on the deed of another party are called witnesses, whose fidelity, when no plausible evidence lays it open to suspicion, is justly accorded great weight, since it can be presumed that no pious man will for another's interest expose his soul to the wrath of God. Yet it is a wise provision that civil laws are usually circumspect in admitting a man to give testimony in a case which concerns a person who is connected with him by kinship, which creates a powerful bond of affection; for such men may easily put their religious scruples after their affection. See Digest, XXII. v. 3 and 4. Nor was it without good reason that the Romans used to require witnesses of wealth, especially in difficult trials.

21. But even in one's own undertaking a party to it may often settle the question by his oath, this being possible either upon agreement of the parties concerned, or at the order of the judge. Digest, XII. ii. 1, 3. For when it happens that two men are in a controversy over a debt, and sufficient evidence is not forthcoming, the claimant can challenge the debtor to take an oath, promising that he will drop his claim if the swearer deny the debt. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxix. But if the latter doubt whether he can take a clear oath; if, for instance, the debt has been passed on to him by another, he may in turn ask the claimant to take an oath, with the promise that he will pay, if the claimant swear the debt is due to him. And this offer and counter-offer of such an oath can be made either in court or out of court; with this difference, however, that the offer of an oath out of court need not be accepted, since it implies an agreement from which I may later become indebted for something; while no one who is without authority over me can force me to undertake a burdensome agreement against my will. But when one party offers another an oath in court, he may refuse it only upon very weighty reasons, and should either take it or make a counter-offer to his opponent. That is, when it is clear to the judge that the suit is well founded, and yet sufficient proof is not at hand, then, in case one of the parties is willing to commit the matter to the conscience of the other, the judge is justified in holding a man guilty who does not dare to deny the debt with a religious act, and will not challenge the other to a similar declaration of the debt. Such a refusal can be laid to nothing else than the fact that the man knows in his conscience that he owes the debt; for in order to avoid the appearance of swearing to a petty profit he may decline to do so, and return the proffered oath to the claimant. If he fears that the other may perjure himself, why does he not take the oath? Yet Plato, Laws, Bk. XII [p. 949 A B], allows an oath only in cases 'in which, as far as men can 354 judge, there is nothing to be gained by a false oath; but all cases in which a denial confirmed by an oath clearly results in a great advantage to the taker of the oath, shall be decided without the oath'. (J.) See Digest, XII. ii. 34, §§ 6, 7, 9, 38.

22. Finally, sometimes without the petition of the party concerned, the judge may require an oath, when other proofs are not sufficient, and this to the end that a man may secure for himself some right, or may clear himself of suspicion of having committed some deed.

But it should be observed that such oaths are usually never to be offered in cases when capital punishment or any grave loss would follow a confession of the truth. For besides the fact that it is most harsh, in connexion with a fact still unproved, to put a man to the necessity either of deeply wronging his conscience, or of suffering some serious hurt, little confidence is to be had in such oaths, since men are prone to the hope that they can at a later time placate an offended God, upon whose mercy not even a perjured man is forbidden to call. Libanius, Declamations, III [p. 249 A]:

In despair and when there is but one recourse, and it cannot be employed except by falsehood, a man does indeed venture to exchange one danger for another when he knows that what is immediately before his eyes is inevitable. And for this he often deceives himself with the fancy that with sacrifices,¹ worship, vows, burnt offerings, and beautiful gifts he can secure pardon from the gods.

For a fuller treatment of oaths of this kind see the expositors of the Roman law on Digest, XII. ii.

23. Regarding the violation of oaths, this further question should be cleared up, namely, whether, in view of the fact that, in civil governments, men are almost always bound by an oath faithfully to conduct the duties of office, a man is to be held guilty of perjury if he has been negligent in any part of his duty. Here there is no question about such oaths as concern some special act, in which, for instance, a man gives testimony, denies a trust, goes back upon his own promise, and the like; for he who violates such things, surely deserves the name of a perjurer. But it touches those whereby a man binds himself to a number of things under one general head. It is customary for such oaths to be required of those who are entrusted with some office to be fulfilled by different functions and actions.

Now there is no doubt that the question should be answered in the affirmative, when the violation comes upon full knowledge, and by malice aforethought, only, as in the case of other crimes, so there are different grades in such perjury. For just as the man who has broken only one or two laws is less guilty than he who has renounced once and for all every civil restraint, or has committed a crime against his ruler, so he who has broken all the requirements of his office has incurred a greater perjury than he who has broken but a part of them. But add Robert Sanderson, On the Obligation of Oaths, Prelection III, § 18. Nor should any attention be paid to those who maintain that a man should be freed from perjury if he has subjected himself to the penalty laid down for such offenders. For unless in the obligation a person is expressly allowed either to do something, or by paying some penalty to secure the right to do the opposite (see the marriage contract between Charles, Prince of Wales, and Henrietta, article 23, in Gramondus, Historiarum Galliae, Bk. XVI), the punishment does by no means free him from the crime, as we shall show below at greater length. Thus, he who has had a beating will be none the less called a thief, than if he still went about with a back untouched by rods.

24. The usual claims brought forward about dispensing with and weakening the force of oaths, and to some extent of vows, can be settled on two general principles. The first is: When a man has authority over the actions and property of another, nothing can be done to his prejudice by the subject, and when such a thing has been done, he shall have the right to make it void. The second is: He who has authority over a person can, as it shall seem to his purpose, curtail and limit any rights his subject has already secured, and especially any to be obtained in the future. From this it is clear that the acts of superiors cannot bring it about that an oath, in so far as it was truly obligatory, should not be carried out; that is, an oath which of itself labours under no fault, and was made on a matter of which the swearer had full power to dispose at his discretion, cannot be rescinded by a superior. Thus, the oath which Regulus gave to the Carthaginians on his return could not be rescinded by the Roman senate; although an additional reason was that Regulus was a slave of the Carthaginians, and the Romans had no longer any authority over him. But when the oath has been taken on matters and actions which lie under the direction of a superior, it will borrow its strength from the consent, whether express or tacit, of the superior, who can declare it void if it is not to his liking. Nor need there be any fear of perjury in such a case, if the oath has been rescinded in this way, for the approval of the superior was supposed as a condition by the subject. Furthermore, the superior commits no sin in so doing, because in refusing to allow his authority to suffer any prejudice by the act of his subject, he is only exercising his own right. 355

An oath is also void whether the superior forbids in advance the swearing of an oath on certain matters, or forbids that an oath, once taken, be fulfilled. Although in the former case the subject greatly sins in taking a rash oath contrary to orders. This was the reason for the law of the Hebrews, in Numbers, xxx [3 ff.], that, if it seemed best, the father could revoke the sworn vows of his own daughter, the husband those of his wife, the master those of his servant; for otherwise the latter could by their vows and oaths render void the power of their respective superiors. Nay more, Leo Mutinensis, De Ritibus Hebraicis, Pt. II, chap. iv, § 4, says that, if a man took any kind of vow or oath, and later repented of it for good reason, he could, provided it was not to the prejudice of a third party, be freed from it by a rabbi or through other men, when the reason for his retraction had been presented and approved. Thus also in Decretals, II. xxiv. 19, the statement is made, that 'in an oath the right of a superior should be recognized as an exception'. Add [Constitutiones Friderici II. Imp.] Feuds, Bk. II, tit. lv.

The power of an oath taken by a subject may depend on the will of a superior in this way also; provided the superior stipulate that what the inferior may swear to in a certain case will be valid only if approved by the former. But it is clear that such a relaxation of an oath can be effected only by him who has authority over the swearer, and has such an authority as includes this power. Therefore, the Roman emperors were justified in exercising this authority; as is clear from Digest, L. i. 38, where the emperors Antoninus and Verus released from his oath a certain man who had sworn that he would not attend the senate, and was later chosen duumvir. The reason was that a citizen cannot by his oath withhold his services from the requirements of the State. Likewise, according to Suetonius, Tiberius, chap. xxxv, the emperor released a Roman knight from his oath, so that he could divorce his wife taken in adultery with his son-in-law, although he had sworn before that he would never set her aside. For Tiberius maintained that the oath could not be extended to a situation, where the wife had, by so foul a crime, made herself unworthy of further sharing his couch. But later the Christian emperors often turned over to the bishops the dispensation from oaths, so that the reputation of the latter for righteousness might eradicate any scruple that could arise among the more simple-minded. Yet it is notorious how far the bishops, and especially that Roman bishop who claims the first place among them, 356 have stretched this concession, and what a flood of evil has overwhelmed the Christian world from its abuse. And in view of the fact that it must be settled on the principles of law, what oaths can be relaxed and for what reasons, I cannot understand why the clergy have claimed for themselves above the civil lawyers authority in this matter.

But even when an oath cannot be declared void because of the person and status of the swearer, a superior who has acquired a right from the oath may still destroy its effect, in case he takes that right away from himself, or forbids that he may receive anything from the oath. And this may be done either by way of punishment, or for the public good by virtue of supreme sovereignty. In this case the swearer is free from the charge of perjury, because he is not responsible for the oath not being carried out, and he is released from the necessity of performing it by the person who acquired the right either directly or by reason of his position. Cf. Grotius, loc. cit., § 20, and on Matthew, v. 37.

Finally, the sovereign who revokes an oath on just grounds is not guilty of sin in withdrawing the effect from an act on behalf of which the name of God was invoked, although a subject may sin at times because he has rashly invoked the name of God in connexion with an act, which he should have known was prejudicial to the right of his superior.

ON THE POWER OF MANKIND OVER THINGS

- | | |
|--|---|
| 1. A great part of law is concerned with things.
2. It is God's will that man make use of the other creatures.
3. Men's consumption of plants does not constitute an injury. | 4. Doubts as to the slaughter and eating of animals.
5. A defence of this.
6. The abuse of the right over beasts is to be reprov'd. |

SUCH is the constitution of man's body that it cannot live from its own substance, but has need of substances gathered from outside, by which it is nourished and fortified against those things which would destroy its structure. Nay, nearly all nature serves man to the further end that he may live his life more advantageously and easily. Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. II [686]: 'For wealth means life to poor mortals.' (E.-W.) It is in view of all this that so many transactions pass between men, and the way is opened to many controversies as well as contests. To see that these shall not disturb the peaceful association of mankind is the task of natural law, and the civil laws of most peoples are chiefly concerned with the same end. That all this shall be properly detailed, we must observe, first of all, by what right mankind dispose all things and animals to their own use, or advantage and pleasure, and on what principle that faculty rests, both in relation to God the Creator, and to the things themselves which man not only uses, but often wastes as well, and entirely consumes.

2. Without doubt the most Good and Great God, since He is the creator and preserver of this universe has, as it were, complete dominion over all things, which therefore belong so strictly to Him that no man against His will can pretend to any right over them. This dominion of God is treated at length by Philo Judaeus, On the Cherubim, who, in view of it, calls the right of men over things merely usufruct. But since He stands in need of nothing beyond His own person, and other things cannot add to His happiness, it follows that His goodness renders Him ready and willing to allow His creatures to secure mutual advantage from each other. But He has shown Himself so kind to man especially, that it is commonly said, all creatures have been created by God for the use of men. Yet the right of God over things is very different from that right which belongs to men over them, so that it is a bit of empty reasoning given by Diogenes the Cynic, in Diogenes Laertius [VI. 37]: 'Everything belongs to the gods; and wise men are the friends of the gods. All things are in common among friends; therefore everything belongs to wise men.' (Y.) But those men claim too much for themselves, who maintain that, if things are of no use to man, it follows that they are vain; and that therefore from this, that all things are common for the entire human race, and so the entire human race can say, 'This is mine.' As even Aristotle, Politics, Bk. I, chap. v [I. viii], says: 'Now if nature makes nothing incomplete, and nothing in vain, the inference must be that she made all animals and plants for the sake of man.' (J.) Lucian, Prometheus, [xv]: 'Did not men exist, the glory of the universe would be without any to witness it, and our works would not be highly regarded even by ourselves.' But it surely seems that the order of the universe might have been framed on a smaller scale, if nothing was created but to serve the use of man. And Seneca, On Anger, Bk. II, chap. xxvii, well says: 'We think too much of ourselves, when we imagine that we are worthy to have such prodigious revolutions effected for our sake.' (S.) Add Charron, De la Sagesse, Bk. I, chap. xl, n. 3-5.

But however that may be, this much at least is certain, that man makes use of other created things by the will of God, which is gathered from the fact that man cannot maintain himself without the use of them, and some of them, apparently of their own accord, give themselves to his service. And since God has given life to man, He is understood also to have granted him the use of those things, without which His gift cannot be maintained. Add Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. I, chap. xvi [I ff.]. There is, furthermore, the authority of the Sacred Scriptures, which expressly declare that God gave man power, not merely over plants, but also over animate things produced in heaven, earth, and sea. Genesis, i. 28-9. This concession, however, has not the force of a command, but is only the indulgence of a privilege, which a person can use, so far as he pleases, but is not bound to its exercise on every occasion. For otherwise man would sin against the divine law, if he let any animal whatsoever go free, or missed any opportunity to bring it under his control. And this surely no sane man would maintain. Yet that authority of man over the brute creation is very different from the sovereignty exercised over men, since the former has, in the case of animals, no corresponding obedience, arising from a kind of obligation, and it is at the same time far more absolute than the sovereignty over men. The fact that the Jews were forbidden by God to eat of some animals has no relation whatsoever to limiting the right of men over animals, since the reason for that law seems to have been based on medical considerations. Yet Selden, Bk. VII, chap. i, states, on the authority of ancient Hebrew teachers, that Adam was forbidden to eat flesh, being commanded by God to live upon the fruits of the field, but that the concession was afterwards given to Noah, Genesis, ix. 3, yet upon condition that he refrain from blood, and from any part of an animal taken from it while still alive. Add Deuteronomy, xii. 20. But the same author adds that an exception was made in the case of the blood of fishes, and that they could even be eaten alive, as is done with oysters, and even when they died a natural death; neither of which was lawful with land animals, which were not to be eaten alive, or when they died a natural death.

3. Now if we consider this faculty of mankind in its relation to things and animals which man uses and misuses, the proof that such use carries with it no injury to the animals can be found both in the nature 358 of man, and in the concession of the Creator. For it is not likely that a most Good and Wise Creator should lay upon man, the first of earthly creatures, such a necessity that he cannot preserve his life without doing another creature an injury, which cannot avoid being associated with sin. There is the further express concession of God, which leaves no scruple that might arise in any way from the slaughter of animals. If this seems to raise any question of humanity that can be entirely removed by the mere consideration that God has assigned to them such a condition, and has given the race of men that faculty; and man in using this right, whether reposing in him by the act of God or conceded him, works no injury. Regarding plants and such other things as lack sense, there seems to be no difficulty, since it cannot be seen how they suffer any ill in being consumed by man; especially since they would be destroyed in any event by beasts or in the early change of seasons, while many of them would not flourish at all without the aid of man. We will not pause over the superstition of the Egyptians regarding abstinence from certain herbs. See Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I, chap. lxxxix.

4. Now regarding animate beings endowed with consciousness, to which loss of life is attended with suffering, many who have considered the licence of men over brutes from the point of pure reason, feel that some question may be raised. For it does not at once and without question follow that, because the Creator gave the first of men dominion over animals, He thereby granted him full licence so that he could even kill them for unnecessary uses. Add Grotius on Genesis, ix. 3; Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VII, chap. i. Man has also dominion over man, yet he can exercise no such licence as that over his fellow man. Nor would men have had grounds to complain that the divine indulgence had been niggardly towards them, or that their necessities had been scantily provided for, if they had been denied power over the lives of animals, at least of such as offer no danger to human existence. For the labour performed by animals in cultivating the field, and the other things that come from them, such as milk, eggs, that are not necessary to continue the species, wool, and the like, would have been enough to support men after a fashion. Nor did man receive the power to use them at his pleasure for food, because of the fact that God commanded him to sacrifice them in His worship. For what is allowed men by a special command of God can still be unlawful except in that case. And this is the reason why many ancient philosophers disapproved of such slaughter. For why should man for the sake of superfluous pleasure take from a harmless animal the life given it by the Creator of them both, especially since men cannot excuse themselves by the example even of lions, wolves, or other carnivores? For nature has so formed these last that they cannot exist upon other than bloody food, and they reject the products of the soil; while the very opposite is true of man, who is nourished by other food, meat having to be prepared by cooking and seasoning before it agrees with his stomach. Although some peoples are said to live on raw meat and fish, as Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. I, chap. xviii, recounts of some barbarians of Davis Straits. The same writer, in Pt. II, chap. xi, records that some inhabitants of the province of Pasto in Peru eat no meat at all, and when asked if they do not want to taste a little reply that they are not dogs.

Others have also observed that the front teeth of carnivores are by nature long, sharp, and separated from each other, so that they can sink deep into flesh and tear it apart, while the teeth of men are short and close together, arranged like those of animals that feed on herbs and 359 fruits; that for this reason we must use knives to cut meat, while meat-eating animals have no such need; and also that children on their mere natural impulse love fruits above other foods, and prefer apples, cherries, and nuts to the finest cuts of meat, since their nature is not yet corrupted nor their appetite perverted by bad habits in eating. See Anton le Grand, Institutio Philosophiae, Pt. VI, art. iii. It is a recognized fact that the truculence of men, after it was incited and calloused, as it were, by the slaughter of animals, then broke forth against their own fellow-men; and for those who found delight in slaughtering harmless animals, it was but a short step to unsheathe the sword against weaker men who lay exposed to their injuries. Add the speech of Pythagoras in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. XV, fab. ii; Grotius on Genesis, xlv. 34; Plato, Timaeus, towards the end. Diogenes Laertius, Bk. VIII [13], in his discussion of Pythagoras tells us that the philosopher forbade the killing of animals, as having a right to live in common with mankind. And this was his pretext; but in reality he prohibited the eating of animals, because he wished to train and accustom men to simplicity of life, so that all their food should be easily procurable, as it would be if they ate only such things as required no fire to dress them, and if they drank plain water; for from this diet they would derive health of body and acuteness of intellect. (Y.)

Yet Lucian, Somnium [18], represents him as changed into a cock, and giving the following reason for his teaching: 'I perceived that if I made laws that were ordinary and just like those of the run of legislators I should not induce men to wonder at me, whereas the more I departed from precedent, the more of a figure I should cut, I thought, in their eyes.' (H.) Add Johann Scheffer, De Philosophia Italica, chap. xiv. Plutarch, Gryllus [Bruta animalia ratione uti, viii, p. 991 c]:

But man, such is his voracity, falls upon all, to satisfy the pleasures of his appetite; tries all things, tastes all things; and as if he were yet to seek what was the most proper diet and most agreeable to his nature, among all the animals is the only all-devourer. And first he makes use of flesh, not for want, as having the liberty to take his choice of herbs and fruits, the plenty of which is inexhaustible; but out of luxury and being cloyed with necessaries, he seeks after inconvenient and impure diet, purchased by the slaughter of living creatures, by that means showing himself more cruel than the most savage of wild beasts. For blood, murder, and flesh are proper to nourish the kite, the wolf, and dragon; but to man they are delicious viands. (G.)

The same author in his De Esu Carnium, Oration II [iv, p. 998 B], has among other things this to say:

In the beginning some wild and mischievous beast was killed and eaten, and then some little bird or fish was entrapped. And the love of slaughter, being first experimented, and exercised in these, at last passed even to the labouring ox, and the sheep that clothe us, and to the poor cock that keeps the house; until by little and little, unsatiableness being strengthened by use, men came to the slaughter of men, to bloodshed and wars. (G.)

Aratus, Phaenomena [tr. by Germanicus, l. 136]: 'Even the ox, accustomed to the plough, pollutes the table.' Add Pliny, Bk. VIII, chap. xlv; Valerius Maximus, Bk. VIII, chap. i, inter damnatos, n. 8; Suetonius, Domitian, chap. ix; Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. V, chap. xiv; Dio Chrysostom, Orations, lxiv, p. 592; Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, Bk. II [lx ff.].

Nicolaus of Damascus reports of the Phrygians [frag. 103 i Jak.]: 'If any one among them kills a plough ox, or steals an instrument of agriculture, he is put to death.' Aloysius Cadamustus, Navigatio, chaps. lvii, lx, writes that the inhabitants of the kingdom of Calcut show also the same veneration for oxen; and according to Diodorus Siculus, Bk. III, 360 chap. xxxii, the Nomads give the name of parents to the bull and cow, as well as to the ram and ewe, because they are the source of their daily sustenance. Strabo, Bk. XV [i. 59], writes of the Brahmins: 'They eat the flesh only of those animals which do not help man in his work.' Much the same story about the Japanese is given by Bernhard Varenus, Descriptio Japoniae, chap. xxiii. They are said to avoid in their food blood as well as milk, because they think the latter is nothing other than white blood.

Notice should be taken in passing of the discussion in Plutarch, Symposiacs, Bk. IV, chap. iv:

That is most lawful meat which comes from the sea. For we can claim no great right over land creatures, which are nourished with the same food, draw the same air, wash in and drink the same water that we do ourselves; and when they are slaughtered, they make us ashamed of what we are doing, with their hideous cries; and then again, by living amongst us, they arrive at some degree of familiarity and intimacy with us. But sea creatures are altogether strangers to us, and are born and brought up, as it were, in another world; neither does their voice, look, nor any service they have done us plead for their life. For this kind of creatures are of no use at all to us, nor is there any necessity that we should love them. But that place which we inhabit is hell to them, and as soon as ever they enter upon it they die. (G.)

On the other hand the Pythagoreans, while refraining from all animals as food, especially avoided fish, the reasons being discussed at length by the same author, Symposiacs, Bk. VIII, chap. viii. Thus Xiphilinus, Epitome of Dio, in the life of Severus, says of the Caledonians that they never tasted fish, although these were found in great abundance in their waters. Among other reasons offered this is given: That other animals in some way or other give men cause to kill them from the damage they do, while fishes neither can nor do injure us; that some, such as rabbits and chickens, should be destroyed lest they increase too rapidly and rob men of their food; while fishes, born as it were on another world, give no excuse to move against them, but men are incited against them by inability to control their appetite.

Porphry, On Abstaining from Animal Food, Bk. IV [iii ff.], indeed, goes to great lengths to show that abstinence from flesh is agreeable especially to philosophers, who base their happiness upon God and the imitation of Him. Among the many arguments, which have been presented already for the most part, he takes special pains to show that all souls, endowed with sensation and memory, also partake of reason, and since this last is to be found in other animals, they should also be the recipients of justice, which consists chiefly in doing no injury without just cause. And that the claim of brutes to reason is established by the fact that they are seized by madness and anger. Even to-day the Benjans of Cambay never injure any animal, because they believe that the souls of men at death pass into the bodies of animals, and they never think of eating them; indeed, they even have hospitals built for sick and injured¹ birds. Add Abraham Rogerius, De Braminibus, Pt. I, chaps. i and xviii. Phil. Baldaeus, Descriptio Insulae Ceilon, chap. xlvii, writes that the Brahmins, even when converted to Christianity, retain their old manner of life, and if met with the statement: 'To the pure all things are pure'; they reply that 'The kingdom of God does not consist of meat and drink', but that they have been accustomed to their light foods, and such a diet agrees with them. The Apalchitae never had tasted meat or fish until they learned it of the Europeans. Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. viii.

5. Now although approval should very properly be given to everything in these arguments that tends to increase temperance and frugality, and to prevent the finer spirits from being clogged by too rich a fare, yet it can be sufficiently demonstrated by reasons that no scruple is to be admitted about the killing and eating of animals. Of these reasons the most weighty seems to be that no right of obligation passes mutually between men and beasts, nor should so pass by nature. For we do not understand that the law of nature by its absolute authority enjoins us to cultivate friendship and society with brutes, nor are they capable of sustaining an obligation arising from a pact with men. From this defect of a common right there follows a practical state of war between those who can mutually injure each other, and are understood on probable reasons to be able so to desire. In this state every one has the faculty to do to another, with whom he is at war, whatever will seem to his advantage. And yet this state of war with brutes is very different from that war in which men meet at times, the latter being neither universal nor perpetual, and not extending promiscuously to every kind of licence. This state is most clearly to be seen in the case of large animals which, as opportunity is offered, turn also even upon men; and the person who wishes to spare them requires that men live in a worse state than the beasts. But domestic animals give themselves to the service of men, not from any obligation, but because they are either captivated by the choice food offered them, or restrained by force, upon the removal of which they will soon return to their liberty, while some will even turn against man himself. Some also reproduce in such numbers that they must be exterminated, if men themselves are not to find their living-space circumscribed and inconvenient. See¹ Exodus, xxiii. 29; Deuteronomy, vii. 22. Add Gassendi, Syntagma Philosophiæ Epicuri, Pt. III, chap. xxvii.

But it is vain for some to deny that it follows from the lack of a common right between men and brutes, that a man may injure them and use them for food; and to maintain that even though no injury is done to the brutes, yet it is done to their Creator, unless there is certainty of His consent, or even to the owners of the animals. But surely that is an idle exception. For it is a safe conclusion from the fact that the Creator established no common right between man and brutes, that no injury is done brutes if they are hurt by man, since God himself made such a state to exist between man and brutes. It is, furthermore, one thing to question whether a man may injure a brute, and another whether a man may injure a second person by the use of a brute. Only the former is denied in our argument, and not the latter.

Another consideration of some importance is that, since harmless beasts are otherwise exposed to the forays and slaughters of voracious ones, their condition is made better rather than worse by the fact that men exercise the power which they do over them, since they are furnished with food as a kind of compensation for their slaughter, and are defended against the attacks of savage animals. That man is not bound together with brutes under a common right has already been shown by other writers. And this also, we may add in passing, is the reason why the right of ownership has effect only in relation to other men and not to brutes, since in grazing upon our possessions they do us no injury¹. Thus, in Matthew, vi. 26, we are told that God cares for birds, even when they eat the products of our labour. Yet the owner of herds sometimes causes us injury or loss when they eat up our harvest, because he did not guard them carefully enough. One right, however, we have in common, in that the right by which they enter our land we exercise in driving them out.

62. And yet there is no question that the abuse of this power, especially any that is combined with an insensate cruelty, deserves reproof. For just as it is to the interest of every State that no man make an improper use of his own property, so a useless and wanton destruction of animals tends to the hurt of all human society, and to the dishonour of the Creator and Author of such a gift. This is why God expressly commanded the Jews to allow a seventh day of rest to their cattle. Exodus, xx. 10, xxiii. 12; Deuteronomy, v. 14. Add Deuteronomy, xxv. 4; 1 Corinthians, ix. 9; Numbers, xxii. 28, 32; Proverbs, xii. 10. 362 Cf. also Deuteronomy, xx. 19; Romans, viii. 19 ff. Plutarch, De Esu Carnium, Oration I, says that the Athenians punished a man who had flayed a ram while still alive. And the Pythagoreans 'made out of their gentleness towards animals a practice of love and pity towards men'. Porphyry, On Abstaining from Animal Food, Bk. III [xx. 9]. Nor was it for nothing that Mentius, the Chinese philosopher, as we are told by Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. V, advised: 'The king should not permit the use of fine mesh nets in fishing, in order that only the large fish should be caught, while the smaller fish allowed in this way to escape might increase in size in the course of years, and thus always be sufficient for everyone.' And likewise, 'that no one should be allowed to kill chickens, pigs, and other animals before they were grown. In this way men will have a sufficient supply of meat for their use. From this command came the custom of the Chinese not to kill animals until they had arrived at the growth allotted each by nature.' Cf. Deuteronomy, xxii. 6-7. This agrees with the statement of Phocylides [84 f.]: 'And let no man take all the birds at once from the nest, but leave the mother bird, that you may have chicks from her again.' The act of Alexander Severus is also worthy of record, as given us by Lampridius, Severus Alexander [xxii]:

Once, when the population of Rome petitioned him for a reduction of prices, he had a herald ask them what kinds of food they considered too dear, and when they cried out immediately, 'beef and pork,' he refused to proclaim a general reduction but gave orders that no one should slaughter a sow or a suckling-pig, cow or a calf. As a result, in two years or, in fact, a little more than one year, there was such an abundance of pork and beef that, whereas a pound had previously cost eight minutuli, the price of both these meats was reduced to two and even one per pound. (M.)

ON THE ORIGIN OF DOMINION

| <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 1. Proprietorship and community are moral qualities. 2. What are community and proprietorship. 3. They can exist only between more than one. 4. They arise immediately from an agreement of men. 5. On primitive community. 6. The steps of departure from it. 7. That it was of use to mankind. | <ol style="list-style-type: none"> 8. In what sense dominion is said to belong to natural law. 15. How far children are capable of dominion. |
|--|---|

Now that this power of mankind over things began to secure effect in relation to other men (for the ownership of men should not be set against the most eminent right of God; see Euripides, Phoenician Maidens, line 558; add Leviticus, xxv. 23); or, in other words, that dominion arose from the indefinite right according to which one thing belongs to one particular man and not to another—all this is due to another principle. Before we treat of this, we should say, by way of introduction, that proprietorship and community are moral qualities which have no physical and intrinsic effect upon things themselves, but only produce a moral effect in relation to other men; and that these qualities, like the rest of the same kind, owe their birth¹ to imposition. Therefore, it is idle to raise the question whether proprietorship in things is due to nature or to institution. For it is clear that it arises from the imposition of men, and there is no change in the physical substance of things, whether proprietorship is added to or taken away from them.

2. We must in the next place carefully consider and weigh the question, what community is, and what proprietorship or dominion. The term community is taken either negatively or positively. In the former case things are said to be common, according as they are considered before the interposition of any human act, as a result of which they are held to belong in a special way to this man rather than to that. In the same sense such things are said to be nobody's, more in a negative than a positive sense; that is, that they are not yet assigned to a particular person, not that they cannot be assigned to a particular person. They are, furthermore, called 'things that lie open to any and every person'. But common things, by the second and positive meaning, differ from things owned, only in the respect that the latter belong to one person while the former belong to several in the same manner. Furthermore, proprietorship or dominion is a right whereby the substance, as it were, of something belongs to a person in such a way that it does not belong in its entirety to another person in the same manner. For dominion and proprietorship mean to us one and the same thing. Although some say that proprietorship is a right dis severed and separated from usufruct, while it is dominion if usufruct is joined with it; this distinction, however, is not consistently observed. Just as others are over-subtle, who, by the term proprietorship, understand a thing under that quality whereby it belongs to me and not to another, but by dominion the right to dispose at one's will of that thing, such right coming from proprietorship as its effect; and so dominion lies in the person, while proprietorship seems rather to lie in the thing. See Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 1.

But it is wrong to say that dominion is a kind of effect of proprietorship, since if a person wishes to distinguish them so clearly, just the opposite is the case. For it is in the man that that right lies, from which the things themselves receive some kind of extrinsic denomination. And this is understood clearly enough from the fact that, when that right expires together with the man in whom it was vested, things cease to belong to any one, and this without any change in their substance or physical qualities.

Now such is the force of dominion that we are able to dispose of things, which belong to us as our own, at our pleasure, and to keep all others from using them, unless they have acquired for themselves a special right from us by pacts; and so, as long as such things are ours, they cannot in their entirety belong to another in the same way. I say 'in the same way', for nothing prevents, and, indeed, it very often happens, that the same thing belongs to different persons according to different ways of their holding it. Thus, over the same land a State has eminent, the owner, direct, and the emphyteuticary, useful dominion. It was also added 'in their entirety'. For also several persons can possess the same thing in the same way of holding, but each one for his share and not in its entirety. This is true of those possessions which are held undivided by several persons who have the same claim on a thing by virtue of the same kind of dominion.

But proprietorship is sometimes understood to be divided into several parts, as it were, or, if one prefers to state it thus, is understood to have several steps. Thus dominion is commonly divided into plenary and diminished. The former is either combined with 'eminent' dominion, as it is called, in which fashion States or their heads hold their property, or separated from that, and hence called 'common', whereby a man has full power to dispose of his possessions, except in so far as their use is directed by civil laws. Diminution of dominion can take place in such a way that something is taken either from the emolument of dominion, or even from the very propriety itself. The first takes place when, by 364 a pact, or will, or the authority of law, and in this either because of the condition of the persons, or the nature of the things, or for other just causes, the alienation of things is forbidden, or fixed within certain limits, so that no right to the thing in any way may pass thereby to others. Add the will of Theophrastus in Diogenes Laertius, Bk. V [53]. Something is taken from the emolument of dominion, either if the usufruct of our property belongs to another without a contract of loan or hire, or if in some other way my property must return some use to another after the manner of service.

Finally, propriety itself is restricted when another person, along with the full right of using and enjoying a thing, is in some way allowed the right of hiring it, such right being in a way perpetual. In this case he who holds propriety thus restricted and a superior power over the thing, is said to have direct dominion, while he who, with the right of use and enjoyment allowed in the manner stated, shares in the propriety, is said to have useful dominion of the thing thus allowed him. Cf. Struvius, Syntagma, Exercitationes, XI. lv. Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. xii: 'The fact that you cannot sell a thing, or consume it, or exchange it for the better or the worse, does not prove that it is not yours. For that which is yours under certain conditions is yours nevertheless.' (S.) In this connexion it may be noted, in passing, what limitation should be made to the common axiom of lawyers: 'What belongs to a man cannot be made any more his own.' From this they conclude that neither a pledge, nor deposit, nor purchase, nor sale of a thing made to him who already owns it, can stand. Likewise, that a legacy is of no value if a man wills to a legatee what was already his; that no one can to any purpose bargain for a thing that will in any event be his, and the like. That is, unless it so happen that the diminished form of possession may change into a more plenary. And so Lucilius, in the Anthology, Bk. II [IX. clxxi], wittily jests at a certain Hermocrates, a miser, because in his will he entered himself as the heir of his possessions.

Furthermore, since the same thing can be held in its entirety by one man, or by several in undivided manner, in such a way that each one has an equal right in it according to his share, it follows that in this respect things are divided into proper, and common, as in the second sense, whereby the same thing, without being divided, belongs to several persons after the same manner of dominion. Such community differs from propriety, not in the manner and force of dominion (for several persons may have the same right over a common thing that one man has over a proper thing; and just as the propriety of a thing which concerns but one man excludes every other man from an equal right in that thing, so from a common thing all are excluded but those for whom the thing is said to be common), but it differs only in the subject in which it terminates, because a proper thing belongs to one man, a common thing to several. And since none of these has a right extending, as it were, over the whole thing, but having power only over a part of the thing, such part still remaining undivided, it is obvious that one person cannot of his own right dispose of the entire thing, but only of his share; and that if any decision is to be reached on the whole thing, the consent and authority of each person concerned in it must be secured. But Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 1, at the beginning, Felden on Grotius, loc. cit., § 2, and Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., p. 47, have confused negative community with positive, for which reason many of the arguments brought forward in the discussion of this subject are scattered to the winds, as will appear hereafter.

The comments of Seneca, On Benefits, Bk. VII, chap. xii, on the different kinds of community are not irrelevant to our subject:

365 For I have not everything in common with a friend in the same manner as with a partner, where one part belongs to him, and another to me, but rather as a father and a mother possess their children in common, when they have two, not each parent possessing one child, but each possessing both [. . .]. The knights' seats in the theatre belong to all the Roman knights; yet of these the seat which I occupy becomes my own, and if I yield it up to any one, although I only yield him a thing which we own in common, still I appear to have given him something. Some things belong to certain persons under particular conditions. I have a place among the knights, not to sell, or to let, or to live in, but simply to see the spectacle from; wherefore I do not tell an untruth when I say that I have a place among the knights' seats. Yet if, when I come into the theatre, the knights' seats are full, I both have a seat there by right, because I have the privilege of sitting there, and I have not a seat there, because my seat is occupied by those who share my right to those places. (S.)

3. Now it is clear, from what has been said, that both positive community as well as proprietorship imply an exclusion of others from the thing which is said to be common or proper, and therefore presuppose more men than one in the world. Therefore, just as things could not be said to be proper to a man, if he were the only being in the world, so the things from the use of which no man is excluded, or which, in other words, belong to one man no more than to another, should be called common in the former and not in the latter meaning of the term. It is clear, now, from this, to what extent Adam, so long as he was the only man on earth, may have been given dominion over things. That is, although, due to the great extent of the earth and his scant requirements, he had occasion to take for his uses but a small portion of things, yet there was no other man's right to prevent him, if he so wished, or could do so conveniently, from taking for his own use whatever was available. Therefore, the right of Adam to things was different from that dominion, which is now established among men; one may call it indefinite dominion not formally established, but only conceded, not actually, but potentially so. It has the same effect as dominion now has, that, namely, of using things at one's own pleasure; but it was not, properly speaking, dominion, because no other man was then on earth to whom it could oppose its effect; although, upon the increase of men, it could pass into dominion. Therefore, so long as Adam was the only man, things to him were neither common nor proper. For community implies a sharer in the possession, and proprietorship connotes the exclusion of another's right to the same thing, and so neither is intelligible before more than one man has come into being.

4. The further point should be carefully observed, that the grant of God, by which He allowed men the use of the products of the earth, is not the immediate cause of dominion, as it has its effect in relation to other men (a proof of which is to be found in the fact that brute creatures use and consume things as if it were God's will, although no dominion is recognized among them); but that dominion presupposes absolutely an act of man and an agreement, whether tacit or express. It is true that God allowed man to turn the earth, its products, and its creatures, to his own use and convenience, that is, He gave men an indefinite right to them, yet the manner, intensity, and extent of this power were left to the judgement and disposition of men; whether, in other words, they would confine it within certain limits, or within none at all, and whether they wanted every man to have a right to everything, or only to a certain and fixed part of things, or to be assigned his definite portion with which he should rest content and claim no right to anything else. Ambrose, On Duties, Bk. I, chap. xxviii:

Nature has poured forth all things for all men for common use. God has ordered all things to be produced, so that there should be food in common to all, and that the earth should be a common possession of all. Nature, therefore, has produced a common right for all, but greed has made it a right for a few. (R.)

Add Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. i.

It is idle, therefore, to discuss the question whether God gave 366 dominion over things to the first pair, as personifying the whole race of men, or assigned it to them in a special way and as individuals, so that they were masters of the whole world on their own proper right, to whom the rest of mankind owe their possessions by receiving it from their hands. For that divine gift only rendered men more certain of the mercy of God towards them, and assured them that it was with His approval that they turned other creatures to their use and service. But it was left to men themselves, to determine by the forethought of sane reason what measures must be taken to prevent discord from arising among mankind from the use of that right. Yet it was far from God to prescribe a universal manner of possessing things, which all men were bound to observe. And so things were created neither proper nor common (in positive community) by any express command of God, but these distinctions were later created by men as the peace of human society demanded. Therefore, those writers err who make such crude statements as the following: 'It belongs to the law of nature to divide things, that is, the division of things does not take its origin from nature in such a way that it becomes law, or takes on the aspect of law by the decision of nations, but nature herself frames this law and brings it to completion.' And again: 'To divide things is a precept of the Decalogue, that is, one category of natural law. For he who said: "Thou shalt not steal," by the pronouncement said: "Let there be property and a distinction among things; let each man keep his own and not covet what is another's".' See Boecler on the preface of Grotius, p. 9.

And yet there is no precept of natural law whereby all things are commanded to be proper to men in such a way, that every man should be allotted his own separate and distinct portion. Although natural law clearly advised that men should by convention introduce the assignment of such things to individuals, according as it might be of advantage to human society, yet on the condition that it would rest with the judgement of men, whether they wanted all things to be proper or only some, or would hold some things indivisible and leave the rest open to all, yet in such a way that no one might claim them for himself alone. From this it is further understood, that the law of nature approves all conventions which have been introduced about things by men, provided they involve no contradiction or do not overturn society. Therefore, the proprietorship of things has resulted immediately from the convention of men, either tacit or express. For although after God had made the gift, nothing remained to prevent man from appropriating things to himself, yet there was need of some sort of convention if it was to be understood that by such appropriation or seizure the right of others to that thing was excluded. But the fact that right reason suggested the introduction of separate dominions does not prevent them from going back to a human pact.

5. From such remarks as these it is clear that before any conventions of men existed there was a community of all things, not, indeed, such as we have called positive, but a negative one, that is, that all things lay open to all men, and belonged no more to one than to another. But since things are of no use to men unless at least their fruits may be appropriated, and this is impossible if others as well can take what we have already by our own act selected for our uses, it follows that the first convention between men was about these very concerns, to the effect that whatever one of these things which were left open to all, and of their fruits, a man had laid his hands upon, with intent to turn it to his uses, could not be taken from him by another. It is this point that is concerned in Digest, XLI. ii. 1, § 1. This can be illustrated by the case of animals, no one of which, of course, can claim a special right above others to anything, but every one takes for his own nourishment every thing he first happens upon. And even if any one of them 367 has stored up some things for his future use, others are not prevented from seizing them, for the reason that there is no convention among animals which confers a special right over a thing to the one that first got it.

These principles can be illustrated by the conclusions of the author of De Principiis Justi et Decori, pp. 100 ff. [Velthuysen], where he lays down the following premises: Man is permitted to use creatures which lack the power of reason and to possess them. But since all men are by nature equal, their power over creatures is likewise equal, nor with respect to creatures has one part of them been assigned to my neighbour and another to me. The only conclusion, therefore, is that the distinction between possessions is derived from a pact. But since all the institutions of men allow an exception in the case of supreme necessity, when this last arises the original right to all things revives, since it is understood that whenever any man in the division of things renounced his right to such things as are assigned others he did so with this reservation: Provided he cannot otherwise secure his own safety. For a calamity to me does not make for me a right to such things as I had none to previously, but my serious peril puts an end to that condition under which I made over my right. It is in this way, also, that the property of an enemy is lawfully acquired in war, because at the termination of pacts there is a return of primitive right.

Furthermore, he continues, first occupancy of itself, before the existence of pacts, does not confer any right. And this is true, because, no matter in what particular necessity I may be, such property can return to me on that occasion by no right, since this is only possible in the case of property which I made over to my neighbour of my own accord, while there are few persons who would concede such a prerogative over property secured on that score.

All that may be set forth more clearly in this way. If first occupancy of itself granted a right coupled with the exclusion of all the rest of mankind, it would follow that in a case of necessity a second person could not use the property acquired in that way, because that right of necessity springs from an exception, added to a pact on the division of things, and no such pact (as is presupposed) exists touching property secured by occupancy. And it is absurd that in extreme necessity one person cannot use things which a second has acquired by virtue of occupancy. Therefore, it is likewise due to a pact that occupancy gives dominion. Yet there is not much bone and sinew in this argument. Cf. above, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 6.

In the second place, he adds: There is no natural reason for one receiving a right by first occupancy any more than by first laying eye upon a thing. Therefore, this difference arises from the institution of nations, which willed that a right to that land should fall to the one who first occupied it, and not to the one who first saw it.

In the third place, he says: Imagine two men, one swift of foot and the other slow; it is obvious that in such a case the pair is ill-matched in the race to secure property. Therefore, the right whereby what is seized belongs to the first one to occupy it, is founded not upon nature but upon an implicit pact and institution of men.

It might have been stated more briefly that, assuming an original equal faculty of men over things, it is impossible to conceive how the mere corporal act of one person can prejudice the faculty of others, unless their consent is given, that is, unless the pact intervenes. The further claim of the same writer in the passage quoted (cf. also p. 266), that a single man in the primitive state could have subdued the entire world, is baseless, and is refuted even by Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 11.

6. Now men left this original negative community of things and by a pact established separate dominions over things, not, indeed, all at once and for all time, but successively, and as the state of things, or the nature and number of men, seemed to require. Thus, the Scythians used to allow property in flocks and household goods, but their fields were held in original community. Justin, Bk. II, chap. ii. And truly the 368 peace and tranquillity of mankind, the maintenance of which is the first concern of the law of nature, made no uncertain suggestion as to what might be the most salutary arrangement by men in this regard. For after the human race had multiplied and acquired a cultured mode of life, the peace of men did not suffer that there should remain for every man an equal power over all things, that is, that all things should lie open to all for the promiscuous use of every man. Digest, VIII. ii. 26. Since innumerable conflicts could not avoid arising from the rivalry of many persons over the same thing, which could not suffice for all of them at one time, especially in view of the fact that such is the nature of the vast majority of things, that they can be of service to but one person at one time.

The causes for things passing into proprietorship, and the order which they followed can, I think, be understood on these considerations: Most things which are of use to men immediately and are employed to nourish¹ them and protect their bodies, are not produced everywhere by nature and without cultivation in such abundance that they fully suffice for every one. Therefore, an occasion for quarrels and wars lay ready at hand, if two or more men needed the same thing, and individuals tried to appropriate for themselves the same thing, when it was not enough for all. See Hobbes, De Cive, chap. i, § 6. Moreover, most things require labour and cultivation by men to produce them and make them fit for use. But in such cases it was improper that a man who had contributed no labour should have right to things equal to his by whose industry a thing had been raised or rendered fit for service. Therefore, it was advantageous to peace among men that, as soon as men multiplied, there should be introduced dominion of mobile things, especially such as require labour and cultivation by men, and, among immobile things, dominion of those which are of immediate use to men, such as places for dwelling; that, in other words, the substance of these objects might belong separately to individuals, or, when several were concerned, to those who by special convention had agreed to a positive community in such things. Furthermore, although there appears to be some reason why such things should belong to some men rather than to others, yet the dominion of the one group, involving, as it does, the exclusion¹ of the rest, had to be confirmed at least by a tacit pact, which contained at the same time a tacit renunciation on the part of the rest; because, when things have been assigned one person, the rest of mankind do not care to advance any claim to them on the alleged ground that the earth, as the common home of men, has contributed to those same things their substance and nourishment.

But² regarding the immobile things produced by nature without the labour of man, such as fields, they were so extensive that they abundantly provided for the small number of early men, and for that reason at first only so much of them was occupied as men judged to be suitable for their uses, while the rest was left in a state of original negative community, so that every man who wished to was free in the future to take it. And hence it is understood that a pact was agreed upon, to the effect that such fields as had been assigned to one person by the express convention of the rest of men, or such as the rest could be held tacitly to have withdrawn from, in view of the fact that one man alone had been allowed to enjoy them in peace, while they had claimed for themselves other fields on the same basis—that such fields should belong to those who cultivated them. And finally, that what was left should pass to those who would hereafter occupy the fields. Add Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 2, p. 224.

At this point it should be observed, in passing, that when Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. I, chap. iv, says that 'Cain set bounds to land', he can merit no more confidence than when he relates in the same passage that Cain 'injured and vented his passion upon his fellow inhabitants, increased his dwelling by his hoards of money, gathered by rapine and violence, and incited his companions to all kinds of robbery'. For I do not comprehend how such deeds can be attributed to the first-born son of him, who with his consort was created by God as the first and only human being.

7. That it was advantageous to mankind, when it had grown numerous, to introduce distinct dominions of things, can be shown by the arguments with which Aristotle, Politics, Bk. II, chap. ii [5], undertakes to refute the Platonic community of property. Although he is undertaking to overthrow positive community, we are inquiring into the reason for the departure from negative community. Add also Aristophanes, Ecclesiazusae, pp. 746 ff.

His meaning is: If all men should labour in common and should lay up their earnings in common, and should they be maintained from a common store, quarrels could not help arising by reason of the inequality of their toil and its product. He well says: 'There is always a difficulty in men living together and having things in common.' (J.) That is the reason why we are so greatly incensed at the members of our household with whom we are associated every day. But the introduction of property does away with such quarrels and every man takes greater interest in his own portion, while an opportunity is given him to show liberality to others out of his own store. Therefore, 'It is clearly better that property should be in private, but the use of it common.' Again: 'How immeasurably greater is the pleasure when a man feels a thing to be his own.' (Juvenal, Satires III [230-1]: 'It is something to be able in any spot, in any retreat whatever, to have made oneself proprietor even of a single lizard.' (E.)) Again: 'There is the greatest pleasure in doing a kindness or service to friends or guests or companions which can only be rendered when a man has private property.' (J.) Furthermore, since the use of most things is not enough to meet the desires of all men whenever they choose, they could not avoid quarrelling with each other; for they would turn their attention to the same thing and it would not suffice them for all, were such things not made over to distinct owners.

I confess, however, that these arguments have not prevented Thomas More and Thomas Campanella from introducing community of property, the former among the inhabitants of his Utopia and the latter in his City of the Sun, probably I suppose because perfect men are more easily imagined than found. But this also shows the falsity of the old saying: 'Mine and thine are the causes of all wars.' Rather it is that 'mine and thine' were introduced to avoid wars. For this reason Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 843 A], designates a boundary stone as 'the stone which is the sworn arbiter of friendship and hatred between neighbours.' (J.) On their sacredness see also Deuteronomy, xix. 14; Job, xxiv. 2; the whole chapter in the Digest, XLVII. xxi; Collatio Legum¹ Mosaicarum cum [et] Romanarum, tit. 13; Paulus, Sententiae, Bk. II, chap. xvi; Bk. V, chap. xxii. Frontinus, De Re Agraria [p. 277, ed. Keuchen]: 'Let every individual keep his own boundaries and not trespass on another's. For the boundary was set up in the land for the specific purpose of ending strife about the fields.¹ But the infinite crop of wars arises from the fact that the avarice of men burns to overleap the bounds of 'mine and thine', that have been established by a pact or by laws. Lysias, Orations, xvii [xviii. 17]: 'Men fall out with one another principally, when some set their hearts upon what belongs to others, and others lose what was really theirs.'

8. Although these facts are plain enough, I wish to examine at some pains the opinions of some ancient and modern writers on this point. Of the ancient writers Diodorus Siculus, Bk. I [viii], says: 'The first men to spring forth from the earth lived a wild life, like that of beasts, roamed forth in herds to places where food was to be found, and lived off the juiciest of herbs and whatever fruits the trees happened to produce. (Pliny, Natural History, Bk. XXIII, pr. [XXIII. i], on trees: 'Man's first food came from the trees, and in that way they were led to turn their gaze toward heaven; in fact, even at this time they could not get their living from the same source without recourse to the products of the soil.' (B. and R.) 'Since they did not know how to store up food and lay it away for future needs, they perished in great numbers from exposure and in winter from lack of nourishment; until they were slowly led by experience to seek shelter in caves in the winter and to lay up stores of food for their preservation, their life, in this way, becoming 370 more and more refined.' (B.*)

Accepting this hypothesis on the origin of men, even though it be false, the conclusion is that men in the beginning lived on things open to all; and that only after pacts introduced property in the shape of houses and of stores collected for future uses, did property in the form of fields gradually come to be recognized. In this connexion is often urged the passage of Justin, Bk. XLIII, chap. i, where it is related that Saturnus, king of the Aborigines, was so just that 'no one was a slave in his reign or had any private property, but all things were common to all, and undivided, as one estate for the use of every one.' (W.)

Passages from the poets on the state of things in the happy Golden Age are also adduced in great numbers. Vergil, Georgics, Bk. I [125 ff.]: 'Before Jove, no husbandmen subdued the fields; nor was it even lawful to mark out ground, or by limits to divide the plain; men acquired all for the common good, and earth of herself produced everything very freely without compulsion.' (B.) Illustrations of this passage are furnished by Seneca, Letters, xc. Tibullus, Elegies, Bk. I, el. iii [41 ff.]: 'That was a time when the sturdy bull had not bent his neck to the yoke, nor the tamed horse champed the bit. No house had doors; no stone was planted on the land to set fixed boundaries to men's estates.' (P.) Seneca, Octavia, Act II [395 ff.]:

¹ [This citation we have not found in Frontinus, or in any other of the Roman Surveyors. The last part of it is a quotation from Vergil, Aeneid, XII. 898.—Tr.]

Not yet were cities hedged
 With ponderous walls; the way was free to all,
 And free to all the use of everything.
 The earth, untilled, spread wide her fertile lap. (M.)

Idem, Hippolytus, Act II, sc. ii [525 ff.]:

Those primal men who mingled with the gods.
 They were not blinded by the love of gold;
 No sacred stone divided off the fields
 And lotted each his own in judgement there. (M.)

Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. I [135 ff.], on the Iron Age: 'And the ground, which had hitherto been a common possession like the sunlight and the air, the careful surveyor now marked out with long-drawn boundary-line.' (M.) Macrobius, Saturnalia, Bk. I, chap. viii: 'The Romans wanted the temple of Saturn to be their treasury, because, when he lived in Italy, no theft was committed in his kingdom; or because no man had any private property then. "It was not even allowed to mark out the soil or to divide the plain with a boundary; men sought all things in common" [Vergil, Georgics, I. 126 f.]. Therefore, they would have the common funds of the people stored away in the house of that God, under whose reign all things had once been common to all men.' These and similar passages from the poets are thus explained by Lactantius, Divine Institutes, Bk. V, chap. v:

'It was not even allowed to mark out or to divide the plain with a boundary: men sought all things in common' [Vergil, Georgics, I. 126 f.]; since God had given the earth in common to all, that they might pass their life in common, not that fierce and raging avarice might claim¹ all things for itself, and that that which was produced for all might not be wanting to any. And this saying of the poet ought so to be taken, not as suggesting the idea that individuals at that time had no private property, but it must be regarded as a poetical figure; that we may understand that men were so liberal, that they did not shut up the fruits of the earth produced for them, nor did they in solitude brood over the things stored up, but admitted the poor to share the fruits of their labour. (C.)

Now just as the poet can persuade no sensible person that early men acquired all things for the common use, or that there was a positive community, so the explanation advanced by Lactantius for their statements does not satisfy us. For they were probably not as yet so given over to avarice, because they were still unacquainted with wealth, and the earth furnished them, still ignorant of the enticements of the appetite, an easy living, while there do not appear to have been any resources for liberality, when there was no occasion to collect wealth. Some quite aptly point out that, to understand this tradition of a Golden Age, we should bear in mind the disposition of unlettered and agricultural peoples, which is so clearly inclined to ease and sluggishness, and averse to labour. And that the more unrefined and simple the life of any people, the less place they hold, while a richer and more refined manner of life requires great industry and extended endeavour. Add Michel Montaigne, Essais, Bk. I, chap. xxx. Finally, that it is a common failing of old men to be 'praisers of the past time when they were young' [Horace, Art of Poetry, 173 f.], almost consistently scorning the present and praising what is old and time-worn, and that, therefore, it seems likely that when those simple folk 371 were forced by legislators to labour and a more refined life, they took such a change of habits very hard, and many a time longed for their nuts and their idleness. From this complaint of their forbears later generations then created those dreams about a Golden Age. This is borne out by the fact that Sallust, Catiline [vi], calls the Aborigines¹, who lived in that age, 'a rustic folk, without laws or government, free and unrestrained.' (R.) Add Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Bk. I [x], on the same people. Likewise Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. I [89 ff.], says that the happiness of the Golden Age consisted in this: Men cherished fidelity and right of their own accord and 'without law', being safe from punishment because as yet there were no civil governments. 'And men, content with food that came from no one's seeking, gathered the arbut fruit, strawberries from the mountain-sides, cornel-cherries, berries hanging thick upon the prickly bramble, and acorns falling from the spreading tree of Jove.' (M.)

But the further descriptions by Ovid of the perpetual spring, the choice fruits produced spontaneously, and rivers running over with nectar and milk, are no more true than the following effusions of Pherecrates [in Athenaeus, VI. xcvi, p. 268 E F]:

There were rivers
With tender pulse and blackest soup o'erflowing,
Which ran down brawling through the narrow dishes,
Bearing the crusts and spoons away in the flood.
Then there were dainty closely kneaded cakes;

There were black-puddings and large boiling slices
Of well mixed sausages, which hissed within
The smoking streamlet in the stead of oysters.

For roasted thrushes nicely browned and hot
Flew to the mouths of the guests, entreating them
To deign to swallow them. (Y.*)

There is also the famous passage in Cicero, On Duties, Bk. I [vii]:

The province of justice is that public property be appropriated to public, and private to individual, use. Now, by nature no property is private, but dependent either on ancient possession (as when men formerly came into unoccupied territories); or victory (as when they have taken possession of it in war); or public constitution, contract, terms, or lot. By those, the land of Arpinum is regarded as belonging to the Arpinates; the Tusculan, to the

Tusculans. The like division holds with regard to matters of private property. Thus, as every man holds his own, each should possess that portion which fell to his share of those things that by nature were common; and it follows, that no man can covet another's property without violating the laws of human society. (E.)

Some also adduce the following passage of Horace, Satires, Bk. II, sat. ii [129 ff.]:

For nature makes neither him nor me nor any one else in a true sense owner of the land. He turned us out: he will be turned out by the villainy of some other, or by his own ignorance of the subtleties of the law; and if he is not, in the end he will be turned out by an heir whose life is a better one than his own. The land goes now by the name of Umbrenus: a few years ago it went by that of Ofellus: but it will never belong to anybody. It will yield its use now to me, now to some one else. (W.*)

Idem, Epistles, Bk. II, ep. ii [111 ff.]:

As though anything were a man's own, which in a moment of flying time, now by request, now by purchase, now by force, now, if not before, by death, changes owners and becomes the property of another. Inasmuch then as to no one is given perpetual occupation—heir follows heir as wave follows wave—what is the profit of estates or store-houses? (W.)

Lucian [really anonymous], Anthology, IX. 74: 'I was once the field of Achaemenides and am now Menippus', and I shall continue to pass from one man to another. For Achaemenides once thought he possessed me, and Menippus again thinks he does; but I belong to no man, only to Fortune.' (P.) Idem, Nigrinus [xxvi]:

We are not 'owners' of any of these things by natural law, but we take over the use of them for an indefinite period by custom and inheritance and are considered their proprietors for a brief space; and when our allotted days of grace are past, another takes them over and enjoys the title. (H.)

But such remarks apply more to the instability of fortune and of human possessions than to the origin of separate dominions; just as for the same reason Cicero, For Balbus [xxv, towards the end], says: '... Lands do not belong to any particular family.' (Y.)

9. Let us now set forth the position of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 2, passing over, however, what he adds against the accepted doctrines of our churches, which have been already censured enough by others. He says: 'Soon after the creation of the world, and a second time after the Flood, God conferred upon the human race a general right over things of a lower nature.' (K.) This we accept in the sense that God allowed men a right to use the things of this earth 'in a general way', that is, He did not determine at that same time what things should be held individually, and what in common, but this He left to the judgement of men, that they should dispose of the matter according as it seemed to work for peace. But no credit should be given to any such idea as that God at the beginning instituted a positive community, from which men later withdrew on their own initiative, but rather, so far as it concerned God, such things were left open to the uses of men. Now so long as the actual bodies of things were not yet assigned to certain individuals, there was a tacit convention that each man could appropriate for his own use, primarily of the fruits of things, what he wanted, and could consume what was consumable. And such a universal use of things in some way took the place of proprietorship, while, what a man had taken in this way, another could not take from him without doing him an injury.

Now just as the example taken from the theatre meets the need of illustrating this fact (see Arrian, Epictetus, Bk. II, chap. iv, towards the end), so the example of the Aborigines, as Justin describes them, is not to the point. For the words of that author picture some positive community, such as that primitive state was not, as if that entire country belonged to a people, but had not yet been divided into private estates, because those men were content with fruits that grew of themselves, which the expanse of forests and fields brought forth in profusion for a small population. But it does not seem likely that those fruits were collected unto a common store. Yet Grotius rightly maintains that if this negative community was to continue without disturbance to the common peace, men had to live in great simplicity, content to subsist upon natural fruits, to live in caves, and to go about with bodies either bare or else covered with the bark of trees and the skins of animals; while if they wanted a more refined kind of life, the advantages of which had to be secured by industry, property in things was necessary. But when he adds that community could have endured 'if men had lived on terms of mutual affection such as rarely appears', he confuses negative community with positive, such as was practised formerly among the Essenes (on whom see especially Philo Judaeus, That Every Virtuous Man is Free), the early Christians in Jerusalem, and among those who follow an ascetic life. Add Martinus, Historia Sinica, Bk. V, chap. xxiv. For such a community can be instituted and maintained only by a small group, which is also endowed with singular humility of mind. When men are scattered to distant places it would be a labour of folly to gather products into one place, and then distribute them from a common store; while among a large number of men many must necessarily be found who from a defective sense of justice and from πλεονεξία [greediness] would be unwilling to maintain due equality either in labour or in consumption of food. And Plato, Laws, Bk. V [p. 739 D E], suggests this very thing in assigning to the gods¹ and their offspring this same state where there is a community of all things. But it is foolish to believe that after men had separated into several families, they ever established or wanted to establish such a community. Add Iohannes Strauchius, Dissertatio de Imperio Maris, chap. i, § 8.

Finally, this point of Grotius is well taken: 'Things at the first passed into proprietorship not by a mere act of will' [II. ii. 5], in other words, upon deliberation. For others were not able to know what a man wished to be his own, that they might refrain from it, and several were in a position to want the same thing. Therefore, there was need of an external act or seizure, and for this to produce a moral effect, that is, an obligation on the part of others to refrain from a thing already seized by some one else, an antecedent pact was required and an express pact, indeed, when several men divided among themselves things open to all; but a tacit pact sufficed when the things occupied at that time had been 373 left unpossessed by the first dividers of things. For it is understood that these men agreed that those things which in the first division had not been assigned to a definite individual should pass to him who was the first to take possession¹ of them.

10. Most recent writers differ entirely from us on the origin of dominion. Let us see what force there is in their arguments. Now they acknowledge that community is taken in a double sense, either as that which, while undivided and proper to several, furnishes a common use to each person; or as that which acknowledges no proprietorship whatsoever, and serves the general use of all. But they deny things not only the first kind of community at the beginning, as we also do, but also the second; and so they deny that at the beginning, when proprietorship was entirely lacking, all things lay open to common use, denying as well the consequence of this, namely, that individual dominions arose originally from division and occupation. Their reason is as follows: 'The nature and amount of right over things, held by the first man, he received in its entirety from the Creator. Now if he received the mere faculty of using without proprietorship, his descendants could not have exercised proprietorship without incurring the censure of πλεονεξία [greediness] and laying hands upon that which the Creator had forbidden men to use.'

This can easily be answered from what has just been said. It is true that man received from God's hands a right over things, but such as was indefinite, general, indifferent, unrestricted to proprietorship or community, which men could also reduce into a special form, as it were, according to the dictates of reason and necessity. And so primitive community does not signify a mere usufruct,² to the exclusion of proprietorship, but it could pass by a convention of men as well into proprietorship as into positive community.

Neither does the further statement of theirs properly follow: The first man did not receive or seize a right over things on the formal basis or reason of proprietorship; therefore, his descendants were unable to exercise it on that formal claim. That donation of God, described in the Sacred Scriptures, sets forth not a definite form of dominion, but only an indefinite right to apply things to uses which are reasonable and necessary, which right can be exercised as well in negative community as in proprietorship. But it is incorrect to infer that men received a right from the donation of God; therefore, proprietorship did not come from appropriation and division. For the donation of God only made man secure, on the assumption that God wished him to consume upon his necessities the things which He had created. But dominion in the proper sense of the word should have had the effect in relation to other men, that no one should trespass on what had already been assigned to another. In that case there was need of a human transaction, in order that others might know what belonged to another, so as to be able to keep their hands off it. A common theatre is erected by a State for the use of its citizens. But if one citizen rather than another is to secure a seat for a performance, from which he cannot rightfully be removed by another, there is need of a corporal act, that is, of his occupying the seat. Nay, more, individual citizens, with the consent of the State, can secure seats for themselves for all time. In the same way it is understood that, before the occurrence of a human act sufficient to cause dominion, anything is public property, negatively common to all, that is, belonging no more to one man than to another. But when division has been made by express agreement, or occupancy has been granted by tacit agreement, the thing passes over from negative community into proprietorship.

But if some, however, want to draw from this premise the conclusion that, 'by the dominion, which God Himself conferred upon men before any preceding act on their part, is understood only potential dominion, or the power of taking and possessing, and dominion of the first instance [in actu primo], through which they pass into possession, and from possession into dominion of the second instance [in¹ actu secundo],' they differ from our view only in terms, not in fact. Although they are scarcely accurate in calling the power of taking things dominion 374 of the first instance, and that, which follows² possession, dominion of the second instance. For the power to acquire some right, and the right itself inhering by habit, yet without operation or exercise, are different things; just as it is one thing to be a potential musician, and another thing not to sing when one has been musically trained. Nor does that potential dominion square in every respect with the illustration of inheritance, 'the dominion of which passes directly and immediately to the heir without seizure, upon the death of the testator, out of his habit or power.' For aside from the fact that 'out of habit' and 'out of power' are different things, a fiction of civil law intervenes in this case. It is a rule of nature that, in the transfer of dominion from one person to another, there is required not only an offer on the part of the former, but also an acceptance on the part of the latter. But since it is the design of the laws that the desire of the testator be subject to change until his last breath, and that it be kept concealed until after his death, the law suspends, as it were, the will of the dead man on transferring his goods to the heir, until the time when the heir declares his acceptance; or, if one prefers it stated thus, it withholds the acceptance of the heir to the last breath of the testator, at which moment his will becomes fixed, so that the property is understood to have passed to the heir immediately, from hand to hand. Such a fiction gives rise to the effect of dominion in the heir, to the extent that he can lay claim to his legacy even before he has actually come into possession of it. Were it not for a fiction of this kind dominion would no more belong in an inheritance to an heir before his actual entrance into it than it does in a donation before acceptance. Therefore, also for those who live under natural law, in which the fictions of civil law are in general lacking, no potential, as opposed to actual, possession will be admitted, nor will possession be defined as the mere right and power of acquiring possession for oneself. Cf. Iohannes Strauchius, loc. cit., chap. i.

II. Many writers on this subject like to appeal to the authority of sacred history, by which they would establish that a community of this kind never existed.

The sum total of things passed at once to Adam through the gift of God, so that he held complete and sole possession of them. The force of this proprietorship was such that he not only excluded others from this sum total of things held by himself, but also no other person, if there had been any, had a right to appropriate any of them. So extensive was this force that even the children of Adam were entirely excluded from the dominion of things, so long as they were in the family circle of their father, unless they were given something by their parent as a special possession. They obtained dominion, after their emancipation, over whatever things their parent had allowed them, and upon the death of their parent his possessions were divided among them.

Cf. Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 2. Their meaning is this:

The formula of the gift made by God conferred a right only on the one pair of mankind, since the children of Adam were not yet born. Therefore, either property in things was given to Adam and Eve alone, from whom their children received their title of possession, or else the sum total of things was given to all mankind in the person of Adam. To the latter proposition is opposed, among other considerations, the right of occupancy, which is only allowable in a thing unpossessed. For, if the sum total of things had been given to all mankind, there appears no consideration by which individuals might by occupancy make any of these things their own, to the deprivation of all mankind, or so that all men could claim no further right over it. Since such is the nature of things in common, which have their parts not divided but undivided, that there is not even an atom of them in which the community is not indivisible, while if it is taken by an individual for his own use alone, it will be severed from the community, and an injury done the latter. Yet those who defend a primitive community confess that individuals upon occupancy acquired such a right over the things thus taken that the right of all others to any particular thing in question was excluded.

what has gone before. The gift of God conferred on man only a right to turn creatures to his own uses, which right is indifferent to positive community and property, that are rights having effect against other men. Therefore, when other authors add that 'the common dominion of mankind over things was given by God himself, on condition that they establish and divide among themselves private dominion, and so it neither can nor should be conceived without relation to private dominion, to be established along lines in agreement with rational and social nature', we can interpret such a statement entirely to the advantage of our own position. Surely the gift of God established things at the first in negative community. But since that was ill-adapted to the maintenance of the peace of society, after mankind had multiplied and life had begun to be refined through industry, it was easy for men to recognize it as God's will that distinct dominions over things be introduced. Before these could be set up, they had to be preceded by a human deed and convention. For there is no necessary opposition in the two statements, namely, that something was constituted by the divine will, and that it was an act introduced by a preceding convention of men. Just as these statements are not opposed: God wills that mankind shall not reproduce itself by indiscriminate licence, but by lawful marriage; and there is need of a preceding pact for marriages to exist in act between certain individuals. Furthermore, since positive community and property involve a relation to other men, it is not accurate to say that all created things were proper to Adam, but only that he was the owner of all things not formally but permissively, that is, in so far as no other person had a right which hindered him from turning all things to his own uses whenever he needed to. When God joined to him a dear companion they decided to use that indefinite right over things as undivided, in view of their being joined in that closest of all bonds, by reason of which even to this day, among many nations, between husband and wife there is a common ownership of property.

Nor was there any need of distinct dominions, so long as Adam's offspring, still of tender years, had to be supported by their parent, or were still under the fatherly authority. For it was due to the force of the father's authority, and not that of dominion, that for a time his children had to accommodate their use of things to the will of their father. Therefore, distinct dominions came into force only when, with the consent of their father, children commenced to set up separate establishments, which was undoubtedly caused by the ancient rivalry of the brothers, as well as by the consideration that each one's industry might be his own gain and his idleness his own burden. Yet it should not be held that the whole earth¹ was at once divided between that handful of mortals, or that all things once and for all passed under proprietorship. It was enough at first that those things should be made proper which are either immediately and indivisibly of use to several persons, such as clothing, habitations, and fruits gathered for food, or which require some labour and care, such as implements, household furnishings, herds, and fields. Little by little what remained came under proprietorship, according as the inclination of men or their increasing numbers directed. Thus for a long time pasture lands remained in primitive community, until, as herds multiplied and quarrels arose, it was to the interest of peace that they also be divided. But the further statement that 'there is no place for occupancy when the sum total of things belongs to an entire group', has force against those who try to foist upon the primitive state of things some positive community in which, of course, individuals cannot claim something as their own to the exclusion of the entire group. But the primitive state of things which we set forth is as different from positive community as from 376 proprietorship, strictly speaking, and we maintain that a preceding pact, at least a tacit one, is required for occupancy to give rise to dominion.

12. Others give the following explanation of the origin of dominion according to the Sacred Writ: 'Now God, indeed, gave to our first parents the common dominion which men were to hold undivided, since our first parents represented the person of mankind. In this sense it can be said that the dominion of the earth or of the things on it, in so far as they can sustain property, belongs to mankind. But that common dominion does not exclude private dominion, since it neither can nor should be conceived without relation to private dominion, so constituted as was agreeable with rational and social nature. But in Adam there was a union with common dominion of private dominion, which excluded his children without any previous cession.' See Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit. Here we will have no quarrel with any one over mere terms, and will allow common dominion to be what is for us the right, belonging to men by virtue of the gift of God, to use creatures; provided that common dominion, considered by itself, has no effect in relation to men. On this point it has already been observed that men were able to be content with that right of using¹ things left in common, and that there was no need of introducing divided dominions, so long as mankind consisted of but few people, and was content with a simple and plain life. But as mankind multiplied and living conveniences were increased by industry, the necessity of preserving a social life led to the introduction of dominions, yet so that not all things passed into proprietorship at one time, but successively, according as considerations of concord seemed to require. But there is absolutely no authority for saying that to Adam, before his sons set about to establish different families, belonged private dominion over all things. For private dominion first commences by some human act; therefore, Adam was unable to have dominion over those things which he had never taken possession of, nay, which he had never even formed any idea of.

The passage in Digest, XLI. ii. 3, § 1, has no place here, as if Adam, by setting foot on one part of the earth, is understood to have taken possession of the entire world. But if any one wishes to designate by the name of proprietorship that right, given men by the Creator, of using things, it might be admitted that 'proprietorship is the cause of division and occupancy', that is, men were allowed to claim things for themselves by occupancy and division, because God had allowed them to apply things to their use. But if we wish to take proprietorship in its proper sense, as denoting the exclusion of all others from a certain thing allowed one person, it is quite true that division and occupancy are the causes of proprietorship. Furthermore, the children of Adam, while still in the family circle of their father, had to suit their use of things to the will of their father, not, however, by reason of private dominion belonging to Adam, but by virtue of the force of paternal authority. For he was obligated to maintain them while young. When, then, their assistance could be of value, paternal authority brought it about that the children should both govern by the wishes of their father their use of things which were open to all, lest they should suffer some ill from their intemperance, and should turn over into the hands of their father to dispose of as he wished whatever natural products of the earth they had gathered, or that they had raised by their own labour. And so long as Adam availed himself of that right, he was obligated to supply his sons, even when they had arrived at maturity, with necessities as occasion demanded. Therefore if, for example, some son of Adam had privately gorged himself more greedily than was proper on some particular fruits against the command of his father, he would not have incurred the crime of thievery, but he would merely have violated his father's control. Or, if Adam had ordered an older brother to go out and gather some fruits for a younger, and he had either put them in his own stomach, or hidden them away for his future use, he would have deserved punishment, not for theft, but because of disobedience to his father. We conclude, therefore, that during this period, neither Adam nor his sons had private dominion, but his needs were met by the right of primitive community, while the latter, in the exercise of that right, followed the direction of their father. Therefore, the private dominion of Adam commenced at the time when he emancipated, as it were, his sons, and gave them the right to set up their own individual households.

13. Let us also examine the arguments of those who maintain that this primitive community was impossible. See Boecler, loc. cit. They say: 'Such a community neither should nor could have existed in the state of innocence, because just as every order conforms to right reason, so the most comely order of possessing things, dominion over which was given mankind by God, accorded best of all with that state in which abstinence from what is another's should have merited a worthy name. Therefore, in the Decalogue abstinence is sanctioned, just as each man is assured of a fixed and individual possession of his property, but the former law was graven in the minds of men even before the fall.' The reply to this is, in the first place, that it is by no means clearly established what sort of a life, as regards those external things, men would have led if they had remained in that primitive state, free from sin, and whether, therefore, community of things would have suited that life better than proprietorship. In the next place, it is open to question, whether there is not greater perfection in the virtue of peacefully enjoying with others the things that are open to all, and of not seeking something for oneself alone to the exclusion of the rest of mankind than in abstaining from what is another's. And finally, whatever may be said upon the eternity of natural law, it is certainly not necessary for all the objects of that law to have existed from all time, for many of them make their appearance gradually out of the conventions and institutions of men. Thus, the law of homicide found no object, so long as Adam was the only living man, nor did the law of adultery, while he was the only male, nor the law of false witness, before the institution of trials, nor the law of not coveting a neighbour's house, when caves were still the homes of men, nor of coveting a servant and handmaid, before the institution of slavery, nor the law of honouring one's parents, before Eve had brought forth. See above, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 22 [II. iii. 24].

They continue: 'After the fall, likewise, that community was impossible, in the first place, because it is inconceivable. For the laws of that community are described by Grotius to the effect that every man could at once seize for his own uses what he wished, and consume what was consumable. And yet such a use of universal right took the place of proprietorship, for whatever each man took in this way for his own use another could not take from him without doing him an injury. But on this theory proprietorship is established in community'; and so a contradiction is involved, since only proprietorship can give rise to the effect that one man cannot take a thing from another.

Yet here a difficulty is uselessly created where there is none. For primitive community is one thing, before any deed of man and the use of any thing, when each thing merely belongs no more to one man than to another, and in this way belongs quite as well to neither; but it is another thing when men begin to make use of things open to all. For then, whatever each man has seized for his own uses becomes proper to him by a previous pact, since without such men would have to refrain from the use of all things. Therefore, in this, as it were, limited community the bodies of things belong to no one, but their fruits after gathering are proper. Such a tempering of primitive community with proprietorship, I feel, is comprehensible even by men of ordinary intelligence. An oak-tree belonged to no man, but the acorns that fell to the ground were his who had gathered them. 378

With this posited, their next statement finds an equally easy reply, for they deny that 'such a community could have persisted even for the briefest period, but that it was opposed to human, that is, rational nature, appropriate only to animals, and unsocial. And so it serves no other use than merely to show, as by a purely imaginary hypothesis, the necessity in a commonwealth of distinct dominion.' Now that community, considered as thoroughgoing, could not persist, unless men were willing always to go hungry and to wander about naked; but, so long as men were not too numerous and led a simple life, nothing prevented its existence with a certain degree of proprietorship. Yet it is certain that the more the number of men increased, and the more refined life became, the greater necessity there was for things in increasing numbers to pass under proprietorship. Those people who to this day are but little removed from primitive community, are somewhat barbarous and simple; such, for instance, as exist on herbs, roots, the natural fruits of the earth, by hunting, and fishing, with no other property than a shed and some rude furniture.

Furthermore, when we assert that by nature all things were negatively common, we do not mean that the law of nature commands us to maintain that state of things for all time, but only that things considered without any preceding act of men were of such a nature that they belonged no more to one man than to another. Yet, on the other hand, when we say that reason suggested the departure from the community, we do not mean to imply that it was necessary for all things to pass under proprietorship at one moment, but only as considerations of men, of things, and of places required, and as the best means were found to remove causes of dispute. And so we have not sinned against the law of nature in entirely doing away with primitive community, nor have backward peoples in retaining to this day many of its features. And so the next point raised offers little difficulty, when they say: 'After the Fall men could never live without law, if they were to lead a social life; therefore, no more could they without the distinction of dominions, since community of things is inconsistent with law, the main purpose of which is to assign and distribute the possession of things.' And yet, since not all laws presuppose dominions of things, why could not those others be observed, so that a social life might be led in that limited community? Although it is true enough, that before the division of dominions men could be controlled by a simple code such as might be included in a few headings. And so some limitations should be set upon the statement of Servius on the Aeneid, Bk. IV, line 58, where he maintains that Ceres was called the Lawgiver, and her rites Thesmophoria,¹ because she is said to have discovered laws, since before the discovery of grain, men wandered about here and there without law, which wild life was interrupted at the discovery of the use of grain, after laws had arisen from the dividing off of fields, that is, there was need of a more complicated legal apparatus, after the introduction of divided dominions of things, since mankind had been controlled before by few laws. Yet community itself only renders life simple and unadorned, but slightly organized, as it were, and not lawless and unsocial. The community advanced by Plato has no place here, since it is positive and embraces not merely things, but wives and children as well.

14. It can be gathered, from what has been said, in what sense we are to take the statement of some, that 'propriety and dominion belong to natural law taken in its strict sense, and as it is engraved upon the minds of men'. Here it should be observed that the expression, 'this or that belongs to natural law,' has a different meaning, according as it is applied either to some command, in the strict sense of the word, or to 379 some institution introduced into human life. In the former sense it means that the law of nature commands that this be or not be done; in the latter, that sane reason, upon a consideration of the general state of social life, advises that this be set up and established among men. For whatever institutions have been introduced, because of their special advantage to this or that state, are said to belong to civil or positive law. Therefore, when the question is raised, whether dominion traces its origin to natural law, the latter and not the former sense of the word is to be taken. That is, since the foundation of natural law is a social life, and the nature of man's mind shows clearly enough that among a great number of men, who are undertaking to advance life by various arts, a quiet and decorous society cannot exist without distinct dominions of things, therefore, such were introduced in accordance with the proper requirements of human affairs, and with the aim of natural law. After this was done, the same law enjoins the observance of whatever things work to the end of the dominion instituted. But it was needless for all things, immediately upon the creation of mankind, and wherever located, to come under propriety by some definite precept of natural law; propriety, on the other hand, has been introduced as the peace of men seemed to require it. But the precept of natural law about abstaining from what is another's first exerted its force when men defined by convention what each should hold to be another's, and what his own. Till that time it lay dormant, so far as its strength was concerned, in that general precept about the preservation of pacts and about not impairing another's right. Nor does it involve an absurdity to say that the obligation to observe the law of abstaining from what is another's is coeval with mankind, and yet the institution of 'one's own and another's' was introduced later. We are often obligated to obedience before we know what is to be commanded us; for instance, when we are in general obligated to obey what is later to be commanded us by some one, or when several special commands can be summed up under one general precept.

15. At this point something should be added on the subject of dominion, where the most important question is whether those who lack the use of reason, such as children and the insane, are capable of dominion. This much is certain, that a child and an insane person cannot acquire dominion over a thing originally, that is, make something theirs by immediate occupancy. The reason is that to acquire dominion in this way there is requisite intention, on the part of the one acquiring it, that he wishes to have this thing in future as his own, and that he understands at the same time, that this act of his may beget that right in him. But this is beyond the power of such persons.

Yet it is different regarding the acquisition of dominion over things which are passed to such persons from other men. For although in this case as well, if a thing passes to me from another I am as a rule required to have a mind that can understand the transaction, and can show by signs arising from intention, that I wish to have that thing as well as to accept it, yet it is established among all the more advanced nations that dominions of things can be transferred to children and even to those yet unborn, and can be held by them (see Digest, I. v. 7, 26; V. iv. 3). Natural reason and equity favoured the introduction of this, because things, which are subject to dominion, serve the uses of life and are necessary to children no less than to adults; nay, even more so to the former, because they are not so able, due to lack of strength and of judgement, to look out for themselves as adults. Therefore, in the case of children, a presumption of their consent is judged to be enough for acceptance, inasmuch as no one is supposed to reject what is to his advantage. But because of the lack of judgement consequent upon their age, it has been held possible for dominion to be conferred on children, only so far as κτῆσις [possession], not to the extent that they can exercise it of themselves. For the custom of nations, although 380 favouring children, was able to effect no more than that they might hold something but not use it of themselves. See Galatians, iv. 1.

But for fear this right of children should dwindle to nothing, humanity required further, that other adults should represent their person in the administration of their property, until such time as they could oversee their own affairs. This administration is either committed to a certain man by him who transfers his property to such persons, or, in States, it is the concern of laws or of the magistrates; or else, in case both of these are failing, relatives, neighbours, or finally humanity alone gives it over to the care of suitable persons. In this connexion mention should be made, in passing, of the law of Charondas, Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XII, chap. xv: 'The estates of orphans he committed to the care and guardianship of the next of kin on their father's side, but their education, and the custody of their persons, to those on the mother's.' (B.) His reason was that, since the latter could not inherit from the orphans, they would contrive no snares against them, while the former would have no opportunity to do them harm, and yet would probably give proper care to the inheritance, since the estate of the dead persons, whether they met a natural or violent death, would come to them. Publius [Publilius] Syrus [332]: 'A sick man does but ill for himself, if he makes his physician his heir.' The law of Solon, as given by Diogenes Laertius [I. 56], is not very different: 'A guardian of orphans should not live with their mother, and no one should be appointed a guardian, to whom the orphans' property would come, if they died.' (Y.) But no matter in what way such an administration is turned over to a person, it will have to be managed with the utmost fidelity, out of regard for that tender age which is unable to protect itself. Therefore, Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. I [330], holds equally guilty the man who has spurned a suppliant and the man who has wronged a guest, him who has polluted his brother's bed and the man who has treated harshly his aged sire: 'Or who infatuately offends against fatherless children.' (E.-W.) In Plato, Laws [XI, p. 927 c], where he has much to say on the duties of guardians, orphans are called 'the greatest and most sacred of deposits'. (J.) Yet equity and humanity do not always require that this duty should be undertaken gratis, or at some expense. Add Grotius, Bk. I, chap. iii, § 6, and the comments on the passage by Boecler, Ziegler, and Felden, where they show that dominion even in the second instance, that of management, is within the power of children, the reason being that to the guardians belongs only the mere administration of the right and property of another.

WE must now look into the object of dominion, that is, into what things are of such a character that they pass under proprietorship. Two things seem to be required for this: First, that the thing be able to afford some use to men mediately or immediately, and either of itself or in union with another thing; and second, that it should be such that in some way men can acquire it and keep it in their possession. For surely it is idle and foolish to lay claim to things of no service. And since proprietorship includes the right of warding off others from that thing, which right is useless unless it can be effectually employed, it will be idle for you to claim that right as yours, when you can with no reason prevent others from using that thing against your will. 381

2. But some things, although useful to men, are because of their extent inexhaustible, so that they can lie open to the uses of all and yet the use of no single man be any the worse. To subject such things to proprietorship would be malicious and inhuman. For this reason men commonly exempt from proprietorship the light and heat of the sun, the air, flowing water, and the like. Petronius [100]: 'Do we not enjoy in common all the most beautiful creations of nature? The sun shines upon everybody. The moon, with her cortege of innumerable stars, leads even the beasts to their pasture. Can a person mention anything more beautiful than waters? They run, however, for the good of all.' Latona speaks as follows, in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VI [349]: 'The enjoyment of water is a common right. Nature has not made the sun private to any, nor the air, nor soft water. This common right I seek.' (M.) Yet, since the use of the earth is necessary to dwellers on the earth, if they are to profit by the light and the air, since nature has denied them the power to fly, it follows that this free and unlimited use can be cut off from some, if, for instance, a man is thrown into a deep and dark dungeon. And since the air is clearer and purer in some spots, in this respect the value of a place may be increased, just as we see in the case of buildings especially, and of estates, the highest value is put upon the outlook by men who cherish beauty. For this reason restrictions have been introduced on not building too high, on light, and on not cutting it off, on prospects and on not interfering with them. Thus, although no one would ordinarily lay claim to the wind, yet a restriction can be laid upon not cutting it off, so that our windmills be not rendered useless.

3. It should be observed, furthermore, that just as the substances of the things over which man may enjoy dominion are of different matter, so each of them is taken and held in the manner of which its nature admits. For the more closely a thing can be, as it were, shut in and surrounded, the more easily the effects of proprietorship are maintained against others. And so the more something admits the exclusion from it of the unjust hands of others, the more secure is the ownership we promise ourselves of it. Yet, just as a thing is not at once exempt from proprietorship, simply because the hands of other men cannot be so easily kept off from it, so, if anything is so widely scattered, that either it is morally impossible to gather it under any sort of protection, or else its protection will entail far greater expense than any returns to be got from it, one should not assume that any man wished to hold as his own a thing, the defence of which is so burdensome. Although it is not required for a thing to become proper, that it be included, or be capable of inclusion within artificial bounds, or such as differ from it in kind; but it is enough if its extent can be described within reason. And so Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 7, bothers himself to no purpose when he tries to show that rivers are capable of proprietorship, on the ground that, although rivers are bounded by no territory either at their source or at their outlet, yet it is enough that the greater part of them, that is, their sides, are enclosed in banks.

4. Finally we observe also that the use of some things is enclosed, as it were, in narrow limits and is not capable of being shared among several persons, it being to the highest interests of peace that they pass into proprietorship. Certain things also afford different uses by some 382 of which they are exhausted and by others are amply sufficient for all. Now although nothing prevents such things from being able to pass into proprietorship, yet the law of humanity commands that the inexhaustible use of such things be denied no one with whom you are at peace. Still, if there is something which would be inexhaustible under all uses, it would be absurd not to leave it in primitive community and open to all. Indeed, if in a positive community a common thing is sufficient for all when divided, nothing prevents its division; but if it is not sufficient, it is better that it be kept undivided. But it is surely contrary to reason that a thing which is open to all mankind and sufficient to meet any use of every man should be divided into shares. So great, indeed, is the size of the earth, that it is sufficient for all people in every use, yet it would not be so if it were kept undivided by so great a multitude of men as now inhabit it. It could in no way sustain them without cultivation and improvement. This, therefore, is a further reason why the size of the earth is no obstacle to its being divided, and yet this reason would make a division of the ocean ridiculous. Cf. Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 3.

5. There is little difficulty here in connexion with other things, but the question as to whether the sea is capable of ownership has been a subject for debate in our day by the most distinguished minds. In connexion with this question it has been easy to observe that many of the disputants hold their zeal for their own country before their eyes rather than the truth. Yet these last and the others who had no relation to interested parties have so thoroughly canvassed all the ground that scarcely anything can be said which has not been said before. For this reason we can be more brief on this point, since the authors by whom this issue has been treated are in every one's hands.

Now it is obvious that the gift of God, whereby man was given the right to assume sovereignty over the land included also the sea. A twofold command was given: Have dominion over the fish of the sea and over the beasts of the land. But sovereignty over animals is inconceivable without the right as well of controlling the element which they inhabit, so far as its nature allows. Mention is made of the fowls of the heaven as well, yet since man has been denied the ability to be in the air to the extent that he rest¹ in it alone, and be separated from the earth, he has been unable to exercise sovereignty over the air, except in so far as men standing upon the earth can reach it. But it has been possible for sovereignty to be exercised more widely on the sea by means of ships, which are now brought to the highest degree of perfection, and not only serve for the transport of burdens but also carry on war over the domains of Neptune in a far more terrible form than it is waged upon land. Nor is there a person any more who entertains that scruple of Horace, Odes, Bk. I, ode iii [21 ff.]: 'Vain was the purpose of the god in severing the lands by the estranging main, if in spite of him² our impious ships³ dash across the depths he meant should not be touched.' (B.) Neither does any privilege appear to attach to the sea in comparison with the land, to prevent man's being able to turn it to his use and advantage. And yet, since the gift of God does not establish immediately a sovereignty which will be effective in relation to men, it was left to their judgement, whether they wanted to put the sea, like nearly all the land, under ownership, or to leave it in its original state, so that it should belong no more to one man than to another.

² [For postquam read si tamen.—Tr.]

³ [For tangendarates read tangenda rates.—Tr.]

6. The question is, therefore, whether certain reasons are to be found in the case of the sea to render it unable to pass under ownership. This some have undertaken to assert, partly on physical grounds, partly on moral. Among other reasons they advance the fluidity of the sea, which, according to the common nature of all liquids, has no proper bound, while possession can be held only over a thing that has limits. To this others reply that fluidity of itself is no obstacle to ownership, 383 that the sea does not lack its bounds, since it is held within shores, and that it is not so difficult to confine parts and tracts of the sea within certain bounds. It can be added, that, just as the fact that rivers are in perpetual flow does not prevent the right of property over them, neither is it true of the sea, because its water is driven this way and that by the force of the winds or by the tide. For a river is one thing, its current another; the sea is one thing, its water another. The vastness and extent of the sea in no way make the guarding of it entirely impossible, and therefore do obviously not destroy its use as property. For others can be kept from the use of the sea, either from land where an arm of the sea runs into our territory through a narrow strait, or by ships of war, which can serve the same end on the sea, as border forts on land. Although it cannot be denied that the custody of the entire ocean by one people would be morally impossible, nor would the return be worth the labour involved for any who would try with vessels of war to keep the rest of men from using it in all parts. And it is folly to yearn for what you cannot get, especially when the object of one's quest is not a necessity of life but the satisfaction of vain ambition or avarice. For, although the lack of a physical faculty does not immediately extinguish a moral one, yet, since the latter without the former is almost worthless among the base desires of men, it is an indication of good sense not to grasp at more than you can conveniently protect. Yet the restriction of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, §§ 7-8, is of no value, when he would have rivers and parts of the sea pass into ownership, provided they are both relatively small in comparison with the land, or at least not so large, that, when compared with portions of the earth, they may not be able to appear a part of it. For if some people held a long but narrow strip along the bank of a river, the river in comparison with the land would not be small, and yet this fact, I imagine, will not prevent its coming into a state of ownership. So there are some kingdoms which are far surpassed in size by their own provinces and subject states.

The moral reason why ownership is not suitable to the sea is drawn from the consideration that its use is inexhaustible and therefore sufficient for the general service of all, so that it is idle to wish to assign parts of it to individuals. We would certainly consider this the final argument if it were established that the sea in all its use is sufficient for all men in every part; for the purpose of introducing the right of property over things is to preserve peace in human society. Yet, since among the other effects of property, one was that he who makes an attempt upon a thing of mine, and seizes it against my will, does an injury that justifies war, it follows that, if any men try to make a thing their own, which lay open to all for their general use, and was not likely to induce men to quarrel over it, it should be concluded that they have not advanced peace but have sought out further occasions to break it. But whether the sea in every use is inexhaustible in all its parts, will appear more clearly, if we consider its uses a little more in detail.

7. The use of the sea for drawing water and bathing is of no great importance, is possible only for those dwelling upon its shores, and is in truth inexhaustible. Sea water serves also as a source for salt, but this use as well is enjoyed only by those who dwell upon the shores of the sea. Furthermore, the sea is also inexhaustible for the purposes of navigation, and is not prejudiced by that service. See Digest, VIII, iii. 23, § 1.

But there are other uses as well of the sea besides these, some of which are not entirely inexhaustible, while others are capable of giving occasion of loss to a people lying on it, so that for such a reason it is not true that all parts of the sea are open to the promiscuous use of every man. Into the former class fall fishing and the collection of things that grow in the sea. Now although fishing usually yields much more in the sea than in rivers and lakes, yet it is clear that fishing can be partially exhausted and become less profitable to maritime peoples, if any and every nation should want to fish along some particular shores; especially 384 since it often happens that fish or things of value, such as pearls, coral, and amber, are found in only one part, and that not very extensive, in the sea. In such cases nothing prevents the people dwelling along that shore or neighbouring sea from being able to lay a stronger claim to its felicity than those who dwell at a distance, nor can the rest of mankind rightfully hate or envy them for this, any more than because 'Not every land bears everything;¹ India sends us her ivory, the soft Sabaeans their frankincense.' (F.) [Vergil, Georgics, I. 57.] On the felicity of the shore about Byzantium see Pliny, Bk. IX, chap. xv.

Under the latter class belongs the consideration that the sea takes the place of a fortification for lands lying upon it. Therefore, the Duke of Somerset, Protector of England, writes in a letter to the Scotch, found in Sleidan, Bk. XX: 'We are enclosed on all sides by the ocean as if by the strongest walls and bulwark.' And the sea may enjoy with far better right than the Nile the name given the latter by Isocrates, Busiris [12], of 'immortal wall'. Yet there are two sides to this defence, for just as it shuts off any approach on foot, so it gives easy access to ships. For this reason it is by no means to the advantage of maritime peoples to allow any other people to sail with ships of war upon the sea along their shores, without first securing their permission¹ and giving assurance of causing no offence. But it cannot be so accurately stated in general just how great an extent of such a sea serves the purpose of defence, in consideration of which a nation should have sovereignty over it. But it would surely be more than a just precaution to try to make this a basis for holding some hundreds of miles in dominion. This can be illustrated by what Caesar, Gallic War, Bk. VI [xxiii. 1-3], writes about the Germans:

Their States account it the highest praise by devastating their borders to have areas of wilderness as wide as possible around them. They think it the true sign of valour when their neighbours are driven to retire from their lands and no man dares to settle near, and at the same time they believe that they will be safer thereby, having removed all fear of a sudden inroad. (E.)

Therefore, there have been weighty reasons for a people making a certain part of the sea their own, to the extent that all other nations were obligated to recognize uses of it as a kindness on the part of its sovereigns.

8. Yet since any dominion which will produce effects against other men has arisen from an act of men, the extent to which the boundaries of any nation will stretch out into the sea will be settled by actual possession, or by pacts with its neighbours. Thus Isocrates, Panegyric [118], boasts that the Athenians in their treaty had commanded the king of Persia that 'no warship should pass beyond Phaselis'. (N.) But what is to be presumed in such matters when a doubt arises and there is no clear remembrance of acts that would prove the occupancy, can be learned from what follows.

In the first place, then, it is not likely that when sailing was still unknown, people who had acquired territories extended their dominion beyond the shore. For, since fishing without boats gave little return, and they were only able to collect shell-fish or to deceive with hooks and line, and, as they perched on a rock, 'to haul in the leaping fishes with a rod' [Ovid, Metamorphoses, III. 587], no one was afraid that neighbours would spoil his fishing, since those who might come up by land could be kept away. Indeed, even after the invention of boats most nations allowed free fishing in the sea for a long time, because it was not felt that so laborious an occupation would attract so many followers that tumults would have to be feared because of their altercations. So long as no hostile fleets sailed its waters, the sea itself served sufficiently the purpose of defence. Even after warships were invented, nations for a long time claimed scarcely anything other than some of its harbours as their own, all the rest of the sea being left in primitive community.

This was the reason for pirates making their forays with very great boldness, because they held that their violation of peace was less heinous in places subject to no jurisdiction. Then after the profits to be gained by maritime trade were recognized, some peoples located on straits claimed them as their own, so that by levying tolls they could share in the profit, or their cities would be thronged with merchants. Later on other parts as well of the sea were made subject to dominion, either because they were excellent for fishing, or because it increased the security of those regions. Yet scarcely any further right of dominion was exercised than that all who passed through were enjoined to refrain from harm, that no one could practise piracy there any more, or that warships could not enter those parts of the sea without permission. Therefore, in Thucydides, Bk. V [lvi], when the Lacedaemonians sent troops by sea to the aid of the Epidaurians, the Argives sent a commission to the Athenians and protested that, although they had promised by the treaty not to give passage through their territory to the enemies of the Argives, they had allowed them to sail around by sea. And the Athenians interpreted this act as a violation by the Lacedaemonians of the treaty. In order to acknowledge that dominion it has been customary in more recent years, as it appears, for foreign vessels, as they sail by a fort on the shore, or a warship belonging to him who asserts the mastery over that sea, to make some sign of respect.

It does not appear necessary for individual nations to point out the exact time when they took dominion over certain parts of the sea, but since the exercise of that dominion is not of use at any and all moments, it is enough if they performed acts of sovereignty at a time when the advantage of the State seemed to have demanded it. Nay, I should feel that it involves no absurdity to say that parts of the sea, in so far as they serve as a defence, and so as a part of the State, have begun to pass without any special corporal act under the dominion of that people whose shores they wash, as soon as nations learned the use of warships. (Cf. Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 11.) For upon this consideration the sea becomes a portion, as it were, of the land, like trenches, or even as the adjoining marshes and swamps are held to be a part of a city. Just as in the occupancy of immobile¹ objects there is no need to touch each part with the body, but when one part has been touched, that act is understood to bring the entire thing of which it is a part under the right of ownership; so one people, upon taking occupancy as a whole² of a certain region fixed within set³ bounds, may at the first have no intention of pushing and exercising dominion beyond those borders, because they see no advantage from that outlying portion. Yet when they recognize later that this vacant area should be added to their region, it seems that by their bare intention they are able to claim dominion over that place as a part or dependency of their sway, especially after it has appeared that other peoples also have extended their sway from the land over a still unclaimed sea. In such a case it is proper to presume that the other nations did not want this people to be less favoured than they themselves are.

From what has been said it is clear that at this day, when all that pertains to the art of navigation has been brought to a very high degree of development, any maritime people which has any use of navigation is master of the sea which washes its shores, in so far as it is held to serve as a defence, and especially of ports or places where an easy landing can be made. (Bodin, On the Republic, Bk. I, the last chapter, states on the authority of Baldus: 'By a kind of right common to all rulers whose territories border upon the sea, it has been agreed that a ruler can impose his law upon those who approach within sixty miles of his shore.') Bays also regularly belong to that nation whose territory encloses any particular one, the same being true also of straits. But if several people live upon a strait or bay, their several dominions are understood to extend straight out from their territories
 386 to its centre, unless either by convention they decide to exercise that dominion as a unity against foreigners but to use those waters promiscuously among themselves; or some single one of them has acquired dominion over the entire bay or strait, by pact, by the tacit consent of the rest, by right of victory, or else because it was the first to make a settlement upon that sea, had seized at once all of it, and had exercised acts of sovereignty against the people of the opposite shore. Yet, in this last case, the rest of the dwellers upon that bay or strait will none the less¹ be understood to be rulers, each of his own ports and of a portion of the sea along the shore. On the effects of sea dominion so called, see Alberico Gentili, Pleas of a Spanish Advocate, Bk. I, chaps. viii and xiv; and Selden, Mare Clausum, Bk. II, chaps. xx-xxii. It should be added, in passing, that Edward Chamberlayne, Present State of England, Pt. I, chap. iv, records that whoever is born on board ship, on a sea subject to English sway, is held to be a native-born Englishman, and that he does not need to be 'naturalized', as they call it, like others who are born outside of England.

9. But what shall we say of the vast ocean, placed between great continents, Europe, Africa, Asia, America, the territory of Australia, and the unknown coast? Has this also passed under the right of property, or does it still abide in its primitive state, open to the use of all? Its great extent does not make it absolutely incapable of being regarded as property. Yet it must be confessed that dominion over it would be useless, nay, even unjust, if a people should try to claim the whole of it for themselves, or a few, by dividing it into parts, to the exclusion of all others. Navigation or the use of sea passage is a matter of innocent utility, which is not enough, taken by itself, to produce ownership over the sea, since sails may be spread quite as advantageously over a sea that is common to all, as over one that is private property. Fishing over waters of such great extent is not a matter of great importance. And since it is idle to say a thing is yours from the promiscuous use of which it is impossible to keep off others, I do not believe a nation which wished to maintain fleets over all parts of the ocean so as to keep others from fishing, would find that they were repaid for the expense.

But what if some people, for a foolish ambition to be called the Master of the Ocean, or upon the urge of avarice, so that it alone might gather in the returns from navigation and maritime commerce, should try to claim for itself alone ownership of the ocean? Suppose it should go so far as to claim that it first seized the ocean by sailing over it, and that it now holds territory on all the continents between which the ocean lies; and that since the ocean was originally unoccupied space, the nation that was the first to undertake to occupy it was able to secure for itself ownership of it. To all this we reply that it is, indeed, within the power of men to make by occupancy unoccupied spaces their own, but on the condition that they bear in mind that God gave the world not to one man or another, but to all mankind, and that men are at the same time by nature equal. Therefore, that tacit pact between those who were the first to divide things, on granting to occupiers those things which did not fall under the first division, can by no means be extended to such a thing by the possession of which one man could oppress all others with a most unjust servitude, or secure the most important advantages, which would otherwise belong to them. And this, especially because such a circumstance could not have occurred to the makers of that tacit pact. Therefore, just as no man should be held to be at fault, if he should take from a store of things, open to all, quite enough for his needs even in the future; so the man is not to be tolerated who, in his absurd greediness, wants to lay claim to more than he can take, and thus to extend his domains infinitely for no other purpose than to prevent others from enjoying the abundance of nature's blessings. Therefore, no good excuse can be advanced for any one nation wishing to claim dominion over the entire ocean, with the effect that it also desires to prevent all others from sailing upon it. 387

Not a single one of those reasons which led to the introduction of proprietorship in things can be applied to the open ocean. It needs no labour and industry of men, so far as concerns its open stretches, to make it fit for navigation. The winds drive on every vessel upon its waters with the same effort as they drive any single one. Nor do the furrows which vessels make render the way any harder for those that follow. The passage that leads to a continent lies open to you and is not more difficult, although others have taken and still use the same course. The fact that others have journeyed through an area in no wise gives them dominion over it, or bars the same way to the rest of mankind. It is impudence to maintain that when a nation has cut off the rest from navigation, it alone can secure the profit accruing¹ therefrom, a thing upon which every people should be intent. As if, indeed, all other peoples should suffer from a most unjust monopoly, in order to minister to the insatiable avarice of one; or as if all the rest of mankind should voluntarily submit to the yoke, because the ambition of one State conceives the base desire to hold the sovereignty of the entire world. Such was the generosity of God towards men that He supplied them abundantly with what serves their needs. But reason prescribed to men such bounds of possession, as would leave them content upon acquiring what would be likely to meet the needs of themselves and of their dependants. Nor yet does it want them to take no thought for the future, provided their envy and craving for more than they need do not prevent others from providing² for their own necessities. If any person ranges too far afield and heaps up superfluous wealth by the oppression of others, the rest will not be blamed³ if, when opportunity affords, they undertake promptly to bring him into line.

10. It is clear from all this that peaceful navigation of the ocean belongs to all men and is free; the former because no one has yet had such a right established over it that he can preclude all others from it; the latter because it should be so by the law of humanity. And so no one can prevent nations bordering upon the ocean, not subject to him, from trading with one another; unless by a pact he has acquired such a right, that either one nation out of favour to him is obligated to prevent some other people from trading with them, or that some one has yielded to him the freedom to sail to that people. An instance of the former kind of pact is that between the Dutch East India Company and the Emperor of Ceylon; see Philip Baldaeus, Descriptio Orae Malabar et Coromandel, chaps. x and xxii. For since I am able at my pleasure to keep for my own use or to alienate my goods, especially such as minister more to superfluous pleasures than to the necessities of life, nothing prevents me, for certain reasons, from binding myself by a pact with some one else, to give them to him alone. Furthermore, it is a mark of liberty for a man to be able to withdraw by a pact from his right in favour of another, provided that no such pact work injury to a third party. Therefore, as a prince can forbid commodities grown or manufactured in his country from being exported by foreigners, unless they have secured that faculty by a pact, or a generous concession (although he is in no way bound by the law of nature to enter into such a pact, or to grant this favour, unless so great necessity be laid upon some nation that it would perish without such commodities), so if, for instance, a European nation should make some portion of Africa or India its own, after the fashion which the nations usually recognize as imparting dominion, it has the right, if it shall see fit, to exclude all others from any access to it for purposes of trade, or to allow access only on a fixed condition or burden. This is precisely what we see observed in everyday practice, and there is nothing in it contrary to natural reason. For that liberty of trade, which is so strongly urged, does not prevent¹ a State from favouring its own citizens above foreigners.

It is our next task to examine the ways of securing dominion, which according to the pronouncement of Grotius are divided into original and derivative. The former are those whereby ownership is introduced into a thing for the first time; the latter, whereby dominion already set up by one man passes over to another. The original manner of acquisition is again either simple, whereby dominion is acquired over the body of some thing, or secondary, whereby some increase is added to what is already ours.

2. It has been sufficiently set forth above that, after men decided to depart from primitive community, they assigned by a previous pact to each person his portion of the things open to all, and this by the authority of the head of the family, by general consent, by lot, or sometimes at the choice of the several parties. As regards the things which did not come under that first division it was agreed that they shall pass to him who occupied them, that is, to him who was the first to take bodily possession of them with the intention of keeping them for himself. Therefore, the statement of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 1, that 'Formerly, when the human race could assemble together, primary acquisition could take place also through division; now it takes place through occupation only,' (K.), must be taken in the sense that, when mankind first commenced to be divided into several families, distinct dominions of things arose from that division, but after that division, whoever has occupied an unpossessed object has acquired it originally, that is, whoever has seized it before any one else, or has anticipated them in laying claim to it. It is in this sense that the word is used in Seneca, Thyestes, 204:

There lies the crime between us two,
Who leaps to grasp it first, the crime shall do. (M.)

Tacitus, Histories, Bk. V, chap. i: 'Many persons had come from Rome and Italy, each impelled by the hopes he had of preoccupying the favour of a prince who had not yet chosen his friends.' (O.) Pliny, Letters, Bk. IV, ep. xv: 'In a state where everything is seized upon by the man who can get hold of it, it is staying much too late to wait till precisely the proper time.' (B.)

3. Regarding occupancy of immovable objects, and especially of lands, it must be carefully considered whether it is made by one person, or by several at the same time. Any single individual is held to have occupied land when he undertakes to cultivate it, or marks out its boundaries. Yet it is understood that he will not embrace more than what one family, even though it includes many members, can probably defend. For if, for example, a single man together with his wife should be cast upon an unoccupied island which would support myriads of inhabitants, it would be impudent of him to claim it all upon the plea of occupancy, and to attempt to expel all others who might have landed on another part of the island.

But when a group of men have together occupied some portion of land, this has usually been done either as a whole or by sections. It is 389 an instance of the former kind of occupancy, when a group of men take under possession some desert tract of land, the bounds of which have been fixed either by nature or by the decision of men. Portions of this are then allowed each member of the group to occupy as he pleases (a method rarely followed) or they are assigned to each person of the group by the whole body, which is the best way to avoid quarrels and confusion. For that a promiscuous occupancy gives rise to confusion is suggested by Livy, Bk. V [lv], where he describes Rome as 'more like a city taken up by individuals, than regularly portioned out by commissioners'. (S.) Another illustration is found in the account given by Tacitus, Germany, chap. xxvi, of the ancient Germans: 'The lands are occupied by townships (so Grotius for vices), in allotments proportional to the number of cultivators; and are afterwards parcelled out among the individuals of the district, in shares according to the rank and condition of each person. The wide extent of plain facilitates this partition. The arable lands are annually changed and a part left fallow.' (O.) In the same vein Caesar, Gallie War, Bk. IV, chap. i [4-7], writes of the Suebi:

They have a hundred cantons, from each of which they draw one thousand men yearly for the purpose of war outside their borders. The remainder, who have stayed at home, support themselves and the absent warriors; and again, in turn, are under arms the following year, while the others remain at home. By this means neither husbandry nor the theory and practice of war is interrupted. They have no private or separate holding of land, nor are they allowed to abide longer than a year in one place for their habitation. (E.)

And of the Germans as a whole he writes, Ibid., Bk. VI [xxii. 2]:

No man has a definite quantity of land or estate of his own: the magistrates and chiefs every year assign to tribes and clans that have assembled together as much land and in such places as seems good to them, and compel the tenants after a year to pass on elsewhere. (E.)

That is, in order to maintain the simplicity of their life, and avoid avarice and luxury. Horace, Odes, Bk. III, ode xxiv [9 ff.], refers to the same thing:

Far better live the Scythians of the steppes; far better live the Getae stern, whose unallotted acres bring forth fruits and corn for all in common; nor with them is tillage binding longer than a year; another then on like conditions takes the place of him whose task is done. (B.)

On the inhabitants of the island of Lipara see Diodorus Siculus, Bk. V, chap. ix. The same writer ascribes even a closer kind of community to the inhabitants of Vacca, Bk. V, chap. xxiv:

The Vaccae every year divide the land among them, and thus till and plough it, and after the harvest distribute the fruits, allotting to every one his share. And therefore it is death to steal, or underhandedly to convey away anything from the husbandmen. (B.*)

Add Idem, loc. cit., xlv, on the State of the Panchaeans. In the same way the Apalchitae labour in common, and every full moon there is a distribution from the common store to the heads of families according to the number of their household. See Rochefort, Descriptio Antillarum, Pt. II, chap. viii, § 8; cf. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 4.

4. Regarding 'occupancy as a whole', moreover, it is to be observed that it establishes dominion for the whole group, as such, over all things in that district, not merely immovables, but also movables and animal life, or at least the right to use the last named to the exclusion of all others. This universal dominion is so different from the dominion of individuals that the latter can pass even to some one outside of the State, while universal dominion is preserved only in the State. Dio Chrysostom, Orations [xxxi. 47]: 'For the lands belong to the city no less than every possessor controls his own property.' (M.*) But it is not necessary that all things which are occupied in this universal manner should be divided among individuals and pass into private hands. Therefore, if anything be discovered in such an area that is still without a private owner, it should not at once be regarded as unoccupied, and free to be taken by any man as his own, but it will be understood to belong to the whole people. This principle, we feel, should be extended to desert islands lying in a sea, dominion over which belongs to some State, or to such islands as rise in that place thereafter, examples of which are given 390 by Pliny, Natural History, Bk. IV, chap. xii.

Such things the people often settle in different ways. Sometimes the proceeds or fruits of them are paid into the public store to be turned later to the uses of the State; sometimes foreigners as well are allowed to use such things; sometimes merely all the citizens, or those of a certain station. Yet whatever right any individual possesses over such things depends on the decision of the popular will. However, in these matters some distinction is observable between immovable and movable things. For since the former are exposed to view and cannot be moved from their place they are understood, in view of that universal occupancy, to belong to the people, so far as concerns their bodies, as it were. But some mobile things are so constituted that the territory in question furnishes, it is true, a home or place for them, yet they require either some hunting out and gathering, such as metals lying in the bowels of the earth, gems, pearls, and the like scattered over the shores or elsewhere, or else a special effort to catch and secure, that they do not get out of our hands again, such as wild animals, fish, and birds. Since such things, while not yet secured or captured, are not in the power of men for them to be able to use at their pleasure, it follows that while a people has occupied as a whole the home of such things, it has not actually secured dominion over them, but only a right of securing dominion over them by their actual apprehension. Therefore, it is not proper to say, for example, that animals still at large in natural liberty actually belong to a prince. But the prince has the right to capture them, for the reason that he has dominion over the ground on which they roam, while he may also limit the degree to which individuals may employ this right. And so he who maintains sovereignty over lands and waters will be able to grant the right of taking such areas and of making them over as his own possession either promiscuously to all mankind, or to all his own citizens, or to those of a certain rank, or he may keep the privilege for himself alone. For although the things themselves may not yet be under dominion, still, in view of the fact that for them to pass under ownership another thing already subject to dominion must necessarily be used, such as earth or water, it follows that he who has sovereignty over these last, may by a decree prevent another from using the sovereign's property to acquire the former. Cf. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, §§ 5, 19.

5. It is clear from all this that it depends not on some natural and necessary law, but on the will of him who holds the supreme sovereignty, what right may belong to individuals in a State regarding the gathering of movables not yet possessed, regarding hunting, fowling, fishing, and the like. This power extends even to the occupation of desert places which the supreme powers of the State may prohibit any one of their subjects from taking up. But they do not by this restraint prevent foreigners from occupying such regions, and thus making them their own; only their own subjects are prevented, to the end that no others among them shall take such lands than those who were granted the right. Thus in some places individuals are granted more, in other places less, according as the governors of the States have seen fit. Selden, Bk. VI, chap. iv, recounts concerning the customs of the Jews, that 'Anything found in desert places or not owned and cultivated by private persons, or in rivers and torrents, belonged to the person who occupied it, such as grass, fruits of trees, forests, and the like. The same was true of fish in the sea or rivers, birds or wild beasts. Yet one could not hunt or fowl in another's field. But even there what any one had seized he made his own. It was forbidden to take animals or fish in enclosures.' With all this the Roman Jurisconsults are in practical agreement. For Gaius,¹ Bk. II, Rerum quotidianarum [Institutes, II. i. 12], says:

Wild animals, birds and fish, that is to say all the creatures which the land, the sea, and the sky produce, as soon as they are caught by any one become at once the property of their captor; for natural reason admits the title of the first occupant to that which previously had no owner.² (M.)

391 There is an excellent passage about fish in Plautus, Rudens, Act IV, sc. iii [971-4]:

Which fish in the sea will you say is 'my own'? When I catch them, if indeed I do catch them, they are my own; as my own I keep them. They are not claimed as having a right to freedom, nor does any person demand a share in them. In the market I sell them all openly as my own. (R.)

Yet the fisherman was wrong in applying this principle to the discovery of a travelling-trunk.

On these and similar passages the expositors of the Roman law observe that by wild animals [ferae] are understood all animals which are endowed by nature with a limitless power of wandering about in the earth, sea, and air, and that even those are included which have been tamed by association with men. Although the distinction between wild and tame beasts is better expressed, perhaps, thus: That the former are more averse to association with men, delight more in unfettered liberty, and become accustomed to live among us only with difficulty and scarcely ever without the need of our watching them, while of the latter the opposite is true. Yet from the fact that in very remote places, where man scarcely ever sets foot, birds are to be found which do not avoid the touch of men, Grotius, Historia Belgica, Bk. V, remarks³ that 'the reason we are avoided by other animals is the lack of gentleness, not on their part, but on ours'. Although you may prefer to say that wild animals are merely harder to teach and more stubborn than tame.

Here we should observe, in passing, that it is incorrect to group doves and peacocks among wild birds, as is done in Institutes, II. i, § 15, and Digest, XLI. i. 5, § 5. This has already been noted with regard to peacocks by Godefroy on this passage of the Institutes, while the same reason applies also to doves that is advanced in § 16 following, because there are also wild doves. The Hebrew laws did not allow them to be caught within thirty stades from a dove-cote. See Constantin l'Empereur, Baba Kama, chap. vii, sect. 7; add also Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. xi. Yet the nature of bees is clearly wild, since the habit of returning to their hives comes not from training by men but from their own natural instinct; moreover they are quite unteachable. Yet Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII [p. 843 D], rules: 'If any one, by decoying the bees, gets possession of another's swarms and draws them to himself by making noises, he shall pay the damage.' (J.) Here he seems to assume that the man from whose hives they flew did not follow them any further. Cf. Institutes, II. 1, § 14. Pliny, Bk. XI, chap. v, says: 'Since they are neither domesticated nor wild'; yet others divide them into wild or wood bees and quasi-domesticated bees. See Digest, XLVII. ii. 26; XLI. i. 5, § 3. Yet Quintilian, Declamations, xiii, entitled Apes pauperis (cf. Digest, X. ii. 8, § 1), is at pains to show that so long as they return to our hives they belong to us, and any injury to them constitutes damage. Also, according to Roman law, it makes no difference whether a man catches a wild animal on his own property or another's, since so long as they are in natural liberty they belong to no one, no matter where they are. Yet the owner of a farm can forbid entrance to any one to fowl or hunt. Still, whatever a man captures, although against the orders of the owner, he makes his own. Cujas, Bk. IV, obs. ii, however, differs from us about this point, on the basis of Digest, XLI. i. 55.

6. But in most places hunting is left to the governors of States, who in some countries allow their leading citizens to share in it, although every one is usually allowed to kill savage animals wherever they may be found. Various reasons can be advanced for this. It did not seem wise for peasants and artisans to leave their work and wander about through the forests, such practices tending to entice them gradually to the life of highwaymen. See Constitutio Frederici II [Constitutiones in Sicilia Friderici], Bk. II, tit. xxvii § Si quis rusticus. Sometimes it is considered dangerous for the common sort to be allowed arms. See Cicero, Against Verres, Bk. V [VI. iii], where L. Domitius crucified a slave for killing a large boar with a hunting spear, since, after the slave war in Sicily, it was forbidden 'that any slave should appear with a weapon'. Also for princes and nobles, whose arms must secure the safety of citizens, hunting seemed to be appropriate as a kind of counterpart of war, so that they might be made fit for the hardships of campaigning. This was the reason that of old the Medes, Persians, and Parthians paid so much attention to the art of hunting, as appears from Xenophon, Training of Cyrus [I. ii. 10]; Cornelius Nepos, Alcibiades, chap. xi; Justin, Bk. XLI, chap. iii; Tacitus, Annals, Bk. II, chap. i; Suetonius, Caligula, chap. v. In Laonicus¹ Chalcocondylas, Bk. III, the story is told that Bajazet had seven thousand men to look after his hawks, and maintained six thousand¹ dogs. When he was taken captive by Tamerlane, was upbraided by him for this, and had had all his dogs and hawks sent away, he haughtily replied: 'For me who owe my birth and rearing to Amurath the son of Orchan, both of them kings, an interest in dogs and hawks is fitting. Not so for you, a Scythian, robber, and inveterate highwayman.' It was also right to allow that manly exercise to princes on whose devotion and care rests the public safety, and especially since hunting in thickly populated districts can bring little return to individuals, if it is allowed to every one promiscuously. Pliny, Panegyric [lxxxix]:

Future leaders were instructed in the arts of matching fugitive beasts in running, bold beasts in valour, crafty beasts in skill; and it was regarded as no mean glory in times of peace to free the fields from the incursions of wild beasts, and to release the activities of the farmers from a kind of siege.

Therefore, for these and similar reasons a prince has been able to take away the freedom to hunt from the common sort, even against their will, yet without doing them any injury, if it seemed advantageous to the State. For he does not take from them what is actually theirs, but he only forbids them to use a certain manner of acquisition, which the mere law of nature would otherwise grant them, if it were in force, without civil enactments. For the position of some less instructed authors, namely, that the prohibition of hunting is unlawful, because God gave men dominion over beasts, and peasants are likewise men, or the fact that in general in the writings of the Roman Jurisconsults hunting is called free by the law of nature and of nations, has long ago been met by learned men, who have drawn a distinction between a preceptive and a permissive law of nature, and pointed out a different meaning of the expression 'law of nations'. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 1. But it is also likely that in many places this right was transferred to princes on the initiative of the people. For since some property had to be assigned them wherewith they could maintain a station and court worthy of their high position, wisdom counselled that it would be most advantageous to assign them those things which could be given without injuring any one. Such are all things which have not yet passed into the dominion of another person. On hunting among the Peruvians under the Incas see Garcilaso de la Vega, Comentarios Reales, Bk. VI, chap. vi.

7. Yet by such laws princes were given not a dominion, properly speaking, but only a right over wild animals, to the effect that they alone could make them theirs by seizing them. But that right has this effect in common with dominion, namely, that after such animals have been seized by others, they can be claimed from him who unlawfully holds them. For it apparently is not to be admitted, as some maintain, that a law could assign dominion of these things even before occupancy, since a law suffices to create dominion. Civil law can, it is true, bring it about that a dominion already established over things may pass from one citizen to another without any antecedent deed of the two parties. But a mere law cannot bring it about that dominion shall for the first time be established over a thing which has not yet actually passed under the power of men; rather a corporal act is required, especially on living things. To establish dominion for the first time, and to pass it on when once established, are different things. 393

There are some, on the other hand, who maintain that civil laws prohibiting freedom to hunt take away not the acquisition of the animal once caught, but only the right of hunting. For, as they say, two concessions were made by the law of nations with regard to hunting: First, that all men were given the right to hunt; and second, that dominion over wild animals could be acquired by occupancy. It is to be understood that the former has been done away with, but not the latter. Therefore, if a person who has been forbidden to hunt has nevertheless caught a beast in the chase, it can be taken from him, if found in his possession, not because it has not been made his, but because he is unworthy to hold it and should be punished. It is for this very reason that nets, spears, and weapons for hunting are taken from such men, although they undeniably are their property. Therefore, if game taken in this way be given to another, who receives it in good faith, it cannot be taken from him, or be subject to claim, which would, however, be allowable if the animals had really belonged to another and been stolen from him. For a prince cannot be called the owner of wild animals before he has seized them, and so a man who has hunted despite a decree to the contrary has not committed theft nor taken away what is another's; but he has acquired a thing which another person had the sole and private right to acquire: he is punished, but the taint of theft does not attach itself to the thing thus acquired. See Gudelinus, De Jure Novissimo, Bk. II, chap. ii; and after him Arnold Vinn, on Institutes, II. i, § 13.

Ziegler, on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 5, has much the same point of view: 'The capture of wild animals can be prevented by law, but not their acquisition after they have been captured. For the right of prohibiting can exist along with such acquisition. Whether a man can acquire by capturing, and whether he can use this manner of acquiring, are different questions. On the first question the sovereign has no power. Just as he cannot make things belonging to no one belong to some one, or what is not possessed pass into possession (Digest, XLI. ii. 3, § 14), so he cannot forbid acquisition, nor make things unacquired which have been already acquired. But on the second question the prince has free power.'

Yet it strongly savours of simplicity to believe that a person who is the first to lay hands on a thing by some natural necessity becomes its possessor, since possession or dominion, as we have shown above, arises from a previous pact. Therefore, if a prince regarding certain things has forbidden to his subjects this method of acquisition, the first seizure of them has no effect upon acquiring dominion. And this law has so far the same effect as dominion, that a subject should not lay hands upon wild beasts, or, if he does so, in fact, he does not make them his own. And even if decaying meat is usually not claimed, especially¹ by a third party, that does not constitute a reason for the furtive hunter having a clear title to it. Nor is capturing the same as acquiring, since the former is a mere physical act, while the latter involves a moral effect. Nay, it is plainly contradictory to say: 'Princes alone have the right to hunt, and if any private citizen captures some game, he acquires dominion over it.' In other words, only princes can use that method by which legitimate dominion is established over wild animals, and nevertheless, he who is not permitted to use that method acquires dominion.

But suppose some one asks: With whom, then, lies the dominion over an animal taken against the laws? We deny that it lies with the captor; and yet the prince did not take it. Apparently the reply to this should be that the hunter himself has performed a voluntary, though far from pleasing, service for the prince, and so, like any other hunter authorized by the prince, he has by his capture made the game the property of the prince.

Yet it is above all certain that a foreigner is also bound by such laws, although it may happen that hunting in his own State is free to all. For it is a law of all States and one absolutely necessary for the pre-394 servation of internal peace, that whoever enters the territory of a prince, even for a time, shall conduct himself for that stay in accordance with the ruler's laws, at least in accordance with those which reason also holds good against him, and from which the lawgiver has not exempted foreigners. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. ii, § 5. But writers of judgement wisely urge moderation in the exercise of such laws, provided the particular maliciousness of poachers does not urge harsh measures. See Boecler on Grotius, loc. cit., § 4.

8. We are said to have occupied a thing, only when we actually take possession of it, and this begins with the joining of body to body immediately or through a proper instrument. Therefore it is the customary thing, that occupancy of movables be effected by the hands, of land by the feet, along with the intention of cultivating it and of establishing boundaries either exact or with some latitude. But merely to have seen a thing, or to know its location, is not held to be sufficient to establish possession. Ceres says, in Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. V [518-19]: 'See, my daughter, sought so long, has at last been found, [. . .] if you call it finding merely to know where she is.' (M.)

But whether the possession of an immovable thing can be acquired by an instrument, may be understood by the famous story of Plutarch, Greek Questions, xxx, where he gives this account:

The Andrians and Chalcidians sailing into Thrace to get them a seat, the city Sane being betrayed was delivered up to them both in common; and being told that Acanthus was deserted by the barbarians, they sent two spies thither. These approaching the city and perceiving all the enemies to be fled, the Chalcidian outruns the other, intending to seize the city for the Chalcidians; but the Andrian, finding himself not able to overtake him, darts his lance and fixes it exactly in the gates, and says that he first seized the city for the Andrians. Hence a great contention arising, they agreed together without a war to make the Erythraeans¹, Samians, and Parians umpires in all matters of controversy between them. The Erythraeans and Samians brought in the verdict for the Andrians, but the Parians for the Chalcidians; hence the Andrians about this place bound themselves under a curse that they would not give wives in marriage to the Parians nor take wives of them. (G.)

Surely a spear does not appear to be a proper instrument with which to occupy an immovable thing, since we can strike with a spear many things which we cannot approach with our body.

9. But it is generally held that if movable things are to become ours they must be seized bodily, in such a way, moreover, that they are moved from that spot where they had been placed, and are transferred into some place of our own, or into our keeping. Thus I may touch the fledglings of birds while still in their nest, but I have not yet² made them mine until I have brought them home. Likewise, if I catch some cubs in a cave, I will make them mine only when I either move them from that place to my own cages, or for so long as I guard them that they do not escape. But this seizure may be effected not only by our hand, but also by instruments of ours, such as snares, traps, nets, seines, hooks, and the like, provided the instruments are in our power, that is, laid in a place where we have a right to capture wild animals, and not yet broken by the beast, and provided the game is so securely fastened in them that it cannot get away, at least till such time as we may come to it.

On these principles can be settled the question, set forth in Digest, XLI. i. 55, of the boar caught in a snare. Now if the boar was so caught in the snare that he could not get out, and the snare was set either on public property, or your own land, where you had a right to hunt, it was yours; and if I had set him loose so that he got back into his natural liberty, I was liable for his value, no matter on what grounds the action was brought. But if the snare was set on my land, just as I could have forbidden you entrance when you wished it, so if I break the snare set there against my will, you have no grounds of complaint against me.

395 10. The question is also raised whether, by wounding a wild animal, we seem to make it at once our own. Trebatius once said that we did, supposing that we pursue it, while if we do not do so, it ceases to be ours, and goes to him who first secures it. Others take the opposite position, namely, that it is not ours unless we have caught it, since many things can happen that may keep us from catching it. Digest, XLI. i. 5. On this Godefroy, quoting from Radevicus, De Gestis Friderici, Bk. I, chap. xxvi, observes that Frederick [Barbarossa] drew some distinctions in cases like this, to wit: 'If a man has discovered an animal with large deer hounds, or Molossian dogs, and was pursuing it, the animal goes to him rather than to the one who seizes it; and likewise if he wounds or kills it with spear or sword. If he pursued it with beagles or Spartan dogs, it falls to the seizer. If he slew it with dart, stone, or arrow, it belongs to him and not to the seizer, provided he is pursuing it.' According to a law of the Lombards, Bk. I, tit. xxii, laws 4 and 6, he who killed or found an animal wounded by another, may carry off the fore-quarter with seven ribs, the rest belonging to him who had wounded it, though his right endured only twenty-four hours. Although in my opinion the general statement should be that, if an animal has received a mortal wound or been seriously crippled, it cannot be taken by another so long as we keep up the pursuit of it, and provided we have the right to be in that place; while this is not true, in case the wound be not mortal, nor such as seriously to hinder its flight. Therefore, it was more from affection than right that Meleager allowed Atalanta to share in the glory of the slaying of the Caledonian boar, as the story is given by Ovid, Metamorphoses, Bk. VIII [427]. But the game which my dogs have killed without any urging is not mine until I seize it. Add Alberico Gentili, Pleas of a Spanish Advocate, Bk. I, chap. iv.

11. According to Selden, Bk. VI, chap. iv, these and similar questions were dealt with by Jewish law as follows: 'Fish and wild animals in preserves should not be taken. But fish may be taken from another's net while it is in the sea, and an animal taken from another's net which is set in a desert place. If a man sets a net on another's land to catch game, the game belongs to him, unless the owner of the field should have found it, and claim his right to it because of his ownership of the field. Fish¹ that have leaped into a ship belong to the owner of the vessel, since a ship as regards custody is considered sufficiently fixed and enclosed, not something that is called movable, or, for this reason, transient. For it is to the waters that it owes its motion, or the ship moves about because of the sea and not of its own nature.'

We should in this connexion evaluate the opinion of Nerva in Digest, XLI. ii. 3, § 14: 'The fish in our pond we do possess, but not those in our lake; and so likewise the wild animals that are shut up in a closed park, but not those which wander at will in enclosed forests.⁷ Exception is taken to this by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 2, on the ground that fishes are preserved just as much in a private lake as in a fish pond, and woods that are enclosed, hem in wild animals just as well as parks. Yet there is reason for the statement of Nerva. For ownership over animals and fishes begins with their seizure. Now the fish preserved in a pond, and the wild animals preserved in a park, have been captured once, while the fish to be found in a lake of ours, or the animals to be found in our woods have not yet been stripped of their natural liberty, even though they have been so limited in their movements that they cannot wander any place they will. For it is one thing to capture an animal, and another to set up an enclosure so that one can be caught more easily. Yet because I alone have the right to capture them, and therefore to keep all others from doing so,¹ I am also able to claim them from their captors, and so, as concerns this effect, I am considered their owner. Therefore, enclosed animals enjoy natural liberty only in so far as they have not yet been seized by man, not that they can be seized by any one.

12. Occupancy is also used to acquire things which were formerly under a dominion which is now lapsed. This takes place if a man either openly throws aside a thing, with a clear indication that he no longer wishes to hold it among his possessions, but to let it lie for any one to 396 seize, and this with no intention of gratifying another; or if a man loses possession of a thing unwillingly at first, but later lets it go as a thing without ownership, either because he despairs of recovering it, or because its recovery is not worth the effort. For otherwise no man ever loses against his will dominion over a thing, even though its actual possession is lost (unless it is taken from him as a punishment, or in war), but he keeps the right to recover it so long as he has not actually given up the intention of recovering it, or is not thought to have done so. Therefore, it will not be possible to acquire dominion over such things by occupancy, so long as the right of the former owner is still in force. See 1 Samuel, ix. 3; Digest, XLI. ii. 13; XIV. ii. 2, § 8; XIV. ii. 8. But since there are two requirements in order for a thing to be held derelict: first, that a man be unwilling to be any longer its owner; and second, that he give up possession, either by throwing it away, or by leaving it; if either of these be lacking, dominion is not lost. Suppose, then, that a thing has been thrown away by its owner, yet without the intention that he no longer wants it to be his, nothing will be lost in such a case. Suppose, on the other hand, that the owner of a thing no longer wishes it to be his, still he will not cease to be its owner unless he throws it away. See Digest, XLI. ii. 17, § 1. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iv, § 4, where there is a discussion of the case cited by Cicero, On Invention, Bk. II, chap. v.

It is in this manner that wild beasts pass again under dominion, when they have escaped from our hand and returned into natural liberty. Yet on this point Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 3, does not agree with the statement of Digest, XLI. i. 3, § 2, that an animal ceases to be ours when it has escaped from our hands and returned to natural liberty. For, he maintains, dominion is lost over wild beasts, not because they have escaped from keeping, but from the reasonable assumption that we are believed to consider them derelict, because of the great difficulty of pursuing them. This very fact is suggested by Digest, XLI. i. 5 pr.: 'A wild beast is understood to recover its natural liberty, when it has either become lost to our sight, or else, even though it be in sight, can scarcely be recovered.' And it says again, Digest, XLI. i. 44, that what is stolen by a wolf remains ours so long as it may be recovered. See Digest, X. ii. 8, § 2. For this reason some reservations must be made in the views of Ziegler upon Grotius, loc. cit. He remarks that because wild animals become ours through the loss of their liberty, they therefore cease to be ours upon the recovery of their liberty, and for that reason dominion over them is held to consist in actual possession. Yet a wild animal is not yet held to have gained natural liberty, while some one is pursuing it with the probable hope of recovering it, just as a prisoner who has broken jail has not yet escaped, so long as the officers are on his trail, and he is in a place where there is a chance of his being found. But the opinion of Grotius in the same passage, namely, that by the use of γυωρίσματα [tokens] attached to wild animals, or bells, and other marks dominion can be maintained over such animals as have escaped from our custody, and that therefore they do not go to the first person who secures them, can, in my opinion, be accepted only for such as have been domesticated by men, and have lost their native wildness, and which for that reason properly enjoy the right of tame beasts. Therefore, if that deer of Tyrrhus in Vergil, Aeneid, Bk. VII [483 ff.], carried such marks, Ascanius surely gave good cause for the consequent commotion. Add Salic Law, tit. xxxv. We may also cite here what Pliny, Bk. IX, chap. lix, relates of the fish called anthias, which can be trained by fishermen to lead the rest of its kind into nets:

It is important to know which has been the betrayer of the others, and not to take it, otherwise the shoal will take to flight, and appear no more for the future. There is a story that a fisherman, having quarrelled once with his mate, threw out a hook to one of these leading fishes, which he easily recognized, and so captured it with malicious intent. The fish, however, was recognized in the market by the other fishermen, against whom he had conceived this malice; who accordingly brought an action against him for damage; and, as Mucianus adds, he was condemned to pay ten pounds on the hearing of the case. (B. & R.*)

397 But when a mark has been put upon animals that are merely kept in a park, and they afterwards escape into natural liberty, it is nearer the truth to say that they go to the man who secures them. For a strict guard or a perpetual occupancy, at it were, is needed, if an animal is to be retained which has by nature an unlimited power to wander, and which always frets at restraint, there being no mark that can bridle such a nature. See Ziegler, loc. cit. Therefore, it is a statement appropriate to their character, but in itself untrue, which Juvenal, Satires, iv [50 ff.], attributed to informers: 'Ready to affirm that the fish was a runaway that had long feasted in Caesar's fish-ponds; escaped from thence he must needs be returned to his former master.' (R.) Regarding escaped slaves the Roman laws had this special pronouncement, namely, that their masters were understood to retain (civil) possession over them, the reason being that the slaves might not at their will deprive their masters of the advantage of possessing them. Digest, XLI. ii. 1, § 14; XLI. ii. 13.

It is obvious that, if we lose possession of some other thing against our will, if, for instance, something falls from us on the road, its ownership does not pass from us, nor is it acquired by the finder until after it has been established that it is treated as derelict by us, such conclusion being in general taken for granted if we fail to inquire for it. Therefore, if a man has found something which no one has reason to think was purposely thrown away by its owner, he should acknowledge his discovery, so that the owner may receive it again. But if the owner is not discovered, the article may be kept by the finder. Aelian, Varia Historia, Bk. III, chap. xlv [xlvi], reports the following law of the Stagiritae: 'Do not take up what you did not lay down.' Idem, Bk. IV, chap. i: 'A citizen of Byblus, if he finds anything in the street which he did not put there himself, does not pick it up, for he looks upon it not so much as a find, but as a theft.' A similar law of Solon is given by Diogenes Laertius, Bk. I [57]: 'No one should claim what he has not deposited.' (Y.) Add Plato, Laws, Bk. X, towards the beginning. In accordance with a law of Confucius no Chinaman picked up things in the street unless he was the one who had dropped them. Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. IV, chap. xxi. Add Edict of Theodoric, chap. lviii. According to Selden, Bk. VI, chap. iv, the ancient Hebrews held that the law of Deuteronomy, xxii. 1, concerned not the Gentiles but only the Israelites, yet in this respect, namely, that if it appeared that the owner gave up his claim to the beast, it should go to the man who seized it. Yet they drew a distinction between things that were marked and unmarked. Regarding the recovery of the latter, they assumed that the owner had given them up, but not so regarding the former, unless it had been openly announced. The former could not be kept without public proclamation made two or three times, but the latter could. For this purpose there was a platform outside the walls of Jerusalem from which a crier announced lost property. But they denied that property of apostates need be restored. Lost goods of Gentiles, however, they said should be restored, but on the consideration that, in return for such humanity, they also should receive kindlier treatment at the hands of the Gentiles. To sum up, they felt that the dominion over lost things ended at once by natural law with their loss, but that their restitution depended on civil law. This false idea, of course, like many others, came from the avarice of the race and the hostility and hatred which they bore towards all the rest of mankind.

13. A treasure or money the owner of which is unknown is also brought under things which have lost their owner. See Digest, XLI. i. 31; VI. i. 67; XLI. ii. 3, § 3. Therefore, if a man out of fear, or for the purpose of safeguarding his money, has hid it in the ground, it is not treasure, and he who takes it away is guilty of theft. An example is the slave in Plautus, The Pot of Gold, who carried off Euclio's pot of gold.

A treasure naturally, and unless civil laws dispose otherwise, belongs to the finder, that is, to him who laid hands¹ on it and carried it off. For a thing the owner of which is unknown, and so long as he is unknown, is rated morally as if it had no owner and belonged to no one, and so passes to the first occupant. Although the question may be 398 raised at this point, whether the man who lives in countries where the civil laws grant such things to the finder, is altogether bound, in order to clear his title to the find before his own conscience, to make public announcement that he has found a treasure, even when it appears that the money had been left there long ago; for there can be no question about the necessity of such an announcement, if the treasure evidently had been but recently left. Now it seems most reasonable in such a case that if a man has unearthed a treasure on his own grounds, he is not in conscience bound to announce it, but he can keep what he has found, until another man inquires after it and adduces good reasons for his hiding it and saying nothing about it until that moment. For it is presumed that the man from whom a field or a house has come to the present owner,² the finder of the treasure, did not knowingly leave behind him any money buried by himself when he sold the property. Nor is the man who hid such a thing in another's field without the knowledge of its owner believed to have lost the opportunity to claim his property, since there was a reasonable fear that it would fall into the other's hands. But when a man discovers a treasure in another's field, he is in conscience bound to inquire of the owner, at least in a roundabout way, whether he himself had left it there. For unless this is done it cannot be clearly established whether it was not left in that place only for safekeeping, either by the owner, or by some other man with the owner's knowledge.

But on this matter different laws are to be found among different peoples. See Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 7. Plato, Laws, Bk. XI [p. 913 A ff.], would not allow either a treasure or any other lost articles to pass to the finder, even though their owner is not known, but would have an oracle consulted as to what should be done with them. This was surely too great caution, as was that of the Chinese philosopher Chiungai, who, according to Martinius, Historia Sinica, Bk. V, laid down the rule that one could touch nothing which was evil or suspected of being from an evil person. For this reason he neither used his father's house, because he believed it had been erected by evil men, nor received food of his parents or brothers, for fear it had been secured unjustly.

It seems to have been a law among the Jews, as is inferred from Matthew, xiii. 44, that treasure passed to the owner of a field. Add Plautus, Trinummus, Act I, sc. ii, line 138¹ [175 ff.]; Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. VI, chap. xvi. According to Spartianus, Hadrian laid down the following laws on treasures: [Hadrian, xviii]: 'That if any one made a find on his own property he might keep it, if on another's land, he should turn over half² to the proprietor thereof, if on the State's, he should share the find equally with the privy-purse.' (M.) In Philostratus, Lives of the Sophists, Bk. II on Herodes, and Zonaras, Bk. II, Atticus, the father of Herodes, on finding a valuable treasure in his house, wrote to the emperor Nerva asking 'what orders he had to give as to its disposal'. Nerva replied, 'Use what you have found.' And when Atticus wrote again that he was overwhelmed by its size, he replied again, 'Misuse it, for it is yours.' Add Constitutions of Sicily, Bk. III, tit. xxi. In Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana, Bk. II, chap. xv, when a quarrel arose between the seller and the purchaser of a plot of ground, Apollonius ordered that they should see which was the better man, although such a method cannot be taken for a general rule.

14. Among those things acquired by occupancy the Roman lawyers also include enemy property. See Digest, XLI. ii. 1, § 1. For the proper understanding of this it should be recognized that, just as a state of war breaks off other rights of peace, so also it destroys the effect of dominion with regard to a foe, so that a man is no longer bound to keep his hands off that foe's property, except upon the persuasion of humanity. In war, therefore, the property of enemies in relation to another enemy are made, as it were, void of dominion, not because enemies through war cease to be masters of their own things in their own right, but because their dominion does not stand in the way of an enemy being able to carry off such things and keep them for himself, just as mere seizure is enough to acquire dominion over a thing unoccupied. And yet those who undertake to seize enemy property in war may be and usually are repelled with all alacrity. It should, however, be observed that dominions over things taken in war acquire full validity only when he, from whom they were taken, renounces his claim to them by concluding peace.

War has this further feature peculiar to it, namely, that in it even sovereignty can be secured over men. Since otherwise men do not fall under the head of an object of occupancy, whether they are already under another's sovereignty, or enjoy natural liberty, save in the sole case of infants that are exposed by their parents. See Hobbes, De Cive, chap. ix, § 4. For liberty, as well as all other rights, is attended with this effect, that it cannot, except with my consent, pass from me to another man not an enemy. For occupancy supposes no consent in an object capable of it, but is brought to completion only upon seizure by the occupier and in the absence of a right in the object that prevents occupancy. Therefore, upon the death of a person with no heir to succeed him either by his will or in law, all the rights which he had over things or persons are extinguished, and his things pass to whoever occupies them, while his subjects pass into natural liberty. For I can scarcely believe that there ever was a man of such humble spirit that he would voluntarily give up his liberty and leave it for any one to seize. Even if a man may feel no disgrace in serving another, he will at least reserve to himself the choice of his master.

Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 4, appears to include also sovereignty among the objects of occupancy, since he maintains that in things which belong to no one, two rights can be acquired, namely, sovereignty and dominion, in so far as the latter is distinguished from sovereignty. But this requires a subtle interpretation. For the term sovereignty is properly used only as over men, and cannot be acquired by occupancy, except in war and in the case mentioned above; since he who is not another's is his own, and not no one's. But sovereignty is improperly spoken of as existing over a place or territory, the effect of which is that no one can take that place for himself without the consent of him who is said to hold sovereignty over it, and whoever enters that place for a time only is forced for so long to recognize his jurisdiction. Yet this sovereignty is properly the effect of dominion that has been established over that place, and involves some sovereignty over men only as a consequence. For no one will, without my consent, take what is mine. Yet he who enters a place belonging to me is to this extent, at least, subjected to my direction, namely, that my dominion over that place may not suffer because of him.

ON THE ACQUISITION OF ACCESSIONS

Most of the things subject to the dominion of men have this characteristic, that they do not remain in the same state, but abound in different increases. For some of them by their own nature swell their own substance; to some are added improvements from without; still others abound in fruits and products differing from their own nature; many are wrought into new form by the hands of men and increased in value. All these can be gathered under the one term accessions, and they fall into two main classes; for some of them come from the mere nature of those things without the agency of man, while others are produced entirely or in part by the agency and labour of men. 400

2. With regard to the former the general rule is that, to the owner of a thing, no matter who he is, belong also its accessions. This principle, of course, is clearly derived from the very nature of dominion and the purpose for which it was first introduced, since there are many things, the possession of which is all in vain if their fruits belong to others, and the peace of men would be not at all advanced, if others could lay claim to the accessions of a thing with as much right as he who is called the owner of its substance. Therefore, there is no need of deriving the dominion of accessions from the title of a feigned occupancy, whereby we appear to possess an accession to a thing of ours through the mediacy, as it were, of that thing; or whereby one thing of ours is understood by its pre-eminence to attract another thing to itself.

3. Under the term fruits usually fall the increments, multiplications, and emoluments of all things whatsoever, except that the animals born of other animals are given the special name of offspring. Fruits are most commonly divided into those which come from the thing itself, and those for which the thing is but the occasion. The former are called natural, the latter legitimate or civil fruits. Of natural fruits some are due to the sole operation of nature without human cultivation and labour; in other things their natural fecundity or aptitude must be procured by the labour of men in making it more fruitful or productive.

Therefore, these are usually called the fruits of industry. Instances of civil fruits are to be found in usury, rent, transport charges, and the like. But fruits of the former kind, so long as they are not separated, are considered to be a part of the thing from which they come. Digest, VI. i. 44. When these are separated, they are understood to exist, as it were, separately. Both kinds, however, naturally belong to whatever person is the owner of the thing from which they are derived.

4. Regarding the young of animals most men have agreed that they follow the womb, and belong to the owner of the dam and not to the owner of the sire. See Digest, VI. i. 5, § 2. The reason for this is not so much that the sire is usually unknown, but because the young was at one time a part of the dam, but never of the sire, and because the part contributed by the former is far greater than that by the latter. Although if consideration is given to the physical cause, the contribution of each is the same, for it is not a question whether the existence of the calf can be ascribed more to the cow than to the bull, but whether it belongs more to the owner¹ of the former than to the owner of the latter. And the sire performs his part with little trouble, so that little or nothing is lost to his owner, but the dam, while carrying her burden, is of practically no service for anything else, and requires careful tending. Therefore, the owner of the former can surely lay no claim to equal shares with the owner of the latter, especially since one male may impregnate many females. Yet if a man keeps studs for that end, something is certainly due him for their use. Add Ziegler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 18; Felden, ibid.

5. Things planted and sown are also said to go with the soil, and plantings together with the roots with which they are set, because such things are not only nourished by the soil but they join with it as into one body and become a part of it. And so it is further required that they have taken root, for before that time they belong to their former 401 owner. But Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 22, thinks this to be an ordinance of positive and not of natural law, since the nourishment of a thing already existing is but a part of it. Therefore, he says, the owner of the soil can claim a right² merely to a part of that thing, nor does the owner of the seed, plant, or tree naturally lose his right; in fact the place will be held in a common ownership. Yet notwithstanding this, reason sides with the Roman laws. For it is not their design that the owner of seed, a plant, or a tree, provided he acted in good faith, should suffer the loss of the thing that was his, nor do they forbid the owners of the soil and the plant, if they so wish, from holding the object afterwards in common, according as the use of the soil or the value of the plant fixed for each³ his proper share. But because they are unwilling to compel a person to abide in community of ownership against his will, and since such things do not allow division¹, the question, therefore, is raised whether it is not fairer for the whole thing to be assigned to one of the parties, on the consideration that he pays the other, whether this latter be the owner of the ground or the owner of the seed, the value of what was his. And since it often happens in such a case that such things, being already united with the ground, cannot conveniently be transplanted, and cannot be kept alive without the ground, and since it appears absurd that the stable earth should yield in importance to a temporary plant, it has, therefore, been the universal custom that things planted should go with the ground, on the condition, however, that the owner of the ground should pay the value of the seed or plant to the other, when the transaction has been made in good faith. Yet if a man has sown poor seed on some ground of mine which I had reserved² for a better sowing, it does not appear that I am obligated to pay him even for the seed, since I am damaged in having my field occupied by a poor crop. But if the plants will bear moving, especially if they are of more value than the use of the ground, it would no doubt be the part of equity for the owner of the plant to be allowed to take it somewhere else, after paying for the use of the ground. In this connexion we should note a law of Solon, given in Plutarch, Solon [xxiii]:

He ordered that no one could set out a tree within five feet of his neighbour's field, or, in case it was a fig-tree or an olive-tree, within nine. For these reach out farther with their roots, and injure some trees by their proximity, taking away their nourishment, and emitting an exhalation which is sometimes noxious. (P.)

Cf. Digest, XLI. i. 7, § 13.³

6. Practically the same principles can be applied to buildings which are constructed on another's ground, or on one's own ground out of another's materials. If, indeed, the building is movable, there is no doubt that the owner of the ground has no right over it, provided it is moved, and a sum paid for the amount to which the ground was damaged by it. See Digest, VI. i. 38; XLI. i. 60. If a man builds a house for himself out of material belonging to me, the regular course is for me to receive its value instead of the material, since what is once worked into one building is unsuited for another. But if the material was not made worse in its use for building, and if I have need of it and cannot conveniently secure more like it, it is just for me to be allowed to take back my material. The Laws of the Twelve Tables forbid this, although they look after the interests of the owner of the material in another way by allowing him an action 'for joined timber' [de tigno iuncto] to the amount of twice its value.

But if a man has constructed a building of his own material on another's ground, provided he did this with full knowledge, it hardly appears that he can be clear of guile, and since it was his plan to steal that ground from the owner, it does not appear that the owner of the ground need recompense him for the value of his material and the wages of the workmen, or allow¹ him to take back his material after the building has been torn down. Law of the Lombards, Bk. I, tit. xxvii, § 1. When there was no guile, and when the building cannot be removed without being totally destroyed,² the Roman laws provided that the building goes with the ground, on the condition, however, that, if the builder be in possession, the owner of the land shall pay for the wages 402 of the workmen and the value of the material. Edict of King Theodoric, chap. cxxxvii. For although a building is usually of greater value than the ground and surface on which it stands, yet they thought it improper that an immovable thing should be attracted by something which can be moved, at least in pieces. Yet if the owner of the ground can easily do without that part of his land on which the building is erected, and it is not convenient for him to purchase the building, it seems the fairest thing for him to accept the value of the ground and leave the building to the other. Cf. Digest, XLI. i. 7, §§ 10, 11, 12.

² [For distinaveram read destinaveram.—Tr.]

7. But when the Roman Jurisconsults extended the rule, that buildings and things planted go with the ground, to include papers and parchments, their action meets with scant approval. See Digest, XLI. i. 9, § 1. It would mean that, if I in good faith wrote something on paper belonging to another, I should have to give the whole thing to him in return for the price of the composition. But it should rather be, that, since the writing is regularly worth more than the paper, the most just procedure is for the other to be satisfied with a payment for the paper. Especially since some add pertinently that the paper upon being used perishes and is consumed in a way, and so writing is by nature different from building. For the essence, as it were, of paper remains unaltered only so long as it is undefiled, so that something may be written upon it. When once it has been written upon it takes the name of book, letter, or journal, &c. Therefore, paper written upon is lost for me, in so far as it is no longer possible for me to write upon it. And so when I have been paid for it, I shall have no cause for complaint, since another sheet can serve me just as well.

8. The same Jurisconsults are more correct in their deliverance upon a picture, namely, that the canvas goes with it, since the former is regularly of far greater value than the latter, and since it is perfectly easy for a person to do without a canvas when he has been paid its value, for it is a common thing and to be secured practically everywhere. Yet this very consideration shows that in equity there is sometimes occasion for the opposite decision. If, for instance, some common dauber whose skill extends no further than to imitate a cypress-tree [Horace, Art of Poetry, 19 f.], should cover over a precious background with something that would better be erased, or carve something on a gold or silver plaque, or on a gem. So also it would be the height of impudence for a man to paint a little on another's wall, and then wish to claim that the house should go to him with the painting. Nay, since the expense that the artist incurred was to suit his own fancy, he will scarcely be able to ask from the owner of the building pay for his painting, unless it happens that the latter's resources are such that it appears he would have incurred that expense of his own accord. Add Digest, VI. i. 38.

9. In the same way the Roman Jurisconsults lay down the ruling that purple worked into another's garment goes with the latter, even though it excels it in value. This can be understood in two ways: A man may weave into a cheap warp of his a woof of purple threads belonging to another, or he may fit another's purple cloth to his own garment. In the former case there is hardly any doubt that the cloth should go to the owner of the purple. For a thing without which another cannot exist, and which is physically, as it were, put beneath something else to be supported by it, cannot in every case be held an accession to it; but we must always take into consideration the value, so that, in other words, the more valuable shall, other things being equal, draw to it the cheaper. It is, indeed, necessary that a thing which cannot exist without another should go with it, that is, that whatever is of the nature of an adjunct follows its subject, as we express it of the physical concomitancy of things. But in assigning the dominions of things, especially when it is a question of their values and uses, and of how well a person can do without a thing, this consideration cannot always prevail.

But as for the statement of Grotius, loc. cit., § 21: 'That a lesser thing should be taken over by a greater one is naturally consistent with the facts but not with right,' we agree to it in this sense: In fact what is stronger may draw to itself what is weaker, but it is not always lawful for a stronger to seize for himself the property of a weaker, or for a man to lose a possession of his own that is weaker, if it has been joined with a stronger. Thus, whoever is the owner of the twentieth part of a field is as much an owner as he who holds the other nineteen parts. Indeed, the real question in this connexion is not whether he who holds the greater part should acquire the less as well, but in what way the business should be conducted, if two men join in dominion over one thing which they cannot or will not either divide or hold in common. Under such circumstances the entire thing will have to be awarded to one of them, on the condition that he pays the other the value of his part. To which one of them the thing should be awarded will have to be decided on the superiority of one part to the other, the need of the owner, and similar circumstances. Thus, when another has fitted my purple cloth to his garment, even if the purple may be of greater value, it is preferable that I receive its price and leave to him the entire garment. For if the garment is to be ripped open, the other will suffer loss, but what advantage is it to me for my cloth to be returned to me mutilated? And garments fitted to another are entirely useless for me, or at least less suited. And, indeed, in all this matter what is right can be judged better from a consideration of individual cases than from any universal definition.

10. With regard to specification¹ it should be observed, at the outset, that it cannot properly be included among the original methods of acquisition. For since nothing comes into being naturally, but out of pre-existent matter, therefore it must be seen to whom that matter belongs. For if the matter was ours, the dominion will persist after the introduction of the new form. If it belonged to no one, dominion over it will be acquired by occupancy. But if it belonged to another, it must be decided whether it shall be awarded to the owner of the matter, or to him who made the form. Since the ancient Roman Jurisconsults disagreed on this point, they finally chose a middle ground, namely, that, if a form could be brought back to its earlier and simple matter, it should pass to the owner of the matter, but if it could not, to him who introduced the new form into the matter. Some feel that this decision is based upon the very evident reason that, when a form cannot be reduced to the original material, the latter seems in some way to have perished, and some new effect to have arisen; therefore, in such a case, the thing should go to him who was responsible for its existing under that new form; but when the form can be brought back to its original matter, the latter should be understood as still existent, and not to have perished because of the introduction of the new form; and so it has not passed from its former owner. Others hold that the only point to bear in mind is whether the matter or the form is of the greater value. See Connan, Commentaria Juris Civilis, Bk. III, chap. vi.

It is my own judgement that neither of these opinions can with entire equity be applied to all cases, but that consideration must be given to other circumstances as well. Thus, if a man makes wine, oil, or bread from my grapes,² olives, or grain, or mead from my honey and wine, why should he have any more right over these forms than I, simply because they cannot be resolved into their former matter? Therefore, if things of this general kind can be divided, this should be done on the basis of the value of the matter, or of the work required in making the form. But if the owner of the matter stands in need of all of it, my judgement is that in every case he should be favoured in preference to the man who changed it. Thus, if a man has fashioned an object from metal belonging to another, and the form is of more value than the matter, it is just that the object be left to the fashioner, even though it can be brought back to its original and crude mass, provided the same amount of metal, or its value, is given to the owner. But it appears that the opposite decision must be rendered, if I had intended that the metal in question be used for the same object which I greatly need, and similar metal cannot be secured. For under such circumstances equity favours the owner of the matter, although possibly the form may be of greater value than the matter.

Others think that the point to be considered is whether the power 404 of the matter to receive the form was near or remote. They feel that in the former case the owner of the matter is to be favoured, in the latter the fashioner, that is, if a ship be fashioned out of another's rough lumber, it belongs to him who made it, but if the lumber had been worked into planks intended for a ship, the vessel will belong to him who owned the planks. Likewise, if a man has made a garment from some raw wool of mine, it will be his, but if it has been made from some material of mine, it belongs to me. Likewise, a plaster, if made from powders already prepared and perfected, belongs to the owner of the ingredients, but if not prepared, to the maker of the plaster. Yet even this distinction does not in every instance square with equity. For if such matter, whether unworked or already worked up to receive a form, is in my possession, either for sale or in such quantities that it more than meets my necessities, there is no reason why it should not be turned over to a fashioner, if he pays for it. But if I had intended some matter for a special use of mine, and there is no convenient opportunity to get equivalent material anywhere else, my need adds weight to my plea, even though the matter is still in more remote power.¹ Add Digest, VI. i. 61. And even if a man had made a form partly from his matter and partly from another's, it is still not certain that in every such case the product should be assigned to the maker, on the ground that the form is due to his labour, and in addition he furnished part of the matter. For it is possible both that the labour is of little value, and that the part of the material which he furnished is likewise of so little consequence that the other's matter is greater than both contributions. Moreover, there are things which require a set amount of material, and when a man removes part of it he renders the rest of it useless, at least for that purpose. In such a case judgement must be pronounced in favour of him who needs most the thing thus formed.

But the statement of Grotius, loc. cit., § 19, holds true in every case that, when things consist of material and form, as if of parts, if the material belongs to one and the form to another, it naturally follows that the ownership becomes common, in proportion to the value that each element has. In the same way the whole body as well, which results from the working together or mixture of two portions of material of the same kind, is held in common by the owner of each. See Digest, VI. i. 3, § 2; VI. i. 5. But when the object cannot be held in common or divided, either equity or positive laws must decide which one should, upon receiving the value of his share, yield the entire object to the other. See Digest, VI. i. 23, §§ 2, 3.¹ Yet the inquiry should be made in every instance, as to whether a man gave form to the matter of another in good or bad faith. For when a man acts in bad faith, he cannot claim that the product belongs to him, rather than to the owner of the material, even though the form be of greater value than the material, and the material apparently has disappeared in the form, or though he be in very great need of the thing fashioned. For the greater thing does not of itself draw to it the less, but there must also lie in the owner of the greater thing a reasonable ground. Therefore, if a man, with wilful and evil design, puts a new form on matter of mine, with the purpose to make away with it on that score, he acquires no right over the matter, and he can no more demand of me pay for his services, than can a thief who digs through my wall, on the ground that he had at some trouble made a new entrance into my house, or an assassin who lanced an otherwise incurable tumour with a blow aimed at a man's life, or even Autolycus for the paint which he put on the horses which he stole. And this is not derived from positive laws, but from natural reason itself, although nature does not otherwise determine penalties. For to perform a wicked deed gratis is no punishment;² and surely it is most just that no man should be obliged to pay another for an endeavour to do him injury. Add Law of the Visigoths, Bk. X, tit. i, chap. 7.

405 II. What ancient and more modern lawyers set forth so laboriously about alluvial deposits is for the most part uncertain, and dependent not so much on natural reason as on the positive laws of individual nations. On that account we will be able to discuss this topic with greater brevity. Two questions are usually raised about alluvial deposits, or those unobserved increments whereby a river adds something to its banks, namely, whether they increase whole regions, and whether they increase also private fields.

The first question is of greater importance, in view of the fact that it can often be the occasion of great controversies between nations, since it frequently happens that a river is interposed as a boundary between two peoples. When, therefore, it has changed its course, the question is raised as to whether the boundary of the jurisdiction is at the same time changed, and whether the land added by the river passes to those to whose banks it has been added. Here we must draw, first of all, a distinction between areas that are limited, that is, whose extent is marked off by boundaries laid down by hands, among which, for our present purpose, are to be included fields measured off and described as of so many acres, and between areas called arcifinious, the boundaries of which are formed for the special purpose of warding off enemies, and are for the most part natural, such as rivers and mountain ranges. We must then inquire whether the neighbouring nations left the river between them unoccupied, open to the general use of both peoples, or wished their boundaries to lie in the middle of the river, so that half of it should belong to one nation and half to the other. Or, finally, whether the entire river belongs to one nation, so that their boundary extends to the bank of the other nation.

Now if both nations have limited areas, that is, such as are marked off by a set measure, which adjoin each other directly without leaving a vacant space between them, there will be no change in their territory, even if the river has changed its course, nor will there be any chance of deposit from the stream, since no space is left that does not already belong to one or the other of them. But if the river is left between them as unoccupied, deposits on the banks, and islands arising therefrom will pass to those who seize them; although the most fitting thing is for the deposit to be taken by him on whose bank it is left, and an island by him whose bank is closer to it. If an entire river belongs to one nation, the islands arising in it will belong to that state alone, but it is more fitting that deposits on the opposite bank shall belong entirely to the other nation. And yet it is more common, and more agreeable as well, that lands extending on either side down to a river should have it as their boundary, and that, therefore, their boundaries should be understood to be in the centre of the river, for a river both serves to show the boundary without obscurity, and forms at the same time a natural defence for the region. Yet even in such a case it is required that it should not be the custom of the river to overflow its banks, leaving them thus uncertain, and every year find for itself new channels. So, when nations have arcifinious fields (as is presumed in case of doubt), a river by gradually changing its course changes also the borders of the domain, and whatever the river adds to one side belongs to that nation on whose bank it is left, provided, however, this change has come about gradually, and the river has not, by leaving its bed at one rush, broken a course for itself through an entirely different area. For the gain or loss of smaller portions, or such a change as leaves the old form to the region as a whole, allows it to remain practically the same, while the convenience of a natural frontier is too great for it to be desirable to change it over a negligible loss.

But if a river leaves its old bed and cuts a channel deep into other territory, and if the nation through whose fields it has cut a new course does not regard the possession of a natural frontier worth as much to them as the loss of so great a part of their land, then the borders will be understood to lie in the middle of the deserted bed. For just as a stone serves as a boundary mark not because it is a stone but because it is set in that particular place, so a river is a boundary of nations, not because 406 it is water gathered from certain springs, rivulets, and other rivers, and designated by a special name, but as it flows in a certain channel and is enclosed within certain banks. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. iii, § 16, and the remarks of Boecler and Ziegler on that passage.

12. Regarding the estates of individuals, it would be my judgment that we must inquire, in the first place, whether a river on which a private field borders, separates the territories of two states, or flows through but one of them, and secondly, whether it is a public or a private stream. In the former case it depends entirely on the will of the state, whether it leaves such additions of land to individuals, or claims them for the state. For in general nations have occupied some tract of land in its entirety, and then assigned parts of it to individuals as private estates, which have on the whole a set and definite measurement. Therefore, just as what has not been assigned of that territory to individuals remains the public property of the state, so whatever has been added to the boundary of an individual, is held to have been added to the public holding. Yet since fields bordering upon rivers often suffer great inconvenience from them by their floods, and since the river deposits, because of their slow accumulation, seem to be of little importance for the public income, many states have felt it only proper to grant the deposits in question to those persons to whose estates they have been added. And this is all the more fair, if they have been in the habit of strengthening the banks at their own expense. Furthermore, any land is presumed to enjoy this right, which has been assigned to an individual not by a definite measure, but bodily, as it were, although in the transfer some mention may have been made of a measure (see Digest, XIX. i. 13, § 14), and so, if, in the designation of the borders, mention has been made merely of the river. But if¹ the deposits are of great importance, and such as far exceed the measure of the private estate, they will be held to belong to the public. Yet private individuals will not be able to claim islands arising in a river, without the express concession of the state, because, in view of the fact that they are separated from the estate, they cannot be regarded as a part or addition to it. Men will have no more right to seize them on the mere ground that they are very close to their estates, than would any other man to lay claim to that part of a street or square that lies close to his own dwelling.

But if a river that carries deposits runs between the lands of subjects of the same state, in consideration of the fact that a river can carry down nothing but what it has washed away somewhere else, it is just in every case for the deposit to belong to him from whose estate¹ it has been taken. Therefore, the Roman laws very properly decided, that, if the violence of the current took a piece from your farm and added it to mine, it should still be yours. This principle applies all the more to movable fields such as in antiquity they built upon reed rafts in the marshes of the Euphrates,² as we are told by Strabo, Bk. XVI, which they used to shove back with poles to their former position, when they had been torn away by the current. But if the piece has clung for some time to my estate, and the trees carried with it have struck root in my soil, from that time it will appear to have become a part of my estate. Digest, VI. i. 7, § 2. From this it is clear that the owner of the piece torn away should have brought it back to its former position, before it became united to the land, if he wanted to retain dominion over it. But when it is not discoverable what and how much has been taken from another's estate, he from whose land something has been lost is prevented from claiming any deposit for himself, and it appears that by nature the deposit is acquired not by the owner of the estate on which it is deposited, but by the nation to which the river belongs. For it is entirely reasonable that not only the water of a public river and what it contains are understood to be public, but also its bed and the banks within which it flows, as well as what is added to them. Indeed, it seems improper to say that the bed as such is a part of the nearest estate, 407 but that it is considered public so long as it is filled up with a public river, yet when the river is removed, it returns to its private nature—as though an estate owes a service of passageway to a river.

But if a river has left its entire bed, or a part of it, and has cut a new channel, it would be but right, since the new bed has been cut from the opposite estate, to give the owner the old bed in compensation for the new; and in case the river leaves the new bed, for it to return to its former owner, and not to those who held land abutting on the new course. But whatever results from deposit or a change of bed, it is surely just that burdens laid upon a field should be reduced in proportion to what has been taken from it. Such a law Herodotus [II. cix] says was in force among the Egyptians.

But it is furthermore just, that, if a field has been covered by a flood, it still belongs to its former owner, either when the water has withdrawn at a single rush or gradually, or when the field has been drained by the owner's effort. But to whom shall this flood water belong, until the submerged land has become dry again? In this case I feel we must inquire whether the submerged land becomes a lake or swamp, or forms a part of the bed of a public river. In the former case the lake and swamp shall belong permanently to the owner of the land, and in the latter case as well, so long as he shall intend to turn the river back into its former bed. In the case of private rivers which take land from me in one place and add it to me in another, the matter is clear. But what if my private river cut a new channel for itself through another's estate? Will that part of the river which has covered another's land remain mine, or will it belong to him over whose land it has broken? It is my feeling that we should decide for the second alternative, yet I shall still have the right to bring back the river to its former bed. But if I do not wish to bring back the river within my land, I shall not be able to demand payment for it from the other party, nor claim that it is common to us both in that part. For whatever things are ours simply because they are contained within an area belonging to us, being, therefore, accessions to that area or space, must, upon passing outside it, either be brought back by us within it, or else cease to belong to us, in which case they will be regarded a natural increment, as it were, of that other area.

Yet such cases positive laws can dispose of in different ways. The following rules are laid down in Aggenus [Agennius] Urbicus [Gromatici Veteres, I, p. 16, ll. 25 ff.]:

If this be done in lands title to which has been secured by occupancy, whatever the violence of the master has stolen away, no one has the right to have restored. This consideration makes it necessary for men to protect their own bank of a stream, in such a way, however, as not to do any damage to some one else. But if it shall be done in a district that has been divided and assigned, the owner will lose nothing, because a definite limit and shape was fixed for each man's holding in the hundreds.

Regarding the lands on the river Po, Cassius had given this pronouncement [ibid., p. 17, ll. 9 ff.]:

Whatever the lapping waters carry away, let the possessor lose, because, forsooth, he ought to protect his own bank without doing damage to some one else. But if the river shall pour down with extreme violence and change its course, let each man regain his own measure of land, because in this case the loss was due not to the neglect of the possessor but to the violence of the storm. Now if the river form an island, let him own the island whose land went to make it; but if the island be composed of the property of several men, let each recover what was his own.

Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 8 ff., with comments by Ziegler on the passage.

SUCH is the force of dominion that only the owner may dispose of his own property, and all others are bound to keep their hands off. Yet since things were not divided among men with the purpose that there should be an end to all sharing together of property, it comes about that not merely are we obligated, by the law of humanity, often to allow another our goods and the use of them, but others, either by contract or in some other way, acquire a perfect or imperfect right in a thing of ours, and from it, therefore, gain for themselves by their own right some benefit or advantage. The different ways in which this can take place may be noticed by us at this time in a few words, inasmuch as the whole subject has been so thoroughly discussed by the expositors of the Roman law, to whom may be added Selden, De Jure Naturali et Gentium, Bk. VI, chap. ii.

2. The chief rights, not held by owners, over things, are usually classed by some writers under five heads: Emphyteutic right, superficiary right, the right of a possessor in good faith, a pledge or mortgage, and servitudes.

3. Emphyteutic right, which is granted to a person in an immovable thing by the owner, on the obligation of his returning a certain rent as recognition of the ownership, allows the emphyteuticary the power not merely to make full use of the thing, but also to dispose of it, although not with entire freedom in its alienation. The contract under which this right is immediately set up falls neither under buying and selling, nor under letting and hiring, since full dominion of the thing is not conferred upon the second party, and yet more is given him than in letting, especially since the rent is regularly far less than is otherwise customary in letting. The expositors of the Roman law give in all their works the rules which prevail in the renewal of such a contract, in the payment of the rent, in the alienation of emphyteutic property, and in its duration either by common law or by special agreement.

4. Whoever has secured a superficiary right by the payment of a single sum or a stipulated rent, can enjoy it like dominion and dispose of it and alienate it, and so act as the owner of such things as lie above the ground, but not of the ground itself. In this he is different from an emphyteuticary, to whom belongs useful dominion also over the soil. The reason for the introduction of such a right was that some men wanted to get settlers for their great estates, on condition, however, that they remain undiminished. Therefore, they allowed them a superficiary right, in recognition of which a small annual rent had to be paid, while they reserved for themselves the ground. See Justin, Bk. XVIII, chap. v, n. 14. Moreover, if the things above the ground 409 perish, that is, if the buildings fall down or are burned, the right of the superficiary ends, so that the owner of the ground may again dispose of things above the ground as he pleases.

5. The right of a possessor in good faith, which belongs to those who in good faith received another's property from one who was not its real owner, by a title which was just and was otherwise able to transfer dominion, is equal to that of a true owner, in so far as he may claim all the fruits of the thing as his own, may dispose of it at his pleasure, may protect it against all men except its real owner, and is entitled to be defended in his possession by the laws. See Digest, XLI. i. 48. This possession after a certain lapse of time gives the possessor irrevocable dominion, which will prevail even against the owner, as will be shown at greater length below.

This right has been introduced to further commercial relations between men and the tranquillity of civil life, in order that he who undertakes to amass property for himself in good faith and on a just title may not meet with troublesome inconveniences. And these would beset him, if for so long a time he could be disturbed in his possession with impunity by any other person, or were he bound, upon the owner claiming the thing, to restore the fruits as well, or if, finally, his possession were in constant uncertainty. Just as it is not merely a rule of civil law, but a conclusion from natural reason, that every man is to be left in whatever possession he has secured in good faith, until the claimant has shown a right of his own equal to possession. For what trouble and nuisances might a man be subjected to daily, if he could be forced to relinquish possession of his property at any person's protest, and to bring suit against him so as to recover it again! See the expositors of the Roman law on Digest, VI. ii. Pledges will be discussed below.

6. Servitudes, considered from the position of him to whom they are owed, are rights of receiving a fixed profit or advantage from something belonging to another, or of preventing the owner from using his possessions in any way he chooses. Considered from the position of him who owes them, they are obligations to grant another a profit from one's own property, or to refrain from a certain use of one's own property, to the advantage of another. According to the thing to which they are owed, servitudes are divided into personal and real, not because every advantage does not ultimately work to the favour of a person, but for the reason that some of them fall to a man for the sole reason that he is the holder of some estate. See Grotius, Bk. I, chap. i, § 4; add Digest, VIII. ii. 32, § 1. Others express the same thing in this way, namely, that an advantage comes to one from another's property either immediately, or by the mediation of a certain estate.

7. The following personal servitudes are usually listed: usufruct, use, habitation, and the labours of servants. Usufruct is the right to use and enjoy the things of another without impairing their substance, or, in other words, the right to receive from what is another's, every profit which can come from it without impairing its substance. For although whoever is the owner of a thing is regularly the owner of its fruits, yet nothing prevents the separation of these two, so that dominion lies with one, and the right to enjoy the fruits with another. This can be established either by civil law, although it is highly agreeable with natural reason for a father who still holds his son in his power, to enjoy the usufruct of the latter's adventitious acquisitions, or by the decision of a judge, when, for instance, a thing possessed in common cannot be divided conveniently in any other way, or by an act of men, be it by a will or by agreements. Yet it is clear that usufruct can properly be established only in those things which furnish some use beyond that of their substance, or, in other words, which are not exhausted by use, provided there is actually in them some use, ornament, or delight. On the other hand usufruct, in the strict sense of the term, is not to be found in a thing which is only of use when it is being consumed, since 410 the body of a thing, and so dominion over it, is understood to belong to him who can rightfully consume anything at his pleasure. Yet it is laid down by Roman law, that the usufruct of money and of other serviceable things can be established by will and be given a person in legacy, where the money or things are given the legatee to be his own, although he must give security to the heir that he will restore that sum of money or things of the same quality, or their value, upon the expiration of his usufruct, so that his security takes the place, as it were, of the bodily legacy for the real owner.¹ See Digest, VII. v. 1, 2, 7, 11.

Now all the profits and all the fruits or advantages, both natural as well as civil, which come from a thing, belong to the usufructuary. Yet the Roman laws excepted the child of a maid-servant, on the ground, apparently, that usufruct of slaves was introduced because of the labour they performed, not because of their power of reproduction. Natural fruits, however, become the property of the usufructuary by his taking, that is, when he has separated them from the body and gathered them together. It follows from this that fruits not yet separated belong to the proprietor, and in case the usufructuary dies before their collection, they cannot be claimed by his heir. Yet if cultivation and labour have been spent on the fruits it would be but just for the heir to be admitted to a share in them, at least to the extent that the usufructuary may not have given his labour gratis. Civil fruits belong to the usufructuary for the length of time for which the grant was made.

Now just as a usufructuary owes it to play the honest man, that is, as becomes a diligent master of a household, and to make such a use of a thing as its nature and state demands and as the owner had intended, so he is also bound to guard it and preserve it safe and sound, as well as to pay taxes on it and levies and other ordinary and extraordinary burdens, at least as many as do not exceed the returns from it. See Digest, VII. i. 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, § 4 ff., 15, 17, 18, 27, 44, 45, 59, 61, 62, 65, 68, 69, 70. For such things, quite as well as cultivation and care, fall to him who wishes to gain profit from a thing. Nor is it presumed that any one has laid such a burden on himself, that he not only wishes to grant the fruits of his property to another, but to shoulder its burdens as well.

Usufruct is said to terminate with the death of the usufructuary, because in such a concession the merit of the person is regularly considered, which does not pass over to others. Furthermore, since it is extremely onerous for the fruit of one's property to be in the power of others, such a concession is to be interpreted in all strictness, so that if the statement runs, 'I have granted usufruct to Seius and his heirs', that is not extended to his heirs' heirs. There is, indeed, no value in an ownership which is excluded for ever from the use of a thing. In this sense is to be taken the saying of Cicero, Letters to Friends, Bk. VII, letter xxx: 'That is a man's true possession which he himself enjoys and uses.' Therefore, if usufruct has been left in legacy to a state, which can ordinarily last for ever, the Roman laws decided that it should terminate after one hundred years (see Digest, VII. v. 56). Such a legacy also terminates if, in the meantime, that state or city is put under the plough of an enemy. Digest, VII. iv. 21.

It also follows from the same reasons that usufruct cannot be alienated, since in this way as well the owner could be circumvented for ever, and the grant turned over to one whom the owner would see only with great disgust on his property. According to Roman law it was lost with the forfeiture of civil rights, whether full or restricted. For they were unwilling that this right should restrict an owner any longer, after he could get no further profit from the one in whose favour it had been granted, nor did they hold it fitting for one who had 411 lost his citizenship, to have such a right in the property of a citizen.

It follows, also, from law or agreement, that it is lost within a certain time by non-use, since many things deteriorate if not used, by failure to observe the manner of use laid down, or by making the thing worse, either from malice or culpable negligence. Usufruct also terminates if the thing perishes (see Digest, VII. iv. 30); nor, in view of the strict interpretation required in such a matter, is it restored when the thing again comes into being. For instance, a house which I have just erected to take the place of one destroyed by fire, is surely not the same as the former; and since the replacement of the old one required a great expense, it would surely be a hardship for the owner to have erected a building which brought him no returns. See Digest, VII. iv. 5, §§ 2, 3; VII. iv. 8, 9, 10, 12, 23.

Finally, usufruct ceases by establishment of ownership [consolidatio], as well as when the usufructuary returns the right to the owner, since no man receives a servitude from what is his own (see Digest, VII. vi. 5 pr.); for usufruct and every servitude denote properly a right in a thing which belongs to another, while if a man uses what is his own and receives a profit from the same, it is due to the power of dominion. Add Digest, VII. iv. 28; VIII. ii. 26.

8. It is called use, when a man secures only a daily and necessary advantage from another's property without impairing its substance; and this involves less than usufruct, since he who has use of a thing can only take as much as will suffice for himself and his dependants, which is measured by the station and condition of the person to whom the use is granted. For instance, just as a man may properly have the use of a house, when his family can live there, so he will not be permitted to receive a guest for a long period of time nor a lodger who does not make his home with him as a part of the family, in case the proprietor must make his home in the same dwelling; although it is different, if the man has the use of the whole house. See Digest, VII. viii. 22, § 1. Nor will he be allowed, as a regular thing, to turn over that use to another, since it is a matter of the greatest importance, whom a man takes to live in the same house with him. Compare Digest, VII. viii. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, § 3; VII. viii. 11, 12, 15. Concerning the preservation and repair of the thing of which a man has use, it seems most equitable, that, if the owner gets no return from it other than the use received by the other party, the latter should keep it in perfect condition. When an equal return is made to both parties, it will be preserved and repaired at their common expense. Digest, VII. viii. 18. But if the use of a thing be inconsequential in comparison with the return which still remains to the owner, it is easy to presume that the use was granted without any burden.

9. Habitation, according to the Roman Jurisconsults, is the right whereby a man enjoys every return which usually comes from dwelling in another's house. It is less inclusive than usufruct, because to the latter belongs the return from the collection of wares and from other causes. Yet it is more inclusive than mere use, because a man can let out such a house to others to use in his stead.

10. By the right of the labours of servants one receives every¹ return which comes from the labours of another's servant. The Roman laws say that this right is less inclusive than the usufruct of a servant, since a servant can be of profit in other ways than by his mere labour.

11. Real servitudes, which are owed a person because of some property in land, are in general called rights, by which a neighbour's property is obligated to furnish some utility to our own. In Roman law they are divided into servitudes on urban property and servitudes on country property. The designation 'country property' is given to fields and buildings which are concerned with agriculture and the keeping 412 of herds and flocks. The designation 'urban property' is given to all buildings erected for the dwelling of men, uses of business, and similar purposes, even when outside of cities and located in the country. Neighbourliness, which is not improperly regarded as next to friendship, furnished in general the occasion for the establishment of all such services. See Digest, VIII. ii. 38, 39; VIII. iii. 5. For since it was a matter of great advantage, as well as pleasure, for many men to live together and unite their dwellings, and this was scarcely possible, if a man decided to exclude his neighbour from every use of what was his own, neighbours came to agree that no man should always use his own things in such a way that another would thereby be reduced to serious straits; and that he should allow a limited use of his own possessions to another, without which the latter could not avoid suffering a very marked inconvenience. Add Digest, VII. vi. i, §§ 1, 2; VIII. i. 15; VIII. ii. 10, 20, § 2; VIII. ii. 31. Likewise also 'neighbourliness' without injury 'is regarded as next to friendship'. Terence, The Self-Tormentor [57]. Hesiod, Works and Days, Bk. I [343 ff.]:

And especially call him (to a feast) who lives near you: for if any mischief happen in the place, neighbours come ungirt, but kinsmen stay to gird themselves. A bad neighbour is as great a plague as a good one is a great blessing; he who enjoys a good neighbour, enjoys honour. (E. W.)

Socrates in Xenophon, Memorabilia of Socrates, Bk. II [ii. 12], mentions the following instances of a neighbour's favours: "That he may kindle a fire for you in your need, may prove himself a ready help in good fortune, or if you chance on evil and are stumbling, may friendly stand by your side and aid." (D.) Add also Plato, Laws, Bk. VIII, p. 915, ed. Frankf. 1602 [VIII, 842 E ff.] Yet it should be observed, regarding all servitudes, that they should not be extended too broadly and should be used in moderation, lest they cause trouble and arouse disgust in a neighbour. See Digest, VIII. i. 8.

The following are usually numbered among the servitudes of city property:

The servitude of bearing a burden, whereby a neighbour's wall or column is obliged to support the burden of our house. A consequence of this is, that a neighbour who owes such servitudes is under obligation to keep that wall or column in repair, since otherwise the servitudes would be rendered void, upon the collapse of the wall. Digest, VIII. ii. 33.

The servitude of admitting a timber, whereby a beam, or something else that serves to bind a house together, may be let from one's house into the wall of a neighbour, so that it rests in the latter.

The servitude of projecting or extending over, whereby some structure is allowed to extend over another's house or land, yet in such a way that it does not rest upon his dwelling; such structures are balconies and eaves.

The servitude of raising higher, whereby a man is obligated even to his own disadvantage, to allow another to raise his building higher to his own advantage, although otherwise the former could prohibit and prevent it.

The servitude of not raising higher, whereby a man, for the advantage and convenience of his neighbour's house, is forced to keep his own low or not raise it above a certain height.

The servitude of lights, whereby a neighbour is forced to allow exception to our lights or our windows, by which we admit light.

The servitude of not hindering lights, whereby a neighbour can do nothing by which any lights of our dwelling may be cut off or diminished. An outstanding instance of a strict maintenance of this servitude under the emperor Theophilus is to be found in Zonaras, Bk. III, and Michael Glycas, Bk. IV.

The servitude of prospect, whereby a neighbour is bound to allow us a view into his estate and cannot prevent it.

The servitude of not cutting off prospect, whereby a man cannot do anything on his estate which will interfere with a free view in any direction and especially toward a pleasing vista.

The servitude of receiving roof water denotes the obligation resting upon one man to receive his neighbour's troublesome water on his land.

The servitude of not receiving roof water denotes the obligation not to 413 turn a neighbour's useful water to one's own advantage.

The servitude of receiving a flow of water, whereby a neighbour is bound to receive¹ the flow of water, that is, water that has been collected and that flows like a river from our dwelling through channels or pipes.

The servitude of not turning aside a flow of water, whereby a neighbour is not permitted to turn aside a flow of water coming from his house, from flowing over my estate, because of the advantage which my estate receives from it. To this servitude, finally, belongs that of allowing the passage of a drain, of pouring something on a neighbour's land, and the like.

12. The servitudes of country property, or those which are owed estates that are concerned with farming, are commonly listed as follows. Passage, which is the right for a man to go by foot through a neighbour's estate into mine, for the sake of the latter. Carriage, which is the right of driving a beast of burden or a vehicle. Roadway, which is the right to go, walk, drive, and to transport, lead, carry, and draw everything which concerns the advantage of our estate. Water conveyance, the right to lead water through another's estate for the benefit of our own, whether we use such water to irrigate our fields or to serve our flocks, or whether we thereby free our land from superfluous water. The nature of these servitudes is such that they cannot be granted in part, since they are of use only when unlimited. For, as it is stated in Digest, VIII. iii [38]: 'A complete road generally reaches as far as some town, or up to a high road; or to a river which is crossed by a ferry, or to some other land under the same ownership.' (M.) Therefore, it would be useless to have a passage through but half of another's estate, if it could go no farther. Drawing of water, the right to draw water from a spring or some other place belonging to another, in so far as it is needed for our estate. With this concession is understood to go also that of a passage to the spring or well. Digest, VIII. iii. 3, § 1. Leading of herds to water, the right to bring the herds of our estate to the water of a neighbour. Here belongs also the right of pasturing the herds of our estate on another's land. Regarding this right they observe that it does not prevent the owner of the land affording the servitude, from being able to pasture his own herds as well, provided he does not undertake to feed more than the land can support, so as to interfere with the other man's right. But whoever has the right of pasturage shall not bring in sick or scabby cattle, from which the others can be infected. Finally, they class under this head the right of burning lime, of digging sand, of cutting stakes and wood, and of quarrying stone, in so far as they make for the advantage of country property. Add Digest, VIII. iii. 3. All these servitudes others have treated at great length.

WE must now consider derivative ways of acquisition, by which dominion once established passes from one person to another. Before we undertake to explain them in detail, it will be well to make some 414 remarks, by way of introduction, on transfer of property in general. Now the power of a man to alienate a thing of his or to transfer it to another, comes from the nature of full dominion. For since this gives an owner the power to dispose of a thing as he pleases, it seems, indeed, the main feature of this power to be able, if he pleases, to transfer it to another, so that by this means he may secure a thing more agreeable to himself, or at least may have an opportunity to put another under obligation to him by an act of generosity.

2. Now just as in the transfer of rights and of things there are two parties to the transaction, the one who transfers and the one to whom they are transferred, so in those forms of acquisition which proceed from the force of dominion, there is required a meeting of two wills, namely, the will of the giver and the will of the receiver. For alienation means, first and foremost, that a thing passes from a willing owner, and that it is not taken from him against his will by mere violence. And if a thing is to receive one owner for another, the former must also agree to the transfer, since it is improper that a thing, the physical substance of which is something separate from me, should, as it were, be joined to me, when I have not embraced it with my own will and consent. But when dominion is said to pass of its own right to a man without his knowledge, as is the case with inheritances, in such instances the law is said to cause acceptance, as it were, by a certain legal fiction in favour of the heir. A proof of this is found in the fact that the heir can refuse a legacy, and unless he actually enters upon it, either in his own person or through another, he is not bound by obligations which arise from the thing inherited.

3. Now since alienations should take place with the will of each party concerned, and since it is not agreeable to human society to assign to mere internal acts the power to produce rights which will be effective against other men, it is required of each party, the giver as well as the receiver, that he declare his agreement with fitting signs, so that all others may be entirely certain of it. Such signs are nods, gestures, words, and written documents, to which are added in some places declaration in the presence of a magistrate, public registry, and the like.

4. It is, furthermore, clear, that, when transfer or alienation has taken place perfectly and absolutely, there remains to him who makes the transfer no right or claim to the thing formerly his. Although this is inherent in every alienation by its very nature, yet it is often expressly stated in solemn cessions and renuncements, that no pretence or attempt is hereafter to be made on that thing by the party or his heirs, and that, if such is made, it is to be held null and void; and this for the reason that a man cannot effectually dispose of a thing which has already been made another's. Yet after a thing has been alienated, there often remains with the party disposing of it, a claim over it, and a kind of ultimate or eventual right which exerts its force upon a certain event taking place. And this is true for two reasons: Either because it has been expressly agreed upon in the alienation, as is the case of things which are sold with the right to withdraw from the sale, or which are alienated with the condition that the vendor may withdraw from the bargain, if the sum is not paid when agreed upon, or when only a limited dominion is transferred, as is the case in the granting of a fief and land held in emphyteusis; or because a tacit condition underlies the alienation, and when this asserts itself, the right of the former owner to the thing revives, whence arise formal claims for restitution of a thing not owed, or given for a cause which did not follow, of wedding presents when marriage did not take place, and of a dowry in case of divorce. Thus in Homer, Odyssey, Bk. VIII, line 318, Vulcan, upon taking his wife Venus in adultery, demands back the ἑδνα [gifts of wooing] which he had given his father-in-law in return for the hand of his daughter. The Koran lays down the law, that, when a man puts away his betrothed before he has known her, she may keep the half of what her suitor had given her, unless he choose to let her keep it all.

415 5. But the main question usually discussed in this connexion is, whether, by natural law, delivery of possession is required for transfer of dominion; for it has already been observed by others, that delivery of possession cannot properly be listed among the ways of acquiring dominion, since it is an act intervening in the transfer of dominion. Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 25, and elsewhere, feels that natural law allows the transfer of dominion by pacts alone, but that delivery of possession is only required by positive civil law, which, because it is followed by many nations, is improperly called the law of nations. On the other hand the expositors of Roman law maintain that dominions of things are not transferred by pacts alone, even though it may be expressly so stated in the compact, but that delivery of possession is required. The reason they advance for this is, that dominions had their rise in natural possession, and, therefore, in their transfer, such an act is required as may make possible the immediate obtaining of the natural possession of the thing. In which connexion still others call attention to the fact, that, in original acquisition, such as occupancy, the title or cause, and the manner of acquisition, concur. But that in derivative acquisitions these two things are always distinguished; for delivery of possession and acceptance are a manner of transferring dominion, or rather acts intervening in the transfer of dominion, while donation, buying, selling, &c., are titles or causes by which dominion is transferred; although we have shown before, that bare occupancy is not enough to give title for dominion, but that it is preceded by a pact. Others steer a middle course on this question, and while they deny that delivery of possession is necessary by natural law, they maintain that it accords with reason, since dominion cannot be exercised in a thing, unless I have, as it were, taken it to my body, which can be done only by delivery of possession and seizure.

6. In our opinion the matter can be entirely cleared up, if it is observed that dominion may be considered, either as it denotes merely a moral quality, according to which a thing is understood to belong to some one and necessarily to be subject to his disposal, or as it is accompanied by some further physical faculty, so that what we have decided upon touching that thing, we can at once put into effect. Or, what amounts to the same thing, now and then dominion is considered as a thing separate from possession, and at times it is understood as joined with possession, which is the final complement, as it were, of property, the latter fully exerting its direct effects when the former is posited. And so, in this connexion, it will not be beside the point to make some general reflections on possession.

7. By possession we do not understand a mere retention of a thing, such as, for instance, a guardian, an administrator, a borrower, or a usufructuary, has over a thing which belongs to another, but such as is joined with an inclination and purpose to have it for oneself. Men divide it into natural and civil, which division is again taken, either of the manner of possessing or retaining it, or of the form of possession. Natural possession is of the former kind, when we settle upon a thing once appropriated by us, not only with our mind but, as it were, with our body also, and by very act. Civil possession in this sense is retained only in the mind, when a man has already cut such objects off from physical retention. The reason is that civil law still in certain cases allows those advantages which attend possession, even to such as have been cut off from the physical possession or retention of a thing of theirs. Natural possession is of the latter kind, when there is, indeed, a mind and purpose to have a thing for oneself, without, however, a just conviction of dominion as might follow from legitimate title. But civil possession calls for both a desire and a probable cause for desire, such as is regularly understood when any favour is allowed possession in civil laws. See

Now proper objects for possession are corporeal things, movable and immovable; objects less properly, or analogically, such, are incorporeal things or rights, which we possess by use and the power of use, as well as documents on which an action can be brought for some claim. For the establishment of possession it is always required that a man, acting either himself or through another acting in his name, have physical contact with a thing, or that symbol of it, or an instrument of custody, according as the nature of the things allows, and with the effect that the thing is so far under his power that he may actually dispose of it. And, indeed, if several bodies are unified and knit together, the seizure of one part of them with the intention of holding it entire, is held as the seizure of it all, so far as it is unoccupied. So, for example, whoever wants to possess an estate or a house, need not walk over every portion of the former, or explore every recess of the latter, but it is enough for him to enter some part of them. See Digest, XLI. ii. 3, § 1. A whole composed of separate bodies, as a flock, is held to have been seized as a whole, upon the seizure of one body, provided all the parts are present. But when the parts are scattered in place, as when one part of the flock is in this field, and one in another, each part must be seized separately. Incorporeal things, when connected with a corporeal, are understood to have been seized, when the latter has been seized. But if they are to be acquired in a thing belonging to another, they are seized, either when we are introduced to the thing in which, for instance, we wish a right or servitude established, or when we exercise acts flowing as from that right. Add Digest, XIX. i. 3, § 2.

In negative rights, it passes for possession, if I have forbidden another something or opposed¹ him, and he acquiesces in my refusal or opposition. Furthermore, seizure or exercise of an act is an absolute requirement to secure any possession of such kind, although civil laws can bring it about that dominion may pass of its own right to one, so that he can bring action for that thing against its holder with as great effectiveness as if he had taken physical possession of it. Here belongs what is advanced by Grotius, Bk. II, chap. viii, § 25.

Now just as it is required for the securing of dominion by occupancy, that a thing be unoccupied, so, if a thing is to pass from another to me with the effect that I may thereafter be able actually to dispose of it, it is likewise necessary that he renounce possession of it and remove it from his custody, as it were, in order that I may have the opportunity at once of taking it. And this requirement is met, if it is merely said that he has handed it over, since it is not necessary for him to lay the thing in my hands. Just as for it to be said that a man has furnished food, there is no need of his chewing it beforehand and putting it in a person's mouth; it is enough for him to have put the food in such a place that the other can conveniently lay his hands on it. See Digest, XLI. ii. 1, § 21; XLI. ii. 51.

8. With these principles established, it appears that dominion, according as it is considered merely as a moral quality, and as it derives from possession, can in every case pass only by means of pacts, but that, as it is understood to contain a measure of physical power, whereby it can be exercised directly in an act, delivery of possession is also required in addition to pacts. This flows not from positive right, but from natural reason itself. Nor need it be admitted, however, on this account that before delivery the alienator still retains an imperfect dominion, unless you would use the word most ἀκύρωτος [improperly], and choose to call dominion a mere physical faculty of finally disposing of a thing, without a moral faculty. For after a pact is completed, or after a right has been transferred by a pact to another, the thing at once begins to belong to another and to serve his desire, while the alienator can legitimately commit no act regarding it save such as tends to give possession to another. If he does anything further touching that thing before the delivery of possession, he does it de facto and not as though from any right of possession. Indeed, delivery of possession itself is not, properly speaking, the final act of dominion, but an abdication of physical retention. For that is held an act of dominion which is exercised freely from the power of dominion, while delivery of possession does not take place freely but of necessity, or because of an obligation, just as resignation is not an act of a magistrate, in the sense that the latter signifies the power to command others.

But although a thing can no longer be considered mine when I have made over the full right to it to another, yet it is a question of some importance, whether I still have physical control over it, or another has already entered upon the possession of it. For in the former case he cannot as yet actually turn it to his own uses, and should I refuse to turn it over, he must use force in order to secure possession of it. Under such circumstances, in addition to your being compelled to do without it for so long a time, in a state you will have the further trouble of proving your right before the judge, and you will have to bow to his ruling, should he from corruptness or carelessness render an unjust decision, while in a state of natural liberty, you must try the uncertain issue of battle. This was the reason why the Roman laws maintain that by those contracts which are concerned with the alienation of things, only a right to the thing is secured, as if before delivery of possession a man were as yet outside the thing, as it were, although he still has a right to join it with him. But when by seizing it physically the final complement¹ has been added to dominion, they say that a right has been established in the thing. Yet the laws sometimes supply this element that is lacking, in that, for example, they class among the rights in a thing also the right of inheritance, or the right belonging to heirs over the property of a dead person, though they have not yet entered upon possession. And the reason why the Roman laws allowed a real action from a right in a thing, and a personal action from a right to a thing, seems to be, because, when once a thing perfectly belongs to me, I have nothing else to do but to get it wherever I find it, nor is any peculiar and new obligation required in the other that it be delivered to me. But a right to a thing presupposes, that the thing on which the action is brought has not yet been fully united to me, and the other party is under a special obligation to make it possible for the thing to be so united. Therefore, stress must be put upon his person, that he lay the thing before me unoccupied, as it were, so that it may be taken by me.

As for what remains, although it is commonly said that it avails less to have an action than a thing, yet it is certain that our estate is made more valuable by a right to a thing and by personal actions, just as, on the other hand, there would be no use for a man to include in his estate the things which he owes another man without question, even if he still has physical possession of them. Therefore, he who possesses a thousand something or other and owes a thousand, has nothing, while he who owes more than he possesses has less than nothing. As it is expressed in Digest, III. v. 28 [III. v. 27, 28]: 'A man may be held to be already the poorer to the extent² of the obligation which he has incurred.' (M.)

9. It should be observed, further, that delivery of possession is either true or fictitious, of which the latter is said to be done [by long hand, or else]³ by short hand [brevi manu], when one wishes to avoid useless details and niceties. This takes place most commonly when I assign some one ownership of a thing of mine by donation, reserving for a time the usufruct. See Digest, XXXIX. v. 28. Although in some present-day donations of this kind keys are commonly presented by the donor to another, which the latter at once returns to his hands; likewise, when I desire that a thing of mine which another now possesses, shall hereafter be his very own. Digest, XLI. i. 21, § 1. So also when I sell you a thing that has been already lent, or rented, or deposited with you, make you a present of it, or give it by way of a dowry. Digest, XLI. i. 9, § 5. A fictitious delivery of possession also takes place between three persons by delegation, when, for instance, a man wishes to give me something, or owes it, and I order him to give it to another. For that is the same as if the thing had first been given 418 me, and then handed over by me to a third party.

Delivery of possession is said to take place by long hand [manu longa] when a thing is not immediately brought into contact with the body of another, but is pointed out to him, either from near at hand or at a distance. For so far as I can I have turned over a thing, when I have withdrawn from possession of it and have pointed it out to another, so that he may soon lay hands upon it. See Digest, XLVI. iii. 79; XLI. ii. 1, § 21, 18, § 2, 51. They also bring under this head the giving of a sign or instrument of custody, such as keys. See Digest, XLI. i. 9, § 6; Code, VIII. liii. 1; Digest, XVIII. i. 74. But the tossing and scattering of donations to the common people is not done that they may be considered as abandoned, and that they may be held on the title of occupancy by any person who shall afterward seize them. Such a largess is rather a kind of donation made to undefined members of a group, so that the thing thrown is understood to have been given to him who was first of the throng to seize it. Compare Digest, XLI. i. 9, § 7. Although in Lucan, Bk. VII [739-40], Caesar says of the booty allowed his soldiers: 'For I will not call it bestowing that which each one will give unto himself.' (R.) Sometimes also only tickets are scattered, upon the presentation of which that article is given which the tickets have written upon them. Thus the emperor Titus used to throw about at the games wooden disks on some of which was written an amount of food, on others clothing, on yet others money, horses, oxen, sheep, or slaves. Those who had snatched them up brought them to the stewards and received what was written upon them. Zonaras, Bk. II. Compare Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 2.

ON WILLS

But an heir may attack such a will as if none had been made. 9. Donations in case of death. |
|--|---|

AMONG the derivative modes of acquisition some are followed in case of death, some transfer things as concerns both parties among the living. In both cases the things are passed from one to another either by the express will of the former owner, or by the intervention and disposal of some law. Varro, On Farming, Bk. II [i]: 'Something must necessarily intervene before a thing that was another's becomes mine.'

2. Because of death dominions are most frequently transferred by the agency of men through a will, the nature and origin of which should be considered with some care. In the view of Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vi, § 14, a will is 'an alienation of an entire estate only in the event of death. Up to that time it is recoverable, and the retention of the right of possession and enjoyment is meanwhile retained.' (K.) Here there is not wanting some question as to whether a will may properly be called an alienation, in the strict sense in which it denotes such an act by which an owner makes a thing of his belong to some one else. For inasmuch as an alienation in this sense is a transfer of dominion from one person to another, it presupposes the existence of the two persons at the time when the alienation takes place, so that a thing may thenceforth be called alien to him from whom it was transferred to the other. Yet so long as the testator draws breath he retains the fullest right, without any qualification, to all his possessions. Therefore, while he still lives 419² he has alienated nothing. But at the moment of death he loses at once all right which he had while alive, and is henceforth considered as no one. Therefore, it cannot be said that alienation takes place at that time when for the alienator nothing can be called any more another's or his.

Nor is the difficulty removed if we say that alienation takes place when the will is drawn up, but that it is held in suspense until the event of death. For in alienation there should be a union of the wills of two parties, the one to whom a thing is transferred and the other who does the transferring, and this in such a way that their wills are joined at the same time by their drawing together. Yet it very frequently happens that a person does not know that he was made an heir until the will has been opened at the death of the testator, while at its opening the heir is still at liberty to enter upon or reject his inheritance.

Furthermore, since the entire right of the designated heir begins only with the death of the testator, it follows that before the death of the testator no right of his existed which can be said to be held in suspense until the event of death. And again, when any kind of alienation takes place, even though revocable, such a right should be transferred to another in whose favour something is said to be alienated, that it should not be possible for such an act to be recalled at the mere pleasure of the alienator. For otherwise it cannot be understood that either the alienator incurred any obligation, or the other party acquired any right, if what was done amounted, for instance, to no more than this: 'Some day you will have a thing of mine, provided I do not change my mind in the meantime, but you will have no right to prevent me from being able to change my mind at any time and even for no reason.' Surely such an act cannot be called an alienation, since it is only a mere declaration of one's will as it stands at present, without any necessity of persevering in it, and such a declaration is incapable of producing either an obligation or a right. See above, Bk. III, chap. v, § 5. Yet a will is in fact such a declaration of one's desire, whereby no right is conferred upon another before the death of the testator, none, at least, that has an effect of full right against the testator himself. For even after the will has been drawn up, the testator retains not only the fullest right of possession and enjoyment, since the mere property has been transferred to the heir, but in fact there remains to the testator unimpaired dominion. A clear proof of this is to be found in the fact that even after the will is made he can alienate his property or strike out the heirs, however much they protest. Revocable alienations, however, always suppose some event or condition upon which they may be recalled, and which do not depend upon the mere pleasure of the alienator.

3. We shall portray the nature of a will more simply, and in accordance with the ideas of the Roman Jurisconsults, if we call it a declaration of our intention regarding the successors to our property after our death, which intention, however, is changeable and revocable before death at our pleasure, and from which a right arises for others only after our departure. Regarding this power of change the law of humanity demands that no man be deceived with empty hopes or held up to derision beyond his deserts. For this reason we find it hard to censure the remark of Pliny, Epistles, Bk. VIII, ep. xviii, on Domitius Tullus, who had deceived some scoundrelly hangers-on and legacy hunters: 'Others, on the contrary, applaud him extremely for having disappointed the hopes of this infamous tribe of men, whom, considering the disposition of the times, it is but prudence to deceive.' (B.) Add Lucian, Simylus et Polystratus. And yet it is with justice that in Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. viii, Q. Caecilius and T. Barrulus are given a bad name because the former had made sport of L. Lucullus, the latter of Lentulus Spinther, from whom they had none the less received very great benefits.

4. Whether wills of this kind owe their origin to natural or to positive law, is still a subject for debate among scholars. The meaning of this question is not whether a man is obligated by the law of nature 420 to make the will, for that without question is within the disposal of every one, except in so far as it is necessary to prevent quarrels among his kinsmen (compare Isaiah, xxxviii. 1); but whether it follows from the very nature of the introduction of dominion over things, that a man may effectually make a will, or whether the power of doing so is allowed the owners of things by positive laws. It is the opinion of Grotius that a will, like other acts, may accept a particular form¹ from civil law, but that its substance is related to dominion and, granting dominion, it arises from natural law. That is, that the power of a man to dispose effectually of his property is derived from the law of nations which the Roman Jurisconsults called primary law, and the stipulation of the form of the disposal is derived from civil law.

On this statement there cannot help being some question. For since those things over which dominion was established serve men in this life and the dead have no further hold on the things of this world, it did not appear so necessary for dominion to contain within itself the faculty to dispose of what should become of a man's possessions after his death. It could have been enough for a man to hold the property subject to his control, so long as he lived, and be unable to control it beyond his lifetime, while the care for the disposal of the possessions of those who had passed beyond contact with men, might be left to the living. Moreover, it has seemed that, since the dead are removed from human affairs, it was possible with safety to disregard the decisions and arrangements made by them while still living. 'Think you that ashes and buried Manes care for that?' (B.) [Vergil, Aeneid, IV. 34.]

An argument in favour of this lies in the fact that the ancients were accustomed to bind their friends and kinsmen by an oath² to fulfil their final commands, as if no human bond were strong enough for that purpose. See Genesis, xxiv. 2-3; xlvii. 29; l. 25; Diodorus Siculus,

Bk. II, chap. xxxiii, on the death of Parsodes. To the same effect is the incident in Sophocles, Trachinian Women, lines 1192 ff., where Hercules requires of Hyllus an oath to carry out his final commands. Likewise Constantinus Ducas bound his wife Eudocia by an oath that she would not marry again after his death. Yet as to the cleverness with which she recovered her written pledge from the patriarch to whose keeping it had been committed, and then, just as if thereby released from her promise, married Diogenes Romanus, we are informed in Zonaras, Bk. III, on Eudocia, and Michael Glycas, Annals, Bk. IV. Thus, in Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. XVII, chap. x, the orders of Herod to kill the chief men of the Jews are left unfulfilled by his sister and her husband. So [Sulpicius Severus, quoted by Donatus, Virgilii Vita, 143 ff. Diehl]: 'Vergil has ordered that this poetry of his which sang of the Phrygian leader, should be destroyed by swift flames. But Tucca and Varius forbid, and at the same time, thou, O most great Caesar, dost not allow it.' Dio Cassius, Bk. LIX [i], in telling how the will of Tiberius was declared void by Caligula and the senate, adds: 'No injunction can have weight against the intentional misunderstanding or the power of one's successor.' (F.) You may apply here the saying of Lucan, Bk. II [628]: 'There is no hope in the affairs that have been left behind.' (R.)

Therefore, it was left to the decision of the survivors, whether a man's intention should have any effect after his death; and they had to come to some decision among themselves on the question to what extent they were willing to comply with the pleasure of those who had now lost the rights of men. Without this any arrangement would have been useless which the maker could not safeguard, and those who could would not safeguard.

[But, to go further into the matter],¹ it is clear² that it did not meet with mankind's need for peace to introduce such a dominion of things as was capable of furnishing only a present and momentary use, but one rather which would continue into the future, since there belongs to man the right to preserve his life no less for the future, so far as nature allows, than for the present, and to canvass means to that end. When to this is added the consideration that a special care is laid upon us of those who are blood relatives of ours and whose line we hope will continue indefinitely, it has seemed conducive to the peace of mankind not to conclude the force of dominion at some mere span of time, since such a procedure would give rise to no less disorder than does primitive community in property, but to assign to it an indefinite 421 duration, as it were, by which it might pass on even to others and continue in them. How, then, this dominion can be maintained and continued, is decided by those who live in natural liberty, according to their own judgement. But in states, just as it is protected by the public strength, so for the most part it has been tempered and hedged about in different ways, as the interest of the state saw fit. But I question whether men of judgement will approve the theory advanced by the author [Leibnitz] of Nova Methodus Jurisprudentiae, p. 56. He says, 'Wills by mere law (that is, without the confirmation of civil laws) would be of no moment were not the soul immortal. But since the dead are in fact still alive, they remain for that reason owners of things, and the heirs they have left are to be considered as stewards over their property.' Compare Luke, xii. 20; Ecclesiasticus, xi. 20.

5. But just as no one would lightly maintain that it is opposed to the law of nature for a man to be able to dispose of his goods at the time when he is their owner, and to assign the effect to a time when he shall not be their owner, so it is by no means clear that this follows by any necessary reason from the nature of dominion. But this thing, indeed, does flow from the nature of dominion, namely, that a man while living may grant another living man a right to a thing of his, which right is not destroyed upon¹ the death of him who established it, since that right reposes in a living person. For inasmuch as the efficient cause and the effect are distinct entities, it is not necessary that the latter ceases to exist the same instant that the former does. Therefore, just as a man while living can fully transfer to another a piece of property of his own, and the latter does not lose dominion over it at the death of him from whom the dominion was received, so nothing prevents a man from being able to transfer to another dominion over a piece of property of his own, reserving to himself, however, a certain right over that thing for the rest of his lifetime. Consequently, we read that in the earliest ages the heads of families disposed of their possessions on the approach of death (although it appears from Genesis, xv. 3, that Abraham was not actually desirous that the son of his servant be his heir, but that he only decided² upon that course in case he died without offspring). Yet the effect of their act was that they proclaimed their desire among their sons, so that they, in agreeing to it, might seem to confirm it among themselves by a mutual pact. In this way a right was transferred from the living to the living, and the latter, as it were, were admitted at once into possession of the property. And it is likely that those ancients, accustomed to a frugal and simple life, did not usually die by such sudden and violent diseases as we in these days, but that they declined as the vital humour gradually failed, keeping, however, their reason to the very end, and were never struck by death suddenly and unawares. See Genesis, xxv. 5-6; xlviii. 22; Deuteronomy, xxi. 16-17; 1 Kings, i. 35; Ecclesiasticus, xxxiii. 24.

In the same way Cyrus in Xenophon, Training of Cyrus, Bk. VIII

[vii], assigns to his sons with his own voice what each one should receive from his father's fortune. Certainly such final disposals enjoy the greatest favour, and it is no little solace of mortality, if a man may see what he has acquired in his lifetime pass on to the single person of his choice. Quintilian, Declamations, cccviii:

It is fixed in the customs and laws of states, that, as often as it can be done, the testament of the deceased shall be observed; and this for no slight reason. For there appears to be no other consolation in death than to have a will which transcends it. Otherwise even an estate might seem a burden, if the owner is not to have the complete disposal of it, and when all the rights over it which are allowed to us in our lifetime are taken away at our death.

And there is point to the lines of Statius, Silvae, Bk. IV [vii.33-40]:

Childlessness we must shun with every effort. Close in pursuit presses the heir with hostile vows, and (fie upon him, fie!) prays that an early death may overtake his kind friend. The childless man is laid in earth without a tear, while his greedy survivor, the usurper of the home, stands ready to pounce upon the spoils of death, counting over the cost of the funeral fire. (S.)

6. Yet the question is not so much about ultimate disposals during one's life as about wills, by which a man disposes of his goods in such a way that he may keep the power of changing them down to his last breath, and that a right to his property may only upon his death come into force for the heir. Very weighty reasons have led many to prefer this method of disposal to that where men at the point of death were accustomed to distribute their property among heirs; for men often meet an unexpected end, or are separated from their friends and kinsmen, with the result that they have neither the time nor the opportunity to express their last wishes. Often also the man who thought that the Fates were spinning his final web of life is unexpectedly restored to health. It was also judged more fitting for a man to dispose of his goods at his leisure, and with serene and unimpaired mind, than when he was in fear at his approaching end, or when his mind was weakened by the force of his illness.

Furthermore, it was also most advantageous for a man to remain the master of his property until his last breath, and to allow no one such a right over it as he could not without inconvenience recall at any time, when the merits of his heirs had altered, or when his mind had changed. See Ecclesiasticus, xxxiii. 20 ff. (A French proverb calls it foolish for a man to put off his clothes before he is on his way to bed.) For although a transfer of right may be made revocably, that is, it may be withdrawn by the one transferring it, in case there exists a causal or potestative condition on the part of him in whose favour it was made, yet the doubts which must necessarily have arisen on the existence of a condition, or could have been advanced by either party, would have given rise to a mass of disputes. At any rate an heir, once selected, would have felt the greatest resentment against the testator, if he had for some reason lost the inheritance which his hope had already seized upon. Nay, it has been a matter of danger to many to have named an heir openly and too soon. Thus Caligula 'accused such as had named him openly as heir among their children and had continued to live after such a declaration, of making game¹ of him, and to many of them he sent poisoned cakes'. (R.) Suetonius, Caligula, chap. xxxviii. Add Idem, Galba,² chap. ix; Livy, Bk. XL, chap. xxxiv. According to Josephus, Antiquities, Bk. XVI, chap. viii, Augustus forbade Herod when he wanted to divide his kingdom among his sons to do so, ordering him during his lifetime³ to keep both his kingdom and his sons in his power. And yet the emperor divided his own house in fatal rivalry by later appointing a successor to himself during his lifetime. For this reason it seems a safe procedure to see to it that men's wills are published only after death, lest they subject their makers to hatred or danger while yet alive.

For the same reason it has rightly been held a disgraceful and inhuman act to unseal and publish wills contrary to the wishes of the testator. So when Augustus at the outbreak of the civil war had the will of Antony, which was deposited with the Vestals, read openly before the senate, most people were incensed at the deed. Plutarch, Antony [lviii]: 'They thought it a strange and grievous matter that a man should be called to account while alive for what he wished to have done after his death.' (P.) Dio Cassius, Bk. L, calls it a most unjust act. It was especially so since it was a common practice with the Romans, as appears in many passages of Tacitus, to put into their wills many judgements of men. Add Digest, XVI. iii. 1, § 38; Digest, XLVIII. x. 1, § 5.

Now although these and similar reasons have strongly commended to many nations this kind of ultimate disposal, yet it is not, for all this, firmly established that wills of this kind naturally proceed from the very dominion of things, and are, therefore, derived from natural law. For even if we should suppose, that, by the common agreement of men, 423 dominion possesses the power whereby a man may upon his death bequeath his property to any person that he pleases, this, however, in such a way that both the will of the testator should remain changeable until his death (see Digest, XXXIV. iv. 4), and the right of the heir would begin only with the death of the testator, while the heir should only at that time know himself to be such; still all this is but the contrivance of positive law. For otherwise, in transfers of right from one person to another, it would regularly have been necessary for the consent of him who does the transferring to coincide at the same time with the consent of the other to whom the transfer is made, and the two unite after a fashion; from which union a transfer of right is understood to follow. But in cases of wills there is so far from being any necessity for a union of the wills of the testator and of the heir, that even between the death of the former and the succession of the latter a space of time may intervene during which the law sustains the right of the heir. Add Digest, XLI. i. 61.

² [For Galbac read Galba c.—Tr.]

³ [For quo ad read quoad.—Tr.]

7. It is also often a question for serious debate, whether an heir by will can enter upon his inheritance with good conscience, when the will is lacking in the formalities required by civil law; and also whether he who would have been the heir of a man, had he died intestate, may with good conscience break a will which lacks the formalities required by civil law, although it be established that the testator really wished to bequeath his property to the person designated. Those who answer both these questions in the negative, rely primarily upon the hypothesis that the making of a will is a matter of natural law. They feel, therefore, that the man who breaks such a will can defend his case in an open and civil court, but not in the court within himself, that is, his conscience.

Yet to understand these questions more thoroughly, it should be observed at the outset, that civil laws have scarcely in any other field been more solicitous in requiring a scrupulous care in form and procedure than in wills, to prevent frauds which may occur so often in written wills, and to prevent contentions, which greed for gain would have produced in serious numbers, since scarcely anything is gained with less labour than a rich inheritance. Therefore, since every one of proper age and not entirely uneducated and stupid, is presumed to have learned, or to be able to find out from those who are better informed, how civil laws wish wills to be drawn up, no one is believed to have expressed his sober will in a way which he knew would not prevail in a civil court against opponents. And this presumption is further strengthened by the fact that ample time is allowed men to draw them up. Therefore, when a will is not in accordance with civil laws, it is an easy presumption that some fraud was involved, or that the testator either was not in entire control of his mind, or else hastened the completion of his will in a superficial manner, and more at the instigation of others than of his own volition. And so the single purpose of those formalities is that a false will be not substituted for a true one, and that a hasty and inadvised impulse be not received in place of the clear and fully measured purpose of the testator, especially since the laws already call to the succession of a person dying intestate, those whom he is regularly supposed to have favoured most highly. Yet although it may happen that even a man who decides to declare his sober and fully considered purpose, may err in following the customary form, a civil court can judge of the intention of a dead man in no other way than by his documents. And since it was within the power of civil laws to control the faculty of bequeathing property for the service of the state, there need be no departure from the general statutes in favour of one person or another, for were that precedent once established it would produce a harvest of disputes and frauds.

In the same way he who is disappointed of an expected inheritance because of a defective will, can accomplish nothing by his complaints. 424 For he has no claim by the prerogative of blood, for then he would have inherited without a will, nor does any citizen secure such a right from a will as shall at least prevail against a challenge, unless it has squared with the civil statutes. Therefore, let such a person feel that he has failed of the inheritance more because of fortune than of injury at any one's hands. Notwithstanding all this, the designated heir will be able rightfully to enter upon the inheritance, when no dispute is raised over the will. For the flaw which is presumed by civil laws upon the lack of the customary form, vanishes under such circumstances (for it is presumed that the testator actually wished this person to be his heir), and in fact the property belongs to him rather than to any others, after those whom otherwise the general law named for the succession, acquiesce and tacitly yield their right. For a sober decision, although declared without proper formality, the civil laws declare to be insufficient to transfer right only in so far as it must exclude others, who can claim a right to the same thing on other grounds. When the transaction is not brought into a civil court, the absence of the customary forms of positive law does by no means vitiate it, if such things as are otherwise able by the general law of nature to establish a right, are present. Therefore, it appears that a defect in the customary form militates against the designated heirs when they are opposed by those to whom the law gave the succession in case of a lack of heirs by will. When these are silent, the fact that the testator soberly signified whom he wanted for his heir, is considered enough to transfer dominion. This thing many nations which were either ignorant or disdainful of the great exactness of Roman law, have judged sufficient to validate a will. Yet it is unquestioned that they sin who receive anything from a will which they know is forged, even though they were not parties to the fraud. Therefore, Cicero, On Duties, Bk. III [xviii], is justified in censuring M. Crassus and Q. Hortensius, who were unwilling to forgo a small reward from a spurious will of Minutius Basilus by another's crime, since they were conscious of no connexion with the fraud. Add Valerius Maximus, Bk. IX, chap. iv. For the testator did not wish any of his property to go to them, while, in the absence of a legal declaration of the owner's purpose, the laws had already assigned those goods to others.

8. Yet if he to whom the inheritance would have belonged, had no will been made, breaks a defective will, he properly does no injury either to the testator or to the designated heir, whatever may actually have been the serious purpose of the former. He does not injure the testator, for the testator enjoyed no right to confer his property by his final disposition on heirs not recognized by law, unless he followed the form prescribed by the laws of his state; nor yet the designated heir, since no right is conferred on him that will prevail against the lawful heirs, unless it has by the will been conformed to the civil laws. Nevertheless, men who aspire to a reputation of great humanity have judged it a generous thing not to deviate from the purpose of a deceased person, although it had not been exactly expressed according to the forms of civil laws; and this either to avoid the suspicion of avarice, or because a feeling for man's mortality affects tender hearts so keenly that they will not see a man's final wish go unfulfilled. Pliny, Letters, Bk. IV, ep. x:

You regard¹ so religiously the will of the deceased, which indeed where it can be discovered will always be law to honest heirs. Honour is to you and me as strong an obligation as the compulsion of law is to others. (Idem, Bk. II, ep. vi): I have a private law of my own, and that is, punctually to perform the will of the deceased, though it may want the essential forms. (And Bk. V, ep. vii): This bequest, in the eye of the law, is null and void, but, considered as the clear and expressed will of the deceased, ought to stand firm and valid. Myself, I consider the will of the dead (though I am afraid what I say will not please the lawyers) of higher authority than the law. (B.)

He that would follow such an example would surely deserve the praise accorded a noble mind. For the same reason those who seek praise for their humanity are careful to observe the final commands or requests of their kinsmen and friends, however great the burden these may entail. As an example of such burdens you may list that unusual will found in Lucian, Toxaris [or Friendship, chap. xxii], where a poor man in his will gave to one of his rich friends his mother to support and to another his daughter to furnish with a dowry. Yet a man should not be vilified who does not refuse a reward allowed him by the laws of the state.

As for the rest, it must be observed from the laws of individual states, how far a man may divide his estate among a number of persons, be they all heirs, or some heirs and some legatees; whether, also, an inheritance is handed down with full right over it, or under the burden of a trust fund, subjects which are treated fully by the writers on civil law. Yet it is an injunction of natural law that burdens and debts on the property of a dead person fall upon every heir, although not to an amount greater than the value of the inheritance, nor is he obligated to make up out of his own resources what is lacking, unless he is understood to have obligated himself in a special manner to do so.

9. It is customary to distinguish between wills and gifts causa mortis, whereby a man during his lifetime transfers to another living person, who also agrees to it, a right to his property in case of his death. Of these there seem to be two main kinds. One is when a man, who feels that death is likely soon to come upon him, bestows a gift of this sort upon a person, yet not in such a way as to make it his at once upon his acceptance, but only when death has followed; or when a man makes a gift which is conditional upon his death that is threatened by some present danger, such donation being null when the danger has been avoided. An instance is to be found in Homer, Odyssey, Bk. XVII [78 ff.]. Possibly we may include here the deed of King Philip, in Livy, Bk. XXXII, chap. xxxviii, who, when he saw a decisive conflict at hand with the Romans, 'put the city of Argos into the hands of Nabis in trust, on the terms, that if he should prove successful in the war, Nabis should re-deliver it to him; but if any misfortune should happen, he should keep it himself'. (E.) Add Diodorus Siculus, Bk. XV, chap. xix, on a gift of Amyntas to the Olynthians. In Euripides, Alcestris, lines 1020 ff., Hercules says:

Take, guard for me this maid,
Till, leading hitherward the Thracian mares,
I come from slaughter of Biston's lord.
But if I fall—no, no! I must return!—
I give her then, for service of thine halls. (W.)

The other kind of gift is when a man assigns a thing of his to another in case of his death, keeping for himself in the meantime possession and full usufruct, upon the condition that the gift may be recalled before his death for a particular reason; if, for instance, the second party should do some great injury to the donor, or if the latter should afterwards have an heir born to him. But if the donor would have his power to withdraw the gift depend not on some extrinsic condition, but on his own good pleasure, then the other party will have secured no right, so long as the donor has the natural faculty to change his mind, that is, so long as he retains his reason. For just as no man is obligated, if he can free himself, without performance of any kind, at his own pleasure and whenever he wishes, so an expectation which can be made void at another's mere pleasure, cannot be called a right, since the right of the other party will commence only with the death of the donor, and so that act will approach the nature of a will strictly so called. But when a person under the urge of the approaching danger of death makes a gift in such a way that it becomes at once the property of the one who receives it, and does not recall it when the danger is past, then it will rather be classed among gifts made between the living. Although, if the gift has been very large, and will impair the resources of the donor, and much more, if it take his entire substance, it may seem to depend upon the approaching death, since it is assumed that no sane man wishes rashly to reduce himself to poverty.

That gift, also, whereby a man transfers dominion to another in an irrevocable manner, while keeping for himself the usufruct during his lifetime, will be listed as one made between living persons. 426

How far is the heir of a dead man obligated to pay his debts? |

ACCORDING to the disposal of natural law, when there is no express and special act of the former owner, dominions of things are said to pass in intestate succession. That is, since such a power had been given dominion that a man could not only dispose of his own property so long as he was alive, but also transfer it effectually in case of death to others, it did not appear likely that, in case a man was found to have made no disposition of his estate while yet alive, he meant that at his death it should lie open for any one to seize, as if it had been abandoned. Pindar, Olympian Odes, x [88-90]: 'For one who is dying, it is a hateful sight to see his wealth falling to the lot of a stranger from another home.' (S.) Therefore, natural reason dictated that in such cases men should ascertain the most probable intention of the dead man and follow it. And when that is uncertain, it is assumed that every one wanted what agrees best both with natural inclination and with duty. Compare Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 3.

2. Natural inclination regularly tends in this direction: Our greatest endeavour is to look out for those who are descended from us, and, after them, for those who are related to us by blood. For nearness of blood almost universally unites men's minds by a special regard, and almost all men have deep-seated in them the desire to see their families as prosperous as possible. Among duties the foremost is that we make provisions for those whose care nature has in a special way laid upon us, and that we show a grateful attitude toward benefactors.

Now, however often such presumptions may deviate from the real desire of the deceased, it was, nevertheless, to the interest of tranquillity and peace, that no special conjectures should be maintained against these common presumptions, since on this ground the door would be thrown open to innumerable quarrels. And so in such matters the desire of the deceased is regarded not so much as it was, as what it should have been, and as it would have agreed with the rules of duty. Of these last probably the most important is, that no man furnish the opportunity for others to quarrel among themselves. Consequently, it is to the interest of peace that some common course be followed in such cases, even though the desire of some few may thereby be neglected, rather than that we involve ourselves and others in infinite difficulties, while labouring to meet the desires of every individual. 427

Furthermore, he who wanted some special fancy of his satisfied, should have expressly signified it. Thus, nothing is more common than for a father to show far greater affection for one of several children than for all the rest. Who would question that he would wish to provide for his favourite more liberally than for the rest? And yet when he dies intestate they will divide his estate into equal portions, not so much because it offends natural law to assign one of his children a fairer portion, as because there would arise infinite disputes among brothers, if an estate were to be divided according to the affection that their father bore them. The same inconvenience would follow in case a man died without offspring, leaving several brothers for whom, while he lived, he had different degrees of affection.

Again, it is not uncommon for a man to die leaving a distantly related kinsman, whom he never loved especially, and to whom he is not obligated for any kindness, while on the other hand he owes all that he has to the favour of some one not related to him. Who will not say that the latter was the benefactor of the deceased rather than his kinsman? And yet in view of the fact that a comparison between the bond of blood and that of gratitude would afford material for disputes most difficult of solution, all nations have agreed, that, in the case of intestates, a kinsman is preferred to a benefactor, especially since a person might seem not to have conferred a kindness but to have played the usurer, if on that account he should be preferred to kinsmen in an inheritance. Yet if the former had been placed before the latter by the express desire of the deceased, it would be but just to carry out his wishes.

From all this it is clear that natural reason, which renders decisions on successions when final dispositions are lacking, considers not the mere desire of the deceased alone, about which there is often little information, but that desire as it agrees with the common inclination and duty of men, and as it will offer no fuel to disputes. Add Boecler on Grotius, Bk. II, chap. vii, § 13. Yet this natural reason is supported in all states by civil laws, to the twofold end, that the avarice of men may not draw into bitter disputes those who seem to enjoy an equal share of reason, and that the matter may be skilfully adjusted to the public interest.

3. Now in successions to a person intestate, both on the guidance of reason itself, and with the consent of all known nations, children are preferred to all others, even¹ to the parents themselves. See 2 Corinthians, xii. 14; Romans, viii. 17: 'If children, then heirs.' Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics, Bk. VIII, chap. xiv: 'Parents know their offspring better than the children know that they are sprung from them, and the author of another's being is more closely united to his offspring than the offspring to the parent.' (W.) Isaeus, Orations, v [vi. 28]:

The law itself gives a son his father's property, and does not allow him who has legitimate sons to make testamentary disposition of his property. (Idem, Orations, ii [iii. 42]): For no man may lawfully make testamentary disposition or give anything of his own property to any one, without the consent² of his daughters, if a man dies leaving legitimate daughters. (And a little further down) [iii. 68]: The law says that a man³ may dispose of his property at his own pleasure, if he does not leave behind him legitimate sons. If, however, he leave behind females, their consent is required. Therefore, with the approval of one's daughters a man may give and dispose of his property. But without the knowledge of his legitimate daughters men can neither adopt anybody, nor give their property away.

428 Add Digest, XLVIII. xx. 7. Julian, The Caesars [p. 334 D]: 'It is the custom to hand down the succession to a man's sons, and all men desire to do so.' (W.) In Valerius Maximus, Bk. VII, chap. vii, § 2, 'the bond of fatherhood' is called 'the closest possible among men'. In favour of children is, first, the obligation of parents whereby they are constrained by nature to give every proper care to the nourishment and education of their children, and second, that strongest of all affections, which is extinguished only in exceptional cases, even by the atrocious crimes of children, or the unusual barbarity of parents.

4. Some have raised a question, indeed, about the maintenance owed by parents to their children, whether, namely, the obligation whereby it is owed is a perfect or an imperfect one, that is, whether it belongs to expletive or attributive justice (see Grotius, loc. cit., § 4). Their position is that parents owe their children maintenance, not, however, from expletive but from attributive justice, so that parents are guilty of the greatest inhumanity if they deny it, yet no right is enjoyed by their children, whereby they can demand maintenance of their parents against their will, such a right being a proper effect of expletive justice. Yet they would add that such a perfect right may be given children by civil laws.

But it is our feeling that a perfect obligation rests upon parents to maintain their children so long as they cannot take care of themselves, and that this seems to be enjoined not merely by nature herself, but by the very act of the parents in begetting children and bringing them into
